HISTORY

OF

ESSEX COUNTY, NEW JERSEY.

CHAPTER LIII.

FRANKLIN TOWNSHIP.¹

Geography and Topography.—The township of Franklin extends a distance of about two miles along the west bank of the Passaic River, bounded on the south by Belleville, on the west by Bloomfield, and on the north by the township of Acquackanonk, in Passaic County. The territory has a pleasant variation of hill and dale, and the quiet beauty of its scenery and the honest and solid character of its inhabitants remind one of the classic ground of Sleepy Hollow immortalized by the pen of Washington Irving. Situated on a gentle slope towards the Passaic is the village of Avondale, a comparatively new settlement, owing to its origin being due mainly to the opening of the Paterson and Newark Railroad. On the river side is the vicinity formerly known as North Belleville, where there are extensive quarries of a fine quality of sandstone renowned for its durability, and of which large quantities are excavated, dressed and shipped to all parts of the continent for building purposes. Toward the west lies the village of Franklin, nestled in a narrow valley through which the Yantacaw or Third River winds its sinuous course, and with a considerable descent through the township, affords not only a thorough drainage for the surrounding country, but furnishes a valuable water-power, which has been largely utilized in operating woolen and paper mills. West of the village is another range of hills, and beyond these is a large area of tillable land, the fertility of which is equal to any in the county.

At the time of the founding of Newark, in 1666, this settlement formed a portion of the out-plantations of that town but was inhabited mostly by settlers from Acquackanonk and the adjoining portions of Bergen County. Subsequently it became a part of Bloomfield township, and was included in Belleville when that township was set off in 1839.

Franklin made a Township.—Franklin was created a township by an act of the Legislature approved Feb. 18, 1874, and the present boundary lines were then established. Owing to the want of records, the early history of Franklin must of necessity remain obscure. The houses were built here toward the latter part of the seventeenth century there can be no doubt. They were mostly of stone, one story and a half high, and were built with the solidity which characterized all the structures erected by the early colonists. There are still some very old specimens of stone architecture standing, but it is not claimed that any of them are original structures, although there are a few which bear the marks and characteristics of houses in other parts of the State that are known to be nearly or quite two hundred years old.

Old Residences.—One of the oldest stone houses with any authenticated date is that in which Mr. Wynant Van Zandt has resided the last twenty years. It is situated on the river road, not far from the Passaic County line. On a tablet over the front door is the inscription, "June 5, 1702. J. R." The initials are doubtless those of John Riker, who built and owned the house. It was afterwards a part of the Merri's estate. Another very old stone house is that occupied by Mr. Alexander Schultz, on the west side of the river road, a little above Mr. Van Zandt's property, and was originally the homestead of John Van Ripper. It is a two-story building, and has been allowed to run to decay, and when bought by the present owner presented quite a dilapidated appearance. The stone tablet in the rear of the house bears the legend "I.

L. V. R. Pr May 1st, 1788. This was the date of its rebuilding, a house having stood on the same site many years before.

On Mill Street, opposite Duncan's mills, is an old and well-preserved house, built before the Revolution, and was occupied by the grandfather of Warren Vreeland. There are several buildings of stone in various parts of the township which are doubtless over a century old, but definite information as to the date of their erection is not attainable.

In the early settlement of this part of the county the Dutch were well represented, as is evident from the names now extant. The Van Ripers, Van Winkles, Vreelands and many other family names of the present day plainly indicate that a large proportion of Holland blood flows in the veins of many of the people.

Educational.—The first building used for school purposes in this township stood on the north side of the road leading from the present school-house to Avondale opposite Alexander Phillips' quarry, about where the Clayton House now stands,—the property of William B. Stanley, deceased. Concerning the date of the commencement of the school no information can be obtained from any living inhabitant, and still less is known as to its character, size, government, teachers, etc. However, about 1794 the school was removed to its present site, corner of Quarry road and Passaic Avenue, through the influence of the family of the late John K. Spear. Here was erected a one-story stone building, which stood until 1860, when it was replaced by the present two-story frame structure.

The old school-house was divided by a partition into a commodious school-room with large fire-place, and another room for family purposes, designed probably for the teacher and family. During the existence of this building it seems never to have been unoccupied by a family. The course of instruction was confined to the "three R's,"—the bare rudiments of the common English branches; indeed, geography and grammar were considered advanced studies. The expense of the school were defrayed by district taxation on the basis of attendance, a system then in vogue in most of the Middle States.

Among the popular interested school officers of that period may be mentioned John S. Brown, Sebastian Duncan and Joseph Kingsland. Among the teachers, of which the district was well favored, was the late Dr. Jeremiah Cross, of Newark. The present school building is modern in its appointments, divided into three large class-rooms capable of accommodating two hundred or more pupils comfortably. The school is equally modern in its course of instruction, providing a course in the common branches, together with a graduating course necessary for entrance into college.

Among the district clerk since 1860 are Henry Van Winkle, Alex. Phillips, Thomas Vreeland, Geo. S. Coe and C. F. Underhill, who was the clerk in 1884.

The instruction in the present building has been imparted by Orson Logee (of Massachusetts), De Forest Lozier and George W. Symonds, of New York, principals; with Julia A. Vreeland, Julia Brown and Catharine C. Hyde, assistants.

The old "Red School-House," which afforded educational advantages to the youth of the early part of this century, stood in the vicinity known as Povershon, near the present residence of Mr. A. S. Kingsland. It was moved from thence, about forty years ago, to a site a little south of Rusby's store. In May, 1856, a meeting of the inhabitants of the district was held, and Thomas Stager, John Cunningham and Samuel Brown were appointed a committee to find a suitable lot for a new school-house. On May 11, 1857, the voters again met, and decided to purchase from Henry Stager the lot upon which the present school-house of District No. 5 stands. A frame building was then erected, but in 1874 a fire caused its destruction. In 1875 a new two-story brick building was erected, with a seating capacity for one hundred and fifty scholars.

The records of this school prior to 1852 are not to be found. At that date the trustees were John Duncan, John Cunningham and John Rusby. Henry A. Ventris was the district clerk. With the addition of Robert Gutherson, William Duncan and Leonard Rusby, the list of trustees from that time onward is nearly complete.

The present trustees are Abraham Tuers, R. J. M. Chase and Henry B. Duncan, the latter being the clerk. Mr. Theodore Witte is the principal, and is assisted by Miss G. Broadbent.

Religious Interests of Franklin.—REFORMED CHURCH.—Over fifty years ago religious services of this denomination were held in the old stone school-house, the district being included within the geographical boundary of the Reformed Dutch Church of Second River. From 1828 to 1834 the Rev. Augustus Abel ministered to the spiritual needs of the people, and experienced not a few discouragements in his labors.

The few devout friends who had helped to establish these services still persevered, and a Sunday-school was organized, the teachers coming from Belleville. Out of these Sunday services came the stated weekly prayer-meetings, under the ministrations of Rev. Abraham H. Meyers. The catechising of the youth and children in the school was a prominent part of the exercises, when conducted by Rev. John Garretson, who, like his predecessors, had charge of the Belleville congregation. A preaching service was established in 1839, and an application was then made to the consistory of Belleville Church for a regular supply for that service. Permission was granted, with the understanding that the applicants were to bear the expense of it, and continue their connection with the parent church, they to worship there in the forenoon of the Sabbath, and to receive the pastoral attention of the minister at Franklin in the afternoon.

Rev. John A. Liddell, of Stone-house Plains, conducted the services and preached every Sunday afternoon until his death, in 1851. He was succeeded by Rev. John Wiseman for about ten years. In 1853 the Belleville congregation were engaged in building their new church, which afforded an opportunity for the Rev. Isaac Demond, their pastor, to preach there every Sunday morning for about a year. On the completion of the Belleville Church the pastor resumed his pulpit and discontinued his Sabbath labors at Franklin. Rev. Peter S. Talmage was the next to render Sunday afternoon service.

In April, 1855, application was made by twenty-eight communicants to be organized into a Reformed Dutch Church. The request was granted, and a committee appointed to superintend the ordination of elders and deacons and constitute the church.

On the 27th of May the Rev. Dr. James Scott ordained Sebastian Duncan and John Barnes as elders, and Robert Duncan and Henry A. Ventross as deacons. At that time the congregation numbered fifty-four families and forty communicants.

The first settled pastor after the organization of the church was the Rev. J. S. Lott, who took charge in 1859, remaining with this church five years. In 1864 Rev. R. B. Campfield, of Newark, supplied the pulpit for about six months, and was succeeded by Rev. Alvin Ostrom, a returned missionary from China, who remained about a year. For some time subsequently the pulpit was supplied by various ministers, and the church was without a permanent pastor until the Rev. A. M. Quick was called and accepted the charge. He resigned on the 6th of July, 1882, and for a year later Rev. E. H. Camp, of Newark, had temporary charge as a supply. For over a year there has been no settled pastor. The elders are James Kearney, Stephen Coeyman, David Batchelor and John Lancaster; Deacons, Cyrus Broadbent, Abraham Cucman.

The church was built in 1869, through the efforts of Rev. Mr. Lott. The basement is of stone and the main structure of wood, and cost nine thousand dollars. Its seating capacity is two hundred and fifty. The land for the church was donated by Mr. Henry Stager, and a lot was subsequently purchased of him for the parsonage. The Sunday-school is attended by about one hundred scholars, and is superintended by Mr. H. B. Duncan.

GRACE CHURCH (PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL).—This church may be said to have started from a Sunday-school held on the estate of T. W. Satterthwaite, Esq. The school was removed to Franklin in the spring of 1869, and was held in the district school-house, where shortly afterwards the first service of the church was held, the Rev. W. H. Carter, D.D., of Christ Church, Bloomfield, officiating. Soon afterwards the Methodist Episcopal Church was rented, and services were held regularly every Sunday afternoon by the Rev. H. B. S. Martin, assistant minister of Christ Church, Bloomfield.

At the end of a year, Mr. Martin having removed from Bloomfield, the services were discontinued, but the Sunday-school was carried on, and kept in a flourishing condition by the interest and exertions of Mrs. Joseph Kingsland. On July 29, 1872, the cornerstone of the new church was laid by the Rev. Dr. Carter on a lot donated by Mr. T. W. Satterthwaite, and on Easter day, the 13th of April, 1873, the first public service was held in the church.

The first meeting to organize a parish was held in the church Oct. 2, 1873, and the following church officers were elected: Wardens, Joseph Kingsland, Jr., James S. Satterthwaite; Vestrymen, John W. Stitt, Eugene Van Loan, Charles F. Underhill, Silas C. Hay, James R. Hay, James M. Wheeler, C. Entwistle, Theodore Mallaby, Jr., William Carew. The new parish was placed in charge of the Rev. Dr. Carter, then rector of St. John's Church, Passaic, who held regular services every Sunday afternoon until the spring of 1876, when he removed to Florida, and the Rev. Mr. Huntington took charge for a short time.

From November, 1876, to June, 1877, the services were kept up by a lay reader, Mr. J. B. P. Pendleton of the General Theological Seminary, New York, at which time the present rector, the Rev. W. R. Nairn, entered upon his duties.

The church is a frame structure, costing originally seven thousand dollars, and has been enlarged and improved by the addition of a chancel and belfry, at a cost of one thousand five hundred dollars.

There were in October, 1884, sixty families and ninety-one communicants connected with the church.

The present officers are: Wardens, Joseph Kingsland and James S. Satterthwaite; Vestrymen, James M. Wheeler, James R. Hay, George S. Coe, George H. Whipple, Laurence Y. Hopkins, Nathan F. Caryl, Robinson Chase, William H. Boardman.

ST. MARY'S ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, AVONDALE.

—Prior to the year 1876, the Roman Catholics living in Franklin had been obliged to go to St. Peter's Church, Belleville, to hear mass. There had long been a desire to have a church easier of access, and in 1872 the initial steps were taken to erect a suitable structure. A beautiful site near the railroad crossing at Washington Avenue was presented by the late Mrs. William Joyce for church purposes. The cornerstone was laid by Archbishop Bayley, on Sept. 22, 1875, and the building of a substantial stone edifice was commenced. Among original members who took an active interest in the establishment of the new parish and the erection of the desired church were the trustees, John Latus, John A. Homan, William Joyce, William J. Joyce, Henry A. Conolly and Cornelius Collins. The building was not completed until 1876, and on December 25th of that year the first mass was said within its walls by Rev. Hubert De Burgh. This mass was offered for benefactors of the church, living or dead. The parish was incorporated in the diocese of Newark, Dec. 28, 1876. Father De Burgh remained in charge of the parish until May, 1882, when he was succeeded by Rev. John P. Morris, the present rector, who had been officiating for some time at St. Mary's Church, Plainfield.

On Oct. 29, 1882, the dedicatory ceremonies and the blessing of the bell were performed by the Right Rev. Bishop Wigger. The church stands on a prominent knoll, and is a fine specimen of the early English style of architecture, built entirely of stone quarried in the immediate neighborhood. The nave is ninety-eight by twenty-eight feet, the chancel twenty-one by eighteen feet, the interior handsomely finished, and an altar of chaste workmanship has recently been erected. This was the gift of the late Michael Morris, Esq., of Paterson, father of Rev. Father Morris, who was a liberal benefactor to the church in a variety of ways, including a donation, shortly before his death, which enabled the parish to relieve themselves of a mortgage upon the church property, and assisted in the purchase of a rectory and three acres of ground adjoining.

The present trustees are John A. Honan and Cornelius Collins. Rev. Father Morris is the secretary and treasurer ex-officio.

The membership of the parish is four hundred and fifty, many of them attending from Lyndhurst, Kingsland and other villages in Bergen County.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—In the early part of the present century the people of Franklin who affiliated with the Methodist denomination had to join with their brethren of Belleville in their religious worship. The first church building erected here, was in 1830, but no records of the transactions of the society are extant. In 1853 the house was removed and the stones used in the construction of the basement of the present edifice. As an appointment it was connected with Belleville until 1848, when it was made a separate charge.

The following is the list of the pastors since that time: J. L. Coyne, J. Paul, Henry Hurd, W. H. Dickerson, J. H. Vincent, R. S. Arndt, S. Olcott, W. C. Nelson, J. C. Brown, E. Clement, F. H. Landon, C. R. Barnes, J. Scarlet, G. T. Jackson, A. H. Brown, Jacob P. Ford, Annis H. Bellis, Gilbert H. Winans and T. H. Jacobus, 1883-85.

The church property consists of between five and six acres of ground, upon which is a cemetery, a parsonage and a tenement house, the total value of which is estimated at ten thousand dollars. In 1883 several improvements were made in the interior of the church. The seating capacity is three hundred and fifty.

The officers of the church in October, 1884 were: Trustees, John M. Rasby, Anthony S. Brown, Joseph A. Pollock, T. S. Brown, Cornelius Mandeville, Augustus W. Pingree, William Lambert; Stewards, A. W. Pingree, T. S. Brown, John E. Crouhan, Moses A.

Snyder, William Devausney, David Jenkins, Edwin R. Johnston, C. A. Rutan, W. A. Spear; Superintendent of Sunday school, Abner Dexter. There are one hundred and fifty-five communicants of the church and one hundred and ninety-nine scholars in the Sunday-school.

Civil Organization.—The pioneer election for township officers for Franklin township was held April 14, 1874, at which time the following officers were elected: Township Committee, C. F. Underhill, Hiram Van Winkle, Jacob Kierstead, William E. Smith and Henry B. Duncan; Town Clerk, Theodore Mallaby; Assessor, S. Dailey, M. D.; Collector, James H. Osborn; Overseer of the Poor, Abraham Tuers; Chosen Freeholders, Silas C. Hay and Alexander Phillips; Justices of the Peace, Alexander Phillips and Henry B. Duncan; Constable, John S. Van Riper.

The following is a complete list of the township committee, town clerks, assessors, collectors, overseers of the poor, chosen freeholders, justices of the peace and constables from 1875 to and including 1884.

Post-Offices.—The mail facilities of Franklin date back to about 1840, prior to which time the inhabitants had to go to Belleville for the transaction of postal business. From 1855 to 1869 a mail-bag was carried from Newark to Belleville and Franklin by James Ackerman, who made the journey once a day. The North Belleville mail was left at H. Van Winkle's store, which stood on the northwest corner of River and Quarry roads, on the site of the store now kept by George Ward, and letters were distributed from thence. The first regularly appointed postmaster at Avondale was Silas Condit, who succeeded to Van Winkle's store. In March, 1876, Alexander Phillips was appointed postmaster, and the office was removed to his store, on the opposite corner. In January, 1883, John H. White received his appointment, and the office was removed from Phillips' store to the Avondale Railroad Station, where Mr. White performs the triple functions of postmaster, station agent and telegraph operator.

The first post-office in Franklin village was located on Bridge Street, in the building now occupied as a residence by Col. L. H. Rowan, and designated of late as "Hawthorn Cottage." William and Sebastian Duncan were the earliest postmasters. About 1864 the office was removed to Pomeroy's store, on Passaic Avenue, where it remained until 1884, when Leonard Rusby was appointed postmaster, and removed the office to his store, on Franklin Avenue, opposite William Street.

Hotels.—The first hotel in the township was the old Franklin House, opened about 1850 by Richard Booth, in the place now known as Military Hall, corner of William and Elm Streets. Mr. Booth died in 1871, and his widow continued the hotel business until her death in 1878, when it was leased by Mr. John Dooley of Newark. He conducted the house successfully until the expiration of his lease, in April, 1883, when he retired from the business, but in the fall of that year took the old Van Cortlandt mansion, in Belleville, where he now resides. Mr. Frederick Carlisle, the present proprietor of the Franklin House, succeeded Mr. Dooley in the fall of 1883.

A new hotel building was erected by Michael Gorman in the winter of 1883, on the corner of Washington and Grant Avenues, and is now kept by him, affording the necessary accommodations.

Turner's and Schueng's hotels are in the quarry region, near the North Belleville bridge.

Railroad Stations.—There are three railroad stations within the township limits, viz.: Avondale, Stitt's and Franklin. When the road was completed, in 1865, there was but one depot, which stood on the site of the present one at Stitt's. This was destroyed by fire, and replaced by a neat stone building, for the construction of which the commuters, in connection with one or two public-spirited citizens of the place, subscribed the necessary amount of money, and now bear a large share of the cost of maintaining the station.

Highways.—The river road and the old road to Newark, which passes by School-House No. 4 and the Methodist Episcopal church, and so on toward the Belleville reservoir, are the two original roads laid out by the first settlers of the county. The road to Bloomfield is also an old road, dating from the early part of the eighteenth century. Many new streets have been opened within a period of twenty years, by which much valuable property has been made available for building purposes. Among these improvements may be briefly mentioned the extension of Washington Avenue by the county road board to the Passaic County line, forming a beautiful drive of four miles in a direct line from Mount Pleasant Cemetery, Newark, and macadamized as far as Avondale. Crossing this avenue and running east and west, have been opened on the Satterthwaite estate, Grant Avenue and Nutley Avenue, from the Passaic River to Passaic Avenue; Highfield Lane, from Washington Avenue to Passaic Avenue; Chestnut Avenue from Passaic to Whitford Avenue; and Whitford Avenue, from Grant Avenue to Stitt's Station. Mr. J. Fisher Satterthwaite has had plans prepared for still greater improvements on the same tract of land, which will open beautiful sites for elegant residences. Walnut Street, formerly Jerolamon's Lane, was opened from Nutley Avenue to Quarry Road by Mr. George R. Hill, who has built several valuable cottages along its line. The street has been legally extended southerly to Washington Avenue along the east side of the railroad, but has not yet been opened to the public travel.

An appropriation of fifteen hundred dollars was made in the spring of 1884 for the purpose of macadamizing Quarry Street from the school-house to Washington Avenue and a contract was made on October 15th of that year for the carrying out of this improvement.

Prominent Residences.—The handsome residences of Messrs. John W. Stitt, William H. Whitford and William H. Boardman are on the south side of Grant Avenue, on the crest of the hill. On Highfield Lane, from whence is obtained an extensive view, reaching across the Bergen Hills, and taking in both margins of the Passaic River from Paterson to Newark, and on the northwest embracing the lovely rural scenery across the valley of the Yantacaw to the Orange Mountain range, are the residences of the Rev. W. R. Nairn and of L. G. Hopkins, Esq. On Nutley Avenue are two quaint cottages of the old English style, in one of which Col. H. G. Prout resides. Mr. George R. Hill owns a pretty cottage on the northeast corner of Washington and Grant Avenues. Henry B. Duncan has a large house, with fine surroundings, fronting on Elm Street, and near the Essex Mills. L. W. Duncan has a nice property and capacious house on the north side of Franklin Avenue, near Mill Street.

The "Enclosure" is a private park of eight or ten acres in extent, lying west of Passaic Avenue and bounded by the Yantacaw River on the west and Vreeland Avenue on the north. Within it are the residences of James M. Wheeler, James R. Hay, George W. Synonds, Miss Storey and George H. Whipple, the latter being an old stone house believed to be of ante-Revolutionary date.

Bridges.—The county maintains several bridges in this township; of which the following are the principal ones:

A wooden bridge over Third River, on Franklin Avenue, built in 1872; repaired and iron beams laid in 1883.

Iron bridge on the old road to Newark, built in 1871, to replace an old wooden one.

A new wooden bridge across Third River, on a new avenue from Franklin Avenue to the old road, intended ultimately to be laid through to Washington Avenue. This bridge was completed in 1883, and cost the county four thousand five hundred dollars including the approaches.

An iron bridge on Bridge Street, near Stewart's mill, the principal approach to the village of Franklin, built in 1870.

A stone arched bridge on Vreeland Avenue, near the old mill site, and another over the race-way.

A wooden bridge on Passaic Avenue, near the estate of Abraham Stager, rebuilt in 1883.

An arched bridge over the stream at the old mill-pond, foot of Povershon Hill.

The North Belleville bridge, crossing the Passaic, is spoken of in the chapter devoted to roads and bridges in Essex County.

Estates and Families.—Reference has been made in this chapter to a vicinity called "Povershon Hill." By this name it is generally known by the present residents of the township, although numerous inquiries by the writer failed to elicit from old inhabitants any information as to the origin of the name, many believing it to be derived from the Indians. Ultimately he received from a gentleman who spent his boyhood in the vicinity the following version of a story, which indicates rather plainly that the word is a corruption from the French language. About three-quarters of a century ago a Frenchman, whose name has dropped from his recollection, resided near the foot of the hill, and among his livestock was a favorite pig, which he had tended with great care. One quiet Sunday morning master piggy got astray from his domiciliary sty, and the Frenchman ran through the neighborhood making anxious inquiries for his missing porker, and vehemently exclaiming at frequent intervals, "O, mon pauvre cochon!" The risibilities of the natives were excited by the violent gesticulations and tearful cries of the unfortunate owner of the pig, and a corrupted form of the exclamation "O, mon pauvre cochon!" soon became popular in designating the neighborhood in which he lived.

The fine estate known as "Nutley" is situated north of Nutley Avenue, running from the banks of the Passaic River, where it has a breadth of about one-quarter of a mile, westerly to Passaic Avenue, embracing an area of one hundred and forty-four acres. It is owned by the heirs of the late Thomas W. Satterthwaite, who purchased the property in April, 1844. The house is a square, roomy stone building, of three stories, surrounded by an extensive lawn, sloping down to the river-bank. It was built by Peter Crary, a New York merchant, and at one time mayor of that city. He gave the property to his son-in-law, James Morris, one of the originators, and for a time president of the Paterson and Hudson River Railroad, now the main line of the Erie system in New Jersey. From him the estate was purchased by Mr. Satterthwaite, and has since remained in possession of the family, and is the home of Mrs. Satterthwaite, her son, J. Fisher, and Mrs. Condit and family.

A little north of the old homestead is another fine residence, in which the family of the late James S. Satterthwaite resides.

The great-grandfather of the present generation came from Lancashire, England, early in the eighteenth century, and settled in Charleston, S. C. Subsequently he removed to New York, and engaged in mercantile business. A son, Thomas Wilkinson, born in that city, married Catherine Bache (died 1854), daughter of Theophylact Bache, one of the original members and an early president of the New York Chamber of Commerce. Her mother was a daughter of Andrew Barclay, after whom Barclay Street, New York, was named. Their son, Thomas Wilkinson Satterthwaite, was born in October, 1797; married, 1837, Ann Fisher Sheafe, of Portsmouth, N. H., then living with her brother at No. 7 Broadway, New York, where the marriage was celebrated. He was widely known in the mercantile circles of New York, and had been for many years prominently connected with the Board of Underwriters of that city. He died in 1879, his wife and five children surviving him.

James S. Satterthwaite was born in 1840; married, 1865, to Joannie Lawrence Buckley, of Troy, N. Y., and later of Newark, and sister of Mrs. Robert Ruthertford, of Bergen County.

John Fisher, unmarried.

Thomas E., a physician practicing and living in New York.

Elizabeth Wentworth, married to John S. Condit, who died in 1808, leaving two sons, — Wentworth S. and John.

Sarah F., married to Rev. W. R. Nairn, the rector of Grace Episcopal Church, Franklin.

James S. Satterthwaite died in August, 1884, and the obsequies were observed at "Nutley" on the 9th of that month, where many sorrowing friends and a large concourse of people paid their last respects to their beloved friend and neighbor. Services were conducted by Rev. — Abbott, of Christ Church, Belleville, assisted by Rev. W. R. Nairn, of Grace Church, Franklin, after which the remains were interred at Belleville. The pall-bearers were N. P. B. Jeffreys of East Hampton, L. I., N. W. S. Catlen, Clayton Platt, Ferdinand Moatz (president of the Great Western Insurance Company), Theodore Bleecker (president of New York Mutual Insurance Company), — Coombs (president of the Commercial Insurance Company), James Lawson (of the Universal Insurance Company of London), Joseph Kingsland, J. R. Kingsland, J. R. Hay, and George H. Whipple.

John B. I. Robison, late proprietor of the quarries known by his name, was a man of considerable prominence in Essex County. He died Oct. 6, 1884, at his residence, on Grant Avenue. Mr. Robison was born in Scotland, and came to this country with his parents when he was but four years of age. For several years he was engaged in the manufacture of fertilizers in Newark, and was also manager of a chemical and phosphate manufacturing company in Brockville, Ontario, where he spent a large portion of his time. He once represented the Eighth Ward and Belleville district in the Legislature, and was the projector of the Newark ship canal and president of that company. Mr. Robison was fifty-three years of age at the time of his death. He left a wife and two daughters.

The Medical Profession of Franklin.—The only permanent physician the township has ever had is Dr. Selfrine Dailey, who is a native of the western part of New York State. (See medical chapter in this work.)

The Sandstone Quarries.—The largest industry in the township is that of quarrying and cutting stone, in the village of Avondale, of which it may be said it is a "village of derricks." Its quality and superior value as a building material has been appreciated for more than a century, and there is scarcely a square mile of territory throughout the whole region that is available or in the slightest degree promising upon which a prospecting hole or quarry has not been sunk. The building-stone from this region presents many shades of color, ranging from a rich reddish-brown, with well defined markings, to a flat gray of uniform color. The red, of which the court-house in Newark and many other buildings in the county are fair examples, is not so highly esteemed by builders as the fine gray stone, which is now being extensively quarried at Avondale. The cost of quarrying greatly increases with the distance below the natural surface, and few excavations have been made in this State which exceed seventy-five feet in depth, although they are pushed further forward at angles with the dip of the rock, while millions of cubic feet of fine rock lie under the feet of the workmen.

The earliest opening of which any positive information can be obtained was on the property of John King, whose two sons came into the inheritance jointly. The estate then included all the land now or lately owned by Capt. Hancock, Edwin Cadmus, Dr. William H. Conover and Alexander Hays, and ran from the river-front back to the old road leading from Franklin village to Newark. On the death of their father the brothers, John and Abraham, divided the property between them, the division line being a small brook which now forms the boundary between Belleville and Franklin. During the Revolutionary war Abraham King had a tannery and a shoe factory on the northern part of the property, and supplied shoes to Washington's army. Mr. Edwin Cadmus, whose wife is a grand-daughter of Abraham King, has a small house in the rear of his residence which is constructed entirely of material taken from the old shoe factory. About the beginning of the present century the two brothers opened a quarry on the line of the brook above referred to, and from it excavated the stone of which the principal walls of the City Hall in New York were built. Abraham found the shoe business more remunerative than stone-quarrying, and relinquished the excavation of his side of the line, where, there is no doubt, a fine quality of brown stone lies awaiting capital to develop it. John also tired of the quarrying business, and all that is now discernible of the original quarry is a deep ravine, overrun with brushwood and trees of over half a century's growth. Abraham H. King died about 1854, at the advanced age of ninety years. His brother preceded him to the grave. The only living representative of the family is Mrs. Edwin Cadmus. The old house was a substantial stone building, twenty-six feet square, with a frame addition on the south side. It has been the property of Dr. William H. Conover, of Newark, for twenty-five years, and was occupied by him as a summer residence. One night in the early part of August, 1884, the old landmark was destroyed by fire, presumably by tramps, as the house had been closed for two or three weeks.

BELLEVILLE STONE COMPANY.—Deep in the low hills, lying a few hundred feet from the river, are four of the most important stone quarries in the State. The newest is the property of the Belleville Stone Company, and was opened in 1881. Since that time a very large quantity of superior gray stone has been taken out and shipped to market. This quarry is sunk to a depth of about sixty feet, and a ledge of hard rock about ten feet thick is being rapidly cut out and sent to the dock, which skirts the edge of the quarry.

The lifting apparatus in each case is a large derrick, upon which immense compound wire-ropes tackle is used, the rope passing through inclosed boxes to a pair of drums, which are attended by a boy and geared to a hoisting-engine. Obedient to the signals of the men at work almost an eighth of a mile away, the boy stops and starts his engine and moves the immense loads up the abrupt walls of the quarry.

A pump with an outlet of four inches serves to rid the quarry of water in a few hours each morning. The rock is cut to required dimensions on the spot and shipped by boat to its destination.

The officers of the Belleville Stone Company are Robert Elin, president; Joseph Spurr, vice-president; William Kitson, secretary and treasurer. Mr. Andrew Barr is the superintendent of the work, and he has about seventy-five men employed.

THE PHILLIPS QUARRY.—The Jerolamen property became divided among the young branches of the family, and Abraham came into possession of the portion lying south of the Quarry Road. He opened the quarry in 1810 and worked it until 1840. The stone of which Fort Lafayette, at the New York Narrows, is built was taken from this quarry and furnished by him. It was subsequently worked by William H. Harris and a partner. In 1846-47 the property was purchased by Alexander Phillips, and has since been worked by him and his sons. They saw and cut their own stone, their yard being the only one in the district furnished with a steam saw for stone-cutting.

JOYCE QUARRY.—Adjoining Robison's quarry on the south is the more recent excavation of W. J. Joyce. The work is going on in the same ledge of rock, and the formation at this point seems to peculiarly favor the getting out of long square stones, which are in great demand. This quarry was opened about 1864 by the Passaic Quarry Company, costing one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. The company worked it for a few years, when it went into the hands of William Joyce and John Wright. The latter withdrew and the firm became William Joyce & Son. In 1878 the elder Joyce retired, and his son, William J., has since worked the quarry.

HOCHER BROTHERS' QUARRY.—A new quarry was opened near Stitt's Station in the fall of 1885. Messrs. Hoher & Brother, of Newark, being obliged to abandon their quarry on Ridge Street, in that city, owing to the refusal of a neighbor to sell his property, went to Avondale, and after prospecting considerably, bought a large piece of property west of Washington Avenue and north of Stitt's Station.

They broke ground immediately, and found close to the surface a ledge of fine-grained sandstone, which they have since developed into a promising quarry.

The stone is slightly darker than that which comes from the quarries near the river, and it is much more dense. The owners have built a good road running from their property to their new dock on the Passaic River, and have also erected a twenty-ton derrick to supplement the small one at the quarry.

Manufactures.—Next in importance to the stone industry is that of the woolen manufacture, which a few years ago was much more extensively engaged in than at present.

THE ESSEX WORKS, of which L. W. and Henry B. Duncan are the proprietors, were started in 1852 by William Duncan and his son, L. W. Duncan. A part of the extensive brick buildings occupied by the firm were erected in that year, and the remainder in 1864, at a cost of seventy-five thousand dollars. The machinery consists of five sets of cards, sixteen hundred spindles and twenty-eight looms, all driven by steam-power, and giving employment to one hundred hands. The chief products of the works are fancy flannel goods and woolen blankets.

HENRY B. DUNCAN.—Henry Duncan, the grandfather of the subject of this biography, was born in Dunfermline, Scotland, and in the year 1835 emigrated to the United States. He was united in marriage to Mary Livingston, whose children were Lawrence, Isabella, Sebastian, William, Robert, John, Jane, Elizabeth, Magdalene and one who died in childhood. William, of this number, was born Jan. 25, 1804, in Dunfermline, and when a lad of ten years removed to Ramsbottom, England. In 1826 he emigrated to America, and settling at Belleville, engaged in the trade of block-printing at the Belleville Print-Works, which trade he had previously acquired at the Grant Print-Works, in England. At a later date he removed to Fall River, Mass., and from there to Staten Island, where he accepted an engagement as foreman of the Staten Island Print-Works.

William Duncan married Catherine, daughter of William and Mary Benson, of Belleville, and had two sons.—Livingston W., born Aug. 4, 1828, in Bloomfield, N. J., and Henry B., whose birth occurred Jan. 15, 1840. Mr. Duncan, in 1825, in connection with his brothers and a partner, erected print-works at Franklin, N. J., and two years later started a woolen mill at the same point. In 1855 he built the mill which is at present operated by his sons in Franklin. His death occurred Jan. 22, 1877. His wife survives and resides at Franklin. Henry B. Duncan received a substantial education in Franklin and at the Seymour Classical Institute, in Bloomfield. He subsequently entered his father's mill, and on becoming familiar with the various departments of the business, was admitted, at the age of twenty-two, to a partnership. In connection with his brother, he is now proprietor of the business. He was, in September, 1864, married to Annie M., daughter of Silas Young, of Sussex County, N. J., and has two children, a daughter,—Millie Livingston, and a son, William Livingston. Mr. Duncan has been as a Democrat interested in local political measures, and for ten years acted as treasurer of the township of Franklin. His interest in the cause of education has prompted him to serve for fifteen years as trustee of the schools of the township. He is a member of the Reformed (Dutch) Church of Franklin, and superintendent of the Sunday-school of that church.

in 1738, removed to New York at the close of the Revolutionary war and came to Essex County in 1796. The second Joseph was born in New York in 1792, and at an early period of life was engaged in milling enterprises. In 1812 he embarked in the manufacture of hand-made paper at the old Madison Mill, and in 1836 erected the Passaic Mills, which were managed by him until his retirement, in 1856. His sons, Joseph

Henry B. Duncan

THE UNDERHILL MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S WORKS are situated on Third River, and were built in 1840, and known for many years as the Harrison Mills. They were originally built and operated by Sebastian, William and John Duncan. The old buildings were burned down, and rebuilt in 1878 by Mr. Charles F. Underhill, who is now the manager of the concern. The goods produced here are chiefly articles of gentlemen's underwear of cotton and wool.

THE PASSAIC MILLS, on the north bank of Yantacaw (or Third) River, is devoted to the manufacture of fine writing-paper, fleet, bond and check papers of the various grades. The proprietors are Joseph and Richard Kingsland, sons of Joseph Kingsland, whose father, Joseph, was born in Kingsland, Bergen Co., and Richard, were both engaged with him in the business, and on his relinquishing an active life they united in partnership, and have since carried on the manufacture, enlarging the facilities by adding to the buildings and adding improved machinery by which they are enabled to produce a superior quality of goods. The mill, including the machinery, is valued at sixty-five thousand dollars, and has a capacity of two tons of paper per day, giving employment to an average of sixty persons.

The old mill in which their father commenced business was destroyed by fire in 1873. In the summer of 1884 a capacious store-house was erected. This is a stone-building, twenty-five by sixty feet and two stories high. This mill is in Acquackanonk township.

but its proximity to Franklin, affording employment to Franklin people, renders it virtually a local enterprise.

THE YANTICO MILLS are a fine mass of brick buildings, four and five stories in height, which were built in 1866 by Mr. John W. Stitt, and were operated by him in the manufacture of all kinds of woollen goods until 1875, when they came into the possession of the late Alexander T. Stewart, of New York. Mr. Stewart kept these mills actively at work until his death, after which they were operated by Judge Hilton, but were shut down by him in 1889, and have since remained idle. When in full operation they gave employment to from two hundred and fifty to three hundred persons. The buildings were put up in time of high prices, and were very costly. All the machinery, engines and boilers are retained in their places, and care is taken of them by the superintendent, Mr. Martin Geipel.

An old mill stood years ago at the foot of the large mill-pond north of the road running up Povershou hill. Some forty years ago it was occupied as a grist mill by John Duneau. It was afterwards converted into a turning shop by a man named Topping. The mill was destroyed by fire in 1868, and has not been rebuilt. The property is owned by Mr. John Rusby. The water which supplies the mill comes chiefly from a spring at the upper end of the mill-pond, which boils up about three feet in diameter, besides several small springs furnishing a continuous supply of water.

THE AVONDALE GREEN-HOUSES, in Walnut Street, were built in October, 1878, by G. A. Riker. They are covered by about twelve thousand feet of glass, and consist of several separate houses for the growth of various kinds of flowers, bulbs, etc., the business consisting wholly in cut flowers for the New York market. In 1879 the concern passed into the hands of Mr. C. R. Ellis, of New York, who is now the owner, and Mr. Edward Salyer was appointed as superintendent in April, 1884. Improvements to the amount of one thousand dollars were made on the property during the year 1884.

THE WASHINGTON AVENUE NURSERY is a new enterprise, started by Mr. William Conover in the fall of 1883. The property consists of two acres of land under cultivation, two green-houses, each sixteen by one hundred feet, with a two-story office building, sixteen by thirty-two feet. Mr. Conover raises plants and hardy shrubs, and makes a specialty of cut flowers.

THE YANTACAW ICE COMPANY—Another important industry is the cutting, harvesting and subsequent transportation of the ice crop, from the large pond east of the Passaic Mills. The company was incorporated in 1868, but the business and property have been controlled for six or seven years past by the Messrs. Kingsland. The pond has an ice surface of about sixteen acres, and will yield twenty thousand tons of ice annually, giving employment to a large number of hands.

Societies.—THE FRANKLIN ARCHERY CLUB was organized June 16, 1878, with Mrs. J. S. Condit as president; Miss Satterthwaite, secretary and treasurer; Mr. J. R. Hay, superintendent. Soon after the organization the interest in archery began to decline, and the club took hold of the new and favorite game of lawn tennis. Spacious grounds on the Satterthwaite estate, adjoining Stitt's Station, were placed at the disposal of the club, and tennis courts were laid out. The club grew in membership, including on its roll the names of nearly all the society families of Franklin, Avondale and vicinity. In 1884 the grounds were greatly improved, and a new dirt court was constructed, making five courts in all. The club has a membership of sixty-four, many of whom are expert tennis players.

The present officers are Mrs. L. Y. Hopkins, president; John Greenough, vice-president; Rev. W. R. Nairn, master of grounds; W. H. Boardman, master of games; Harry D. Carryl, treasurer; Managers, Mrs. W. H. Boardman, Mrs. J. S. Condit, Mrs. Joseph Kingsland, Mrs. J. Roger Kingsland, Mrs. H. G. Prout, Miss M. L. Storey, and the officers ex-officio; secretary, H. G. Prout.

GRANITE COUNCIL, No. 51, ORDER OF UNITED FRIENDS.—The only lodge or secret society for mutual benevolent purposes in the township is this council of the comparatively new order of United Friends. It was projected by Messrs. C. M. Oxford and A. M. Halladay, both of whom were already connected with the order. On the evening of Dec. 9, 1882, at the residence of one of the brethren, the council was formally instituted, with a membership of twenty-six, as follows: R. W. Booth, Henry A. Connolly, Cornelius Cramer, William H. Cramer, John Corb, Anzi Coeyman, William T. Coeyman, Dr. S. Dailey, John Dooley, Francis George Eyers, P. F. Guthrie, A. P. Garrabrant, Martin Geipel, L. G. Hampton, Jacob Kierstead, Henry Knab, Jr., C. P. McGrath, A. H. Mandeville, Leonard Rusby, Joseph Stratt, G. W. Symonds, C. F. Underhill, J. P. Van Winkle, J. H. Van Winkle.

The first officers were L. G. Hampton, Chief Councilor; R. W. Booth, Recorder; G. W. Symonds, Financier; Dr. S. Dailey, Treasurer; J. P. Van Winkle, Prelate; Richard W. Booth, Marshal; Anzi Coeyman, Guardian; A. P. Garrabrant, Sentinel; C. F. Underhill, J. P. Van Winkle and Martin Geipel, Trustees; C. F. Underhill, C. M. Oxford and A. M. Halladay, Past Chief Councilors. The two last named were admitted by card. At the December election the same officers were elected, with the exception of the recorder, who was Leonard Rusby. At the last annual report of the financier the total membership in the three classes was fifty-eight, the amount of insurance covered being one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, or an average of two thousand one hundred and fifty-five dollars each member.

The officers of the council for 1884 are as follows:

L. G. Hampton, C. C.; Jacob Kierstead, V. C.; John P. Van Winkle, Prelate; Dr. Bailey, Treasurer; George W. Symonds, Financier; C. M. Oxford, Recorder; William H. Van Riper, Marshal; William H. Cramer, Guardian; David Whitehead, Sentinel, and Messrs. Underhill, Oxford and Halladay, P. P. C's. The trustees for 1884 were C. F. Underhill, George S. Coe and Jacob Kierstead, and the Medical Examiner, Dr. S. Bailey, who has acted in that capacity since the first steps were taken to organize the council.

Meetings are held at Rusby's Hall on the second and fourth Fridays of each month.

Mercurial Well.—A curiosity exists on the premises of John Sandford, in Franklin Street, in the shape of a well which freezes or thaws uniformly with the temperature on the surface. The well is about forty feet deep, and its freezing every time a cold snap came on caused so much inconvenience to the family that Mr. Sandford had it inclosed and a pump set in it. This, however, had but little effect. The water in the well still froze, and the pump was at such times useless, and was taken out. In summer the water is of the ordinary temperature. The well has been dug over twenty years, and has always exhibited this peculiarity, while other wells on adjacent property are not so capricious.

Valuation and Appropriations.—The valuation of taxable property returned by the assessor for 1884 was as follows: Real estate, $493,650; personal estate, $28,150; deductions for indebtedness, $6,800; total valuation assessable, $515,000.

The appropriations voted for at the town election in 1884 were: Road tax, $100; side-walk tax, $300; for support of the poor, $900; incidentals, $500; and other incidentals to be paid out of funds held by the treasurer, $500.

CHAPTER LIV.

CLINTON TOWNSHIP.¹

Location, Boundary, Derivation of Name and First Officers.—This is one of the south border townships of Essex County, and was organized as such by act of the State Legislature, April 14, 1835, and is bounded on the north and west by South Orange township, on the east by the city of Newark, and on the south by Union County. The township was named in honor of De Witt Clinton, the great Erie Canal Governor of the State of New York. The township officers elected in accordance with the act of the Legislature were as follows: Moderator, Moses Osborn; Town Clerk, Nathaniel R. Brown; Assessor, Jonathan T. Squier; Collector, David Tichenor; Township Committee, Alvah Sherman, Obadiah Meeker, Lewis Pierson, Ezra Durand and James Van Houten; Chosen Freeholders, Samuel Baldwin and John S. Osborn; Overseers of the Poor, Daniel Squier and Samuel H. Gardner.

Topography.—The topography of the township is varied and pleasant. The land slopes south and east until it reaches the Newark meadows. The surface is also broken by an agreeable succession of hills, of sufficient elevation to afford pleasant landscape views from their summits. From the western side of the township can be seen, some two and a half miles distant, the long range of the First, or Orange Mountains, and from an elevation near the centre of the township, Newark Bay, New York, Brooklyn and Long Island is presented to view in a beautiful landscape. The roadways of the township are mostly Telfordized, affording pleasant and beautiful drives. Elizabeth River flows through the township from north to south, near the beautiful village of Irvington, and on it are three lakes, or ponds, the water of which was formerly utilized for driving machinery, and are known as Belcher's, Durand's and Drake's Ponds, and the dams are now kept up for ice harvest during the winter season.

Previous to the occupation of the township by white settlers, this territory was an undistinguished waste in a trackless wilderness. A thick growth of timber covered the hills and valleys of what are now the fair fields and beautiful garden-spots of Clinton township. As late as 1809 wild beasts were quite plenty, and relies of those hunting days are still to be found in the Chapman family.

Pioneer Settlers, Land Owners and Incidents.—To Daniel T. Clark, Esq., of South Orange, we are indebted for a search of the original records, which has brought to light the names, location and quantity of land of the pioneers of what is now the township of Clinton,—

John Brown, senior, had, among other lands, "Forty acres of upland beyond Elizabeth Town River, 40x20 ch., Robert Dalglish, north; Common land, west and south; East branch of Elizabeth River, east."

The will of John Brown, dated Dec. 17, 1680 shows that he gave to sons, Joseph Brown and Thomas Brown, forty acres beyond Elizabeth River, as "bounded in my Patent, equally to be divided between them." He also names daughters Mary Pierson, Hannah Riggs (wife of Joseph), Phébe Dodd, Elizabeth Freeman and Esther, unmarried. His son, Daniel Brown, executor, and "loving brother Ephraim Burwell, and my loving son, John Brown, to be my overseers."

John Brown, Jr., had, in addition to other tracts, Twenty acres beyond the two-mile Brook, joining to his first and second division, 19x18 ch., bounded with John Curtis, north; Two-mile Brook, east; his own land, north; and Thomas Pierson, south.

His Home lot contained six acres, and was bounded by Edward Riggs, south; Samuel Harrison, north; Common fence, east; Highway, west. He also had Twenty-eight acres "beyond the two-mile brook, beginning on a swamp side (Wolf Harbor Swamp?), thence up the Hillside 15 ch., and the length 18 ch., to a stake that parts Thomas Pierson and John Brown, John Curtis, north; Seth Tompkins, west; Thomas Pierson, south; and swamp, east." This last boundary indicates that this and the other properties were located in the present limits of Clinton township.

John Curtis had thirty-four acres upland beyond the two-mile brook, on south side 34 ch., on north side 23 ch., bounded by Nathaniel Wheeler and the Brook, east; common land, north; John Brown, Jr., south; and common land, west.

Martin Tichenor had a Home lot containing eight acres, bounded by William Camp, north; by Highways, east, west and south. His will bears date 1681.

Thomas Pierson, Jr., had a Home lot containing six acres, bounded by the Highways, northwest and southwest; Common fence, southeast; and Samuel Lyon, northeast. He also had thirty acres beyond the two-mile brook, forty-one chains in length at the south end, twenty-nine chains at the north end, ten chains in breadth, bounded by common land, west; Thomas Johnson and Highway, east; and John Brown, Jr., north.

Hugh Roberts had for his Home lot six acres, having commons on the south and west; the common fence, east; and Edward Riggs, north. He died 1670. (His will is in the library of the New Jersey Historical Society.) Note—"Stephen Bond, in 1672, married Hugh Roberts' widow, and died in 1677." Congreg. Record.

Edward Riggs had a Home lot containing six acres, being bounded by Hugh Roberts, southwest; by John Brown, common land and Highway. In 1676 he purchased of his brother, Joseph Riggs, a part of the original Riggs homestead, being "Ten rods in breadth and so through the length of my home lot, bounded by William Camp, south; my own land, north; and Highways, east and west."

In 1691, Edward Riggs and wife, Mary, conveyed his home lot, containing six and one-half acres, to John Brown, Jr. It was bounded by the Home lot of John Brown, northeast; Home lot of Mrs. Mary Bond, southwest; Highway, northwest; and Mrs. Mary Bond, southeast.

Samuel Lyon had for his Home lot six acres, bounded by Thomas Pierson, Jr., west; Highway, north; common fence, south; and common lands, east. Also sixty-five acres beyond the two-mile brook, twenty-five chains on the southeast, fifteen chains on the northwest, in length forty-two chains, with Highway, north; Highway to Elizabethtown, east; Henry Lyon, southwest; Thomas John, northwest.

Thomas Lyon, by the general Surveyor, "one House lot, Five acres and a half, Beginning at Thomas Pierson, Junr., thence east and by north eight chains to stake by the Highway; thence north four chains; thence northwest by west ten chains; thence, as the front of the (lots) on the Hill did, to Thomas Pierson, Jr., eight chains; thence south southeast four chains to beginning; bounded by Highways, northeast and south; northwest, with the front of the other lots; and Thomas Pierson, Jr., southwest. Also Forty acres in (on) "Stout Buck Plain" (where was this?), 20x22 ch., bounded southeast, southwest and northwest by common land; and Thomas Staples, northeast."

William Camp had a Home lot containing six and a half acres, besides forty poles, bounded with Elizabeth Riggs, widow of Sergeant Edward Riggs, north, Martin Tichenor south, and Highways east and west.

"March 25th, 1685, William Camp hath adjacent to his second division beyond the two mile brook, on the south side forty-eight rods; bounded with the land of Martin Tichenor on the west side forty-eight rods, bounded by Joseph Johnson west, on the east side seventy-two rods, bounded by his own land east, containing ten acres and three roods, be it more or less, lying for four acres."

De. Micha Tompkins (Deacon?) had a Home lot containing six acres, bounded by his own swamp east, John Baldwin north, Highways south and west; also Fifty-four acres adjacent to the lands he purchased of Mr. Treat, "Beginning at the southeast corner of his land and running as the River runs nineteen chains to tree; thence westerly thirty-nine chains, to Zachariah Burwell's corner; thence northerly thirty-four chains to William Muer's corner; thence along his line thirteen chains, to his other corner, easterly; thence southerly fifteen chains so that his land forms an L; Elizabeth River east, John Denison's gutter south, common land west, William Muer and his own land north."

Thomas Luddington had a Home lot containing six acres; bounded by John Brooks south, Ephraim Burwell north, Highways east and west. He also had nineteen acres, three roods and thirty-two poles, beyond the two-mile brook, on the east nine chains and a half, on the north fourteen chains, on the west fourteen (or nineteen) chains, on the south fourteen chains. "Common land and two-mile brook east, Francis Lindsley and Mr. Crane north, Edward Riggs also Joseph Riggs, and George Day west, Common land and two-mile brook south."

On March 26, 1686, by Town Surveyor, "Three acres —by Highway north, fifty-six rods; The two-mile brook and his own land west, thirty-two rods; Mr. Pierson south, fifty-six rods; Samuel Lyon and John Treat east, thirty-two rods." All of the property owners above named (excepting John Curtis) were living in the same neighborhood, at the extreme south, and southwest end of Newark. As their families increased they naturally required more land upon which to erect new homesteads, and, quite as naturally, they spread out in their immediate locality; this is shown by the above surveys, in the vicinity of the two-mile brook. And further we find families of the same name in our present limits of Clinton township.

On April 3, 1712, a survey for lands was made to John Brown, in the right of George Willocks—one of the Lords Proprietors—on Elizabeth River; "Beginning on Bushy Plain brook, where the path that leads to the saw-mill crosses said brook; thence (1) north, along the path, 20 chains, to the Highway; (2) west and by north, 4° westerly, 10 chains along the Highway to Elizabeth River; (3) down the River one and a half chains, crossing the same west and by north, 4° northwesterly, 12 chains; (4) southwesterly to the beginning; bounded by the Saw-mill path southeasterly, Highway and his own land northerly. Common northwest and southwest, containing twenty-two acres."

In 1718, James Brown had a deed from John Johnston, a Proprietor, for "twenty-five acres on Logg hill, on the westward side of Elizabeth River; Beginning at a corner of Jonathan Pierson; thence (1) N. 60, W. 21.56; (2) N. 54.30, E. 21.50; (3) S. 50, E. 1.50; (4) S. 31.20, W. 4.10; (5) S. 44, E. 13.30, to Elizabeth River; (6) to beginning."

Deed: (1713), Somnan to Roberts.—On July 20, 1713, Peter Sommans gave a deed for seventy-one acres of land to Hugh Roberts.

Beginning at a tree on a small rocky hill; thence (1) south 70° e. 32 to a tree; (2) south 45° west 28½ ch. to William Camp; (3) along Camp north 80° w. 5; (4) north 60° w. 7; (5) north 79° w. 9 to the side of Brushy Plain brook, just by the road that goes to the mountain; (6) up said road w. 55° w. 8 to a tree; (7) north 42 east 22 to beginning, bounded north-west by unsurveyed land; east, unsurveyed land and Theophilus Pierson, deceased; southeast, John Ward, southwest, William Camp and said road.

Deed: Arents to Roberts.—On Jan. 10, 1720, Dr. Jacob Arents conveyed to Hugh Roberts, Sr., fifty acres and one hundred and fifty rods.

Beginning at a certain road crossing Brushy Plain brook; thence (1) north 85° west, 8 ch.; (2) north 42° east, 22 ch.; (3) south 58° e. 25.25; (4) south 45° west 28.25; (5) north 60° west 6; (6) to beginning 7½.

Deed: Tompkins to Roberts.—On Oct. 20, 1724, Micah Tompkins quit-claimed to Hugh Roberts, Sr., fifty-five acres of land adjoining the land I purchased of Mr. John Treat.

Beginning at the southeast corner thereof, and running as the river runs, 19 ch. to a tree, (2) westerly to the land formerly claimed by Zachariah Burwell, 39 ch., (3) northerly 34 to the corner of land formerly claimed by William Muer, late of Newark, deceased; (4) along his line 13 to his easterly corner, (5) southerly 15. The said tract is in form of an L; bounded east by Elizabeth River; south, John Denison's gutter, unsurveyed land, west; William Muer and my own, north.

In 1720 and 1724, Hugh Roberts conveyed lands to Hugh Roberts, Jr., at a place called the Great Swamp by the mountain road, partly on Brushy plain.

The will of Hugh Roberts, May 7, 1737, "being, aged and infirm" names, wife, Mary, sons Hugh, John and Samuel, daughters, Hannah Smith, Abigail and children of daughter, Rebecca Tompkins, deceased.

On March 6, 1718, Thomas Lyon and wife Hannah conveyed to Hugh Roberts, Jr., ten acres, on Brushy plain and Flaggy Swamp.

In presence of

THOMAS LONGWORTH
JEREMIAH CANFIELD,

THOMAS LYON
HANNAH LYONS.

On April 9, 1728, "John Tompkins formerly of Newark, now near Passaic River, 'on the roads on highway to Hanover,'" quit-claimed, in consideration of £17, 10s, paid by my Honored father-in-law, Hugh Roberts, Yeoman, nineteen and twenty-four one-hundredth acres, adjoin to the plantation of my honored father, Michael Tompkins."

Beginning at the corner of the lands of my father, Michael Tompkins, on the west bank of Elizabeth River, (1) No. 46 & odd; (2) south 13 or 44 w. 4.20; (3) south 61 east 37 chains more or less to Elizabeth River; (4) up the river to the beginning.

In 1732-33, Zachariah Hall entered into a bond with Hugh Roberts, Jr., conditioned for the making and maintaining a line of fence between the lands which he had purchased of John Baldwin, and Hugh Robert's, "said fence lying between Wolf Harbor brook and Brushy Plain brook, which lines run from the mountain road on Highway to the land formerly James Brown."

On Dec. 16, 1746, Joseph Roberts, carpenter quit-claimed to Hugh and Daniel Roberts, one styled Yeoman and the other Cooper. All right in the one-eighth part of the appurtenances privilege and commodities, belonging to a saw-mill which was lately built in conjunction between Ezekiel Crane, Samuel Conger, and Israel Crane, on Elizabeth River, bounded by Ezekiel Crane, Job Foster and Jonathan Pierson."

On Oct. 21, 1751—, (endorsed on back 1751, part of the homestead), Hugh Roberts made a deed of gift "to son, Moses Roberts, one-half of my dwelling-house in which I now live; one-half of an orchard; also forty acres on the west side of the Elizabeth River on west end of the tract."

On July 18, 1748, Thomas Lyon of "Short Hills," conveyed "a tract on Elizabeth River and the Road." In this deed the names of Benjamin Parkhurst, Josiah Beach, Thomas Johnson, Robert Hayes, Israel Canfield and Nathaniel Camp appear as adjoining owners.

On Aug. 15, 1747, Ezekiel Crane, joiner, quit-claimed an interest in the mill above-mentioned to Moses Roberts, carpenter.

The following document illustrates the truthfulness of an old adage that troubles may arise in the best-regulated families.

"We, the subscribers, being apprehensive that our son, Daniel Roberts, will, after our death, produce some instruments of writing for the lands we now possess, we hereby declare we have not given him any; and as for any writings for lands in Morris County, we do hereby declare we have not given him or his children any manner of deed, gift or grant for any lands there since I had a deed from him for the land which I have since sold, and there is no writings to hurt the people that bought the land. And we desire all Judges and Jurors to take notice of this our declaration, if the said Daniel Roberts or his children should ever offer to produce any such writings, as they will be fraudulent. As witness our hand this 8th day of October, 1766.

"Signed,

DANIEL ROBERTS.

ABIGAIL X ROBERTS."

"Be it remembered, that on the sixth day of October, 1766, Hugh Roberts and Abigail his wife made oath . . . to the above before me.

Joseph Rogers, Jr."

Hugh Roberts made two wills; one, in 1769, names wife Abigail, son Moses and his mother to have the use of my "negro Tobe." After her death "Tobe to be at liberty to live with Moses or my grandson Daniel. Grand-daughters, Abigail, Hannah and Phebe Roberts. Grandsons, David, Moses and Aaron, sons of my son Daniel."

A subsequent will bears date Oct 9, 1776, in which a similar provision is made for "Tobe," also names grand-daughters, Mary, Sarah and Eunice.

This will was admitted to probate on Nov. 22, 1776.

Other conveyances are made in the name of Roberts, in the years 1750, 1761, 1773, and 8th November, 1788, Jesse Roberts and wife Eunice, conveyed to David Camp one-half of an undivided tract near the great swamp mill, on Elizabeth River described, the west chimney of Stephen Baker's house being one of the land marks.

William Camp, one of the original settlers of Newark. He was prominent in the public duties of a citizen.

Mr. Congar gives names of his sons,—John, born 1662, and at Newark, Samuel, 1669.

"Samuel d. 28th September, 1744, ae. 75. Johanna, his wife, 8th August, 1763, ae. 85. Had Nathaniel, Samuel and Joseph."

The date above given does not correspond with the date of deed for land given to his son Joseph, which bears date Dec. 8, 1744. The deed is in the library of the New Jersey Historical Society (Camp books and papers). We quote:

"To all Christian People to whom These Presents Shall Come Greeting. Know ye that I, Samuel Camp, of Newark, in the County of Essex, and Eastern Division of the Province of New Jersey, Yeoman, as well for the Love, good will and affection which I have and Bear Unto my Loving Son Joseph Camp, of the said Newark County and Province aforesaid Yeoman, . . . and other good and Lawful causes and Considerations. . . . unto him, the said Joseph Camp, my son and assigns, forever. April 12, 1756, an account was opened with Nathaniel Heasen. Various entries are made, and on November 13th appears the following entry:

“ Then Reconned with Nathaniel Heasen, School Master and Balance all the above Accounts.”

Joseph Camp, Esq., died 20th October, 1780, aged 70; by wife Patience had Caleb and Ephraim; by second wife Joanna, widow of Samuel Conger, had Joanna, wife of Elias Beach.

April 17, 1753, Joanna Conger, executrix, and Joseph Camp, executor of the estate of Samuel Conger, conveyed a tract of land to Caleb Camp—late the property of Samuel Conger.

Nov. 24, 1769, Joseph Camp conveyed to son Caleb Camp, “ for 5s, and otherwise gift, and for the better maintenance and livelihood of him the said Caleb . . . twenty-five acres where said Caleb Camp's house now stands . . . running from the line of Samuel Camp to the line of Amos Roberts, and so from the main country road that leads by Caleb Camp's house, far enough in length of claim, from said road, along the line of Samuel Camp and Amos Roberts, to contain twenty-five acres, strict measure; also one hundred acres at Cheapside . . . and two tracts of salt meadow.”

In 1771 and 1772, Caleb Camp purchased five separate interests in the “ Great Swamp Mill.”

Nov. 27, 1780, Ephraim Camp conveyed (equi-claim) to Caleb Camp a tract at Cheapside; also “ the whole of the plantation whereon Caleb Camp lately lived, adjoining the twenty-five acres my father gave by deed of gift to said Caleb. To quit to said Caleb all the remainder of his home lot, adjoining the twenty-five acres; also eleven acres; father bought of Stephen Wheeler.”

In 1796, Caleb Camp entered into an ante-nuptial contract with Abigail Moor—“ my intended wife or her heirs;” on the back of this agreement is endorsed as follows: “ May 15, 1817, received the within articles, such as could be found of them. Rebecca Johnson.”

On the 13th of September, 1813, Caleb Camp made an ante-nuptial contract with Lydia Cooper, a widow from Morris County. They were married by Rev. Thomas Morrell, Oct. 28, 1813.

The first record of the public services rendered by Caleb Camp appears in the town records in 1767; they continue with rare intervals to 1814. Mr. Conger styles him “ an active Whig in the Revolution.”

The minutes of the Council of Safety show that he met with the committee in 1777, at Haddonfield, Bordentown, Morristown, and Princeton; in 1778 at Morristown, Princeton, Trenton, and Hillsborough. He was also a member of the Assembly of New Jersey. Caleb Camp, d., April 9, 1817, a. eighty-five. He had sons,—Joseph W. and David.

Joseph Wheeler Camp, married Sept. 22, 1804, by Rev. S. Thompson, to Julia, daughter of Timothy (?) Ball.

David Camp, son of Caleb, married Hetty Cooper. David Camp died by being accidentally impaled, about 1802-3. He had children (named in petitions to Orphans Court, in 1815), viz.: David Camp, John Webster Camp, Sally, wife of Ira Baldwin, Caleb Camp, Jr., and Fanny, wife of Henry Baker.

The widow, Hetty Camp, on April 9, 1814, was married to Moses Baker, by Rev. Stephen Thompson.

The Camp families had the usual proportions of slaves. Thus, Caleb appears to have had “ Jop ” in 1762 to 1773, “ Ned ” in 1765, “ Cato ” in 1762.

In 1771, William Barnet is charged “ to one Indian Wench, forty pounds.”

Job Camp, a son of Samnel, died about 1796-97.

The following item indicates that he owned one slave at least:

"In supporting the Black Woman, agreed that the Widow Camp pay 1 s. 5d. to 4 s.

The heirs of Job Camp, deceased, to pay as follows.

James Camp's children to pay $\frac{1}{2}$ of 4 s.

Thomas Wilcox died about A. D. 1785. Letters of administration on his estate were issued on the fourth day of March, 1785, to Mary Wilcox and Daniel Roberts.

Amos Roberts appears to have rented the property and boarded.

The Wilcox children consisted of daughters and son,—Mary, who became the wife of Uzal Wilson, Phebe became the wife of Benjamin Blake, and Joseph apparently between thirteen and fourteen years of age.

Amos Roberts appeared to have been in possession of the property about ten years, and in his settlement he charges the estate "to boarding and clothing Sarah Wilcox one year and four months . . . £20 do do Joseph Wilcox seven years and six months, at £16 per year . . . 120

By an award made by David Tichenor and Caleb Camp, Esq., this amount was reduced eight pounds. A map presented herewith is labeled "The Survey and true map of Thomas Wilcox's Estate and the division of the Children."

In one of the field-books of Major Samuel Hayes, is an entry,—“Estate of Thomas Wilcox, beginning at Elizabeth River.”—N. J. Hist. MSS.

The map shows six divisions.

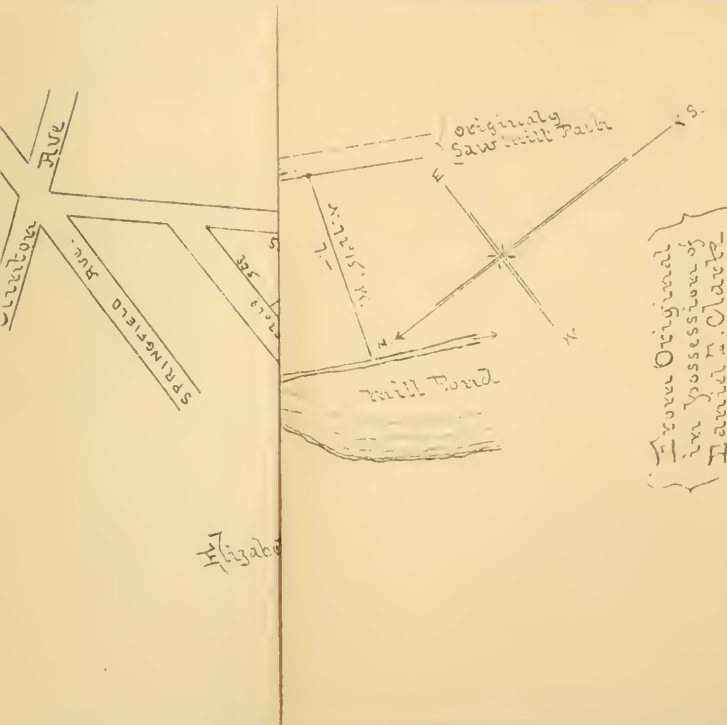

Joseph Wilcox married Hannah, daughter of John Clark (4th) and Comfort (Camp) Clark, his wife, and had children,—Laura D. died, unmarried, and James Clark, m.

Thomas Hayes, Samuel Hayes and David Hayes were severally and jointly interested as owners of land in Clinton township, on the westerly side of Elizabeth River.

Thomas resided on the northwestern corner of Irvington Avenue and Wall Street. Tradition hath it that during the Revolutionary war he was murdered in his barn-yard by a negro,—a camp follower. Mr. Hayes was backing away from the negro, and stumbling, fell to the ground, and was stabbed with a "pitch-fork." A sister of Mr. Hayes saw the transaction, gave an alarm, when the negro was pursued, caught, identified and locked up in prison. While in prison his feet were frozen off. Thomas resided on the northwestern corner of Irvington Avenue and Wall Street. Tradition hath it that during the Revolutionary war he was murdered in his barn-yard by a negro,—a camp follower. Mr. Hayes was backing away from the negro, and stumbling, fell to the ground, and was stabbed with a "pitch-fork." A sister of Mr. Hayes saw the transaction, gave an alarm, when the negro was pursued, caught, identified and locked up in prison. While in prison his feet were frozen off. Afterwards men in disguise broke open the prison, took the murderer out and burned him to death.

Subsequently Elias Osborn and Henry Osborn owned and occupied the place, one residing on the west of Wall Street, and the other between Wall Street and Elizabeth River, both houses being still standing.

VILLAGES AND HAMLETS.

Lyons Farms¹ comes into notice here. It is a thickly-settled agricultural district in the southern part of Clinton township. Here the late Professor Mapes laid the foundation of true, scientific husbandry. Here Dr. J. M. Ward, his son, William Ward, Esq., and P. T. Quinn, Esq., have brought much energy and intelligence to the cultivation of fruit. The grounds of the State Fair are at Waverly, on the borders of the farms.

The settlement of this section dates far back. The descendants of William and Henry Lyons and of Stephen Bond, settlers in the original township of Newark, 1666, early opened farms.

The exact date we cannot find. The oldest house now standing, and now occupied by Mr. William Grummond, was built in 1760. The stone school-house, to which attaches a story of varied interest, is one hundred years old. The Baptist Church, much renovated spiritually and materially, was constituted in 1769, and the first church built in 1783. Sabbath-schools have been sustained for sixty years.

Bound Creek, now by no means imposing, was for a long time the free port of entry for the interior. Here Perriaugners entered laden with merchandise from New York, and landed it, at a primitive date, close by the present bridge crossing the creek on the lower road to Elizabethtown; from thence the goods were transported by wagons and ox-carts as far west as Morristown. In the same creek were launched the Perriaugners, skillfully built in the old Camptown navy yard, but the building and the builders remain unsung for want of a Longfellow.

Camptown at length rises in the woods, and takes its place among the old towns of the State, and was long famous for the generous worship of Bacchus, longer scandalized by strangers, but at last killed in a literary contest about a new name, and honorably buried on the cold night of Nov. 2, 1852, far down beneath the snow, and Irvington, hailed with speech and incident and song, took its place.

But whence the name Camptown, so famous in old debate? William Campe, one of the original settlers of the township of Newark, fixed his residence at the south end of Broad Street, and there, until within a few years the old Camp house was standing. He had three sons,—William, Samuel and Joseph, and one or more of them or their children opened farms on the then wooded site of our present village, accompanied or soon followed by the Roberts, the Balls and the Baldwins, and by their prominence in the settlement gave the name of Camptown to the central part of our present village plot, which, when named, was no more than a tavern, a blacksmith-shop, a grocery and some outlying farms,—the nucleus of our present village.

An effort has been made to connect the place with Washington, and derive its name from his camping-ground by the brook on the east of the village (now known by the unpoetic name of the ditch). The nearest approach of Washington to this place was Washington rock and the ridge of the First Mountain, back of Jefferson village. There, while reconnoitering, he dropped his spy-glass, which his horse slightly injured. It was repaired by Mr. Samuel Durand, the skillful and modest watchmaker of the village.

In the course of time the name of Camptown passed into a byword and a reproach. The wag joked with it and the stranger held it in derision. It was the Nazareth of the county. This was owing, not so much to anything in the place itself as to the surroundings and the incidents of the early roads, not much better than cowpaths, that led to it. Camptown was the rendezvous of the fast and wicked young men of Newark and Orange, the goal of straw-rides and the Gretna Green of dance, frolic and fun. The road to Newark was bad and dangerous. Robbers lurked in the thick woods. A foul murder capped the climax of evil doings, and the hotel was long regarded with horror by the traveler.

Under these circumstances the name became odious. Dark legends arose, some of them as groundless as the long sleep of Rip Van Winkle. Among these we place what is popularly known as "The old legend of Camptown Navy-Yard." The yard was a reality, but it was not located by the bridge on Elizabeth River, but on Vinegar Hill, near the old Osborne and Gale property, midway between Camptown and South Orange. There Perriaugners were moulded and built of oak, pine and chestnut, and launched on Bound Creek, already described. They were built for the New York trade, carried freight and passengers, and made the round voyage usually in three days.

from Paulus Hook the future Jersey City than rich in one house, was managed by a colored man. The boat was small, and carriages and wagons were transported on it after they were taken apart. On that ferry Durand crossed in New York; he found with difficulty the castings, reversed with them and carried them on his shoulder to Jefferson village.

PIONEER MAIL ROUTE.—About this time, the opening of the eighteenth century, the drowsy village of Camptown was started by a new project,—the opening of a new mail route to Philadelphia. The road passed the hotel, down Park Avenue and along Log Hill road, (now Stuyvesant Avenue,) through the Harbor, a name to which there hangs an amusing story, where there was a "relay station." The journey from New York to Philadelphia was in those times made in three days, and the stage-wagons were called "Flying-Machines."

The war of 1812 came and brought sorrow and suffering to this whole section, as well as to almost all other places. Money was exceeding scarce. Business was at a stand still. The stores were nearly empty. Rye flour was the chief breadstuff, and men had in some cases to travel miles through the snow to the stores and carry home their purchases on their shoulder. Some of those men helped to decide that war favorably for America, some of them are still in our midst, and two of their honored widows are still among us, and are recipients of a small pension from the government. The war closed, but sufferings continued. In 1816 there was frost every month in the year, and corn was sold at two dollars a bushel.

PIONEER POST-OFFICE.—In 1826 the first post-office was established in Camptown, and the first post-master was Matthias Ross, Esq. The mail arrived tri-weekly, and the office was conveniently kept in the tavern. At that time there were seventy-five families within one mile of the post-office.

Irvington.—The sound of Camptown, long unpleasant to the new citizens, became painful as progress advanced, and a change of name was proposed. Public meetings followed. Sharp debates fretted the walls of the academy, and logical threats and keen retorts, for which the old villagers are noted, freely passed. Progress triumphed, and the name was changed. In the flush of literary passion, Irvingtown, in honor of Washington Irving, our gentle, tender and humorous American Addison, was chosen as the future name of the town. John Crawford, Esq., was the chairman of a committee appointed to invite the genial essayist to deliver a public address at the christening of his namesake village. He acknowledged the honor, but politely declined the invitation. The Rev. John L. Chapman was then chosen for that office, and the occasion was a joyous one. On the evening of Nov. 2, 1852, the people traveled over the thickly, crusted snow to the Reformed Church, and there, with song and incident and humorous discourse, the new name was imposed, and "Sleepy Hollow," "Wolfert's Roost" and the haunted bridge reproduced in our locality. Changes followed. A literary taste sprang up. Fourierites, lawyers, editors and poets came to reside among us. At Elmwood, the seat of the Home Institute, were held soirées, at which letters and music bore sway, and admitted, under limitations, the light footed dance. The Northern New Jersey Magazine was the birth of this literary awakening, but died too soon.

PIONEER SCHOOL RECORDS AND ACCOUNTS. 1.—Through the efforts of Daniel T. Clark, Esq. (of South Orange), we are enabled to lay before our patrons the following items relative to the pioneer schools of Camptown: The following are the names of some of the pioneer teachers, and the years in which they served:

Bills were paid to a schoolmaster (not named) in 1762, 1763, 1766 and 1783.

In 1774 a charge is made, "Cash paid to the school-house."

In 1773, Samuel Pennington is charged for one quart of rum for the school-house.

The old school-house in Camptown has but a brief record, which we find in a book apparently kept by Caleb Camp in 1808, in which we find a head-line on page 5, as follows: "Caleb Camp account in full against the Camptown school-house."

In this book, under date of 1807, Ebenezer Havens and Jabez B. Baldwin are credited with labor in pulling down the old school-house.

John N. Baldwin is credited by one day drawing stone from the old school-house, two hauds.

Sayres Roberts is credited for the same kind of work, $3.75.

Of the date of the erection of this (old) school-house we have neither record nor tradition. The fact that it was pulled down indicates that its usefulness had passed away, and that a new building was deemed necessary for the purpose.

Various sums of money are credited to individuals on account of the lottery. There is no statement of the losses and gains by this account.

Stephen Jagger is the only person named as having a prize. He is credited by prizes drawn in the lottery, $3.60.

The school-house lot was purchased (probably) of Moses Roberts, as it appears on Jan. 8, 1810, to the credit of Jabez Baldwin, as follows: "paid Moses Roberts for two years' interest on the bond for school-house lot $14.50." Baldwin is also credited by half-day collecting and settling with said Moses, sixty-two and a half cents.

The book further shows that the principal workmen and mechanics employed in building the school-house were Aaron Holden, carpenter; Eleazer Roberts, cutting and hewing timber; Henry Roberts, mason; Uzal Wilson, mason; Edward Ball, mason (apparently); Jeffrey J. Baldwin, shaving shingles and laying floor; Samuel Roberts, painter.

Samuel Roberts is also credited "by work in raising the bell, $3.00."¹

Timothy Osborn is credited with a half-day in raising the steeple for the school-house, fifty cents.

Joseph Tichenor by sawing timber.

Sayres Roberts by sawing timber, and myself (i. e., Caleb Camp?) half-day digging trench, seventy-five cents.

John N. Baldwin is credited with a variety of articles which were used in the building, such as lumber. Among these items the following appears. "Cash for bread and cheese raising, $6.39."

Samuel Baldwin is credited for spirits for the workmen six dollars and twenty-eight cents.

The rate of wages were,—to carpenters, in summer, $1.37½ per day; in November, $1.25 per day; in December and January, $1.00 per day; to masons, $1.12½ per day; to painters, $1.12½ per day.

The rum was charged at 18½ cents per quart.

To a man with a team of horses and oxen, $1.75 to $2.00 per day.

Jonathan Day is credited "by shingles for the school-house, $12.13."

The glass was bought of Israel Beach for $7.21.

Education has steadily advanced. In 1829 there were two small schools in Camptown, one held in the basement of the old Academy, a kind of cellar, and the other in a tailor's shop. The salary of the teacher was about three hundred dollars. In 1845, the Rev. John S. Chapman, pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church, established the Home Institute, a family school for boys and girls, to test his theory of organic education. From that institution four were prepared for college, on their way to the Christian ministry, one became a lawyer, and many are now merchants in all parts of America. In 1870 the present public school building was erected, at a cost of fourteen thousand dollars. Six teachers are employed at an aggregate salary of three thousand seven hundred dollars. In the same year the old academy, a frame building, was burnt, and in 1827 the present one, a good brick structure, was erected by the public and the Free Masons. The basement was used for the public schools, the second story for the lodge room, and the first story for a public room, where religious worship was commonly held for seventeen years.

Slavery.—The territory now included in Clinton was, while connected with Newark, Orange and Elizabethtown, cursed with one foul blot,—the curse of slavery. The acres all about us were tilled by slave hands. "Human chattels" and "mercantable negroes" toiled and sweat under our sun. There were four of them in this vicinity as late as 1846. When the act of 1820, giving freedom to every child born of slave parents subsequent to July 4, 1804, the males on arriving at twenty-five years and the females at twenty-one years of age, was about to go into operation, the cupidity of some masters was strong. One of them tore from their mother two children, her boy and girl, and sent them to the Southern market. They were sold into perpetual bondage. The brain of the mother reeled, and the wild scream of insanity cried to heaven against the crime of involuntary slavery,—the last cry within our borders.

Stone School-House of Lyons Farms.—The school-house situated between the cities of Newark and Elizabeth, on the avenues of Elizabeth and Prospect, stands almost alone to remind the oldest inhabitants of the past. The road (formerly known as Pot-pie lane) was named Prospect Avenue by the venerable ex-Chancellor Halsted, who resides midway between the school-house and Irvington.

To go back further than the present school building, which has stood the blasts of one hundred years, built, as the date now in the belfry testifies, in 1784, would be impossible were it not for the accurate recollections of some of our oldest settlers. Mrs. Grummon, Mr. David Bond and Samuel R. Winans being among the number, the mention of whose names gives confidence in the correctness of their record. The first school-house was a frame building, about the size of the present school-house, which was (as tradition tells us) accidentally destroyed by fire, probably having been built over fifty years, as it was known to have been an old building when destroyed.

The school at that time was taught by Mr. Joseph Lyon, a resident of the Farms, and the possessor of a Princeton collegiate education, which drew the boys from far and near (Camptown included) to graduate. Though Mr. Lyon was for a long time the only teacher, he probably taught but a few years in the old house, as he was relieved thirteen years after, 1797, by George Murray. Preceding Mr. Lyon was Mr. Bellamy, who also taught for a long term of years, and was unquestionably the honored teacher of 1776. Were it not that this was the only school at the time for miles these facts would not have been told by grandparents and remembered by their descendants. The father of the Rev. Robert Canfield, while a mere boy, living with his parents a short distance south of the Presbyterian parsonage, labored with others in preparing stones, which were obtained on Prospect Avenue, near Irvington, from a rock known as "white rock," called so because of its color, and also from a quarry, then worked, a half-mile north-west, which, being of a darker color, resembling the brown stone of Newark, was used to contrast with the light. These stones were rough dressed, and after two years of hard labor the school-house was finished.

In 1797, Mr. Murray, also a resident of the Farms, succeeded Mr. Lyon. While engaged in his school duties, on one occasion, he led all the scholars on the green before the school-house to do honor to Gen. Washington, who was on his way to Elizabeth.

In 1802, Mr. Ross succeeded Mr. Murray, followed two years later by Mr. Crocker, and in 1805, Mr. Ward Foster commenced his services, which were continued for many years.

While but very few of the old school-houses remain to remind us of the past, giving the space they occupied to more commodious and comfortable buildings supplied with ingenious improvements for comfort, yet our school-house of 1784, built so substantially, is to-day, though of ancient style and of small dimensions, no disgrace, either to the builders, who struggled hard for what was then a great enterprise, or to the community, who now honor it for the service it has rendered and for its antiquity.

Churches and Sunday-Schools¹—CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—Although our village (under another name) was not unknown in the early history of Eastern New Jersey, yet it did not contain a church organization earlier than 1829. We should say it had a distinctly-marked religious character, but this was represented and sustained by about a dozen families in the village and in its immediate vicinity, which sustained church relationship with the Presbyterian Churches in Newark, Springfield and Connecticut Farms, and with the Baptist Church at Lyons Farms. From the earliest recollection this had been an outlying mission of those churches, in which were sustained lectures, occasional sermons and an union prayer meeting.

In the month of January, 1829, Miss Ann Rexford, accredited minister of the Christian Church, was invited to visit the place and preach. This she did, without intending at the time to prolong or repeat her visit, but an effectual door was opened to her, and the interest, which was new and remarkable, continued until the organization of this church, and on through its history until the present time.

In the month of September following, seventeen persons, about one-half of whom had been members of other churches in the vicinity, were organized by Revs. Simon Clough and William Lane a branch of the church in New York City.

The interest continuing and increasing, on the 1st of October, 1830, an unanimous call was extended to Rev. Isaac C. Goff to the first regular pastorate of the new organization. He entered immediately upon his work, and on the 24th of the same month organized the First Christian Church of Irvington, independent of any and of all other ecclesiastical organizations. This organization included the branch of the New York church, above alluded to, and twenty-three others, who came in on profession of their faith.

This organization was intended, as its name imports, to represent not any form of church government or any dogma of religious belief, but the whole of Christianity. The church during the fifty-four years of its existence has received into membership three hundred and seventy-nine persons; of these, Rev. Mr. Goff, the first pastor, during three pastorates and covering a period in the aggregate of thirty years, has received two hundred and forty-six persons, and thirteen other pastors, whose terms of service aggregate twenty-four years, have received one hundred and thirty-three persons.

In 1844 their church edifice was erected and dedicated without debt. In 1870 their parsonage was built.

In 1873 their church property was repaired and much improved and freed from all incumbrance. In 1880-83 the church received bequests, amounting to about twelve thousand dollars, the interest of which goes to aid their church work.

Their present number of members is about one hundred and sixty. Their present pastor is Rev. Levi W. Haines.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH¹—The Presbyterian Church of Irvington was organized Feb. 2, 1840, in the school-room over the store of Alvah Sherman. Preaching services and a Sunday-school had been held at this place since June 1839.

At that time churches were legally incorporated, and the officers took the oath of allegiance. Nearly a year elapsed after the organization of the church before the Rev. John M. Staats was called as the first pastor of this church. After six months' service, Mr. Staats resigned the pastorate. No successor was immediately called, yet services were continued by supplies until the summer of 1841, when Rev. John L. Chapman, a graduate of Union Theological Seminary, New York, and then a graduate of the Elizabethtown Presbytery, began to preach for this church, and was soon called to be the pastor. He was ordained at Scroelenbergh, and installed at Irvington, in 1842, and continued as pastor until 1849. After his call efforts were made to erect a church edifice, and the work successfully prosecuted under his direction, which resulted in the erection of the present church edifice, which was dedicated Dec. 28, 1842.

The Rev. I. M. Bruen became pastor in March, 1850, and resigned Sept. 19, 1852. In 1855, Rev. A. B. Taylor was called, and remained with the church three years, and in the summer of 1858, Rev. A. McKelvy became the pastor, and resigned at the close of 1860. The present pastor, Rev. Henry Vehslage, was installed July 23, 1861. The present membership is one hundred and sixty-five, and the Sunday-school numbers one hundred and seventy-five pupils.

IRVINGTON METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH²—This church society was organized in 1845, and connected with Middleville (now Hilton). The church building was originally erected by the Episcopalians, and in the spring of 1847 was sold at sheriff's sale, Mr. Day, the holder of the mortgage, becoming the purchaser. The Rev. Martin Herr, through the advice of Bishop Janes, purchased the property for one thousand dollars. The building was remodeled and dedicated by Bishop Janes.

In 1867 Irvington was made a station, and in the following year was reunited with Middleville. This union continued until 1870, when Irvington was again set off as a separate appointment.

The preachers in charge since the organization of the Irvington Methodist Episcopal Church have been as follows:

John C. McOrnick, 1845; Robert Given, 1846; Martin Herr, 1847; George Hughes, 1848-49; David Graves, 1850; James M. Freeman, 1851; John Faul, 1852; John White, 1853; I. C. Blaine, 1854; John H. Vincent, 1855-56; Martin F. Swaim, 1857; John F. Hurst (now bishop), 1858; Henry A. Butz (now president of the Drew Theological Seminary), 1859; Edwin Day, 1860; William M. Lippincott, 1861-62; Charles R. Snyder, 1863; John Scarlett, 1864-65; Henry M. Simpson, 1866; Robert B. Collins, 1867-68; Jesse S. Gilbert, 1869; Hamilton McBride, 1870; William I. Gill, 1871-73; James O. Rogers, 1874-76; William R. Keifer, 1877-78; Joseph M. Dally, 1879-81; J. F. Andrews, 1882-84. Stewards, Sylvester Bailey, Frank England, Charles W. Harrison, Joseph Walker, W. L. Clawson, E. Berry. Trustees, C. W. Harrison, president; S. Bailey, secretary; Charles Walker, Henry C. Heinisch, John V. Hageman.

This church has suffered much by deaths and removals, and on Jan. 1, 1884, numbered one hundred and ten members. Value of church, six thousand dollars; parsonage, four thousand dollars. The Sunday-school has one hundred scholars and thirteen officers. The superintendent in 1884 was Frederick Carter; Secretaries, G. S. Francisco and Clarence O. Brown; Treasurer, Charles Walker; Librarian, L. Bedell.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF LYONS FARMS³—This church was organized in the stone school-house Jan. 21, 1849. Rev. Halloway W. Hunt, who had been preaching to the residents of the community for nine months, moderated the meeting, assisted by Rev. — Potter, of Newark. Twenty-one members of Presbyterian Churches in Elizabeth and Newark presented their certificates, and were constituted a separate church by adopting a covenant of fellowship and the standards of the Presbyterian Church in the United States.

The original elders of the church were David Bond and Nathan Ford, who were chosen on the 24th of January, and ordained Feb. 11, 1849. June 20, 1849, the building which the congregation continues to use as its house of worship, was dedicated to the service of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; Rev. Halloway W. Hunt, of Newark, offering the dedicatory prayer; Dr. Murray, of Elizabeth, preaching the sermon; Dr. Magie, of the same place, offering the closing prayer; and Rev. Potter, of Newark, the benediction.

At an adjourned meeting of the Presbytery of Elizabeth, held in Lyons Farms on 23d of April, 1850, William F. Garthwaite was ordained and installed as the first pastor of the infant church. Rev. Garthwaite's pastorate ended April 21, 1852, from which time until the installation of Rev. Eliphalet Bosworth, Feb. 14, 1854, the church was served by supplies. Oct. 16, 1855, the feeble and struggling church was again left without a pastor, and the pulpit remained vacant for some four years.

During this time the church was greatly indebted to the interest and labors of Rev. David H. Pierson, D.D., by whose influence a number of the residents of the neighborhood holding their membership in the churches of Elizabeth and Newark, were persuaded to transfer their membership to it. Aug. 6, 1859, the eldership was strengthened by the election of Henry Meeker, Jacob S. Dodd, and James B. Baker. Nov. 2, 1859, Rev. George M. S. Blauvelt was installed over the church as its pastor. Mr. Blauvelt's pastorate, which continued until the last Sabbath in January, 1864, was eminently successful. On the 25th of May following the congregation chose George C. Pollock, a recent graduate of Princeton and a native of Ireland, as the successor of Mr. Blauvelt, and on Nov. 15, 1864, the Presbytery of Passaic met in Lyons Farms for his ordination and installation in the pastorate. Mr. Pollock continued the popular and beloved pastor of the church for seventeen years, the pastoral relation being dissolved Jan. 4, 1882. The present pastor is Rev. John R. Henderson, who was installed April 27, 1882.

There are two other religious organizations in this township,—one a Protestant Episcopal and the other Roman Catholic, both of which are quite small.

THE SABBATH-SCHOOLS OF LYONS FARMS.—During the summer of 1816, Mrs. Elizabeth Ogden and Miss Abby Chandler visited every family in this vicinity, and with prayer and entreaty brought before the community the great importance of the Sunday-school work for the young, desiring the aid and sympathy of God's children in the work.

On Sabbath, August 6th, twelve scholars assembled in the little school-house standing near the present school building at Waverly, with Mrs. Ogden and her fellow worker as teachers.

Prayer was offered, the Scriptures read by the scholars, who were catechised in the primitive style, singing from Watts' "Psalms and Hymns and Spiritual Songs."

"Children in years and knowledge young,
Your parents' hope, your parents' joy,
Attend the counsel of my tongue;
Let pious thoughts your minds employ," &c.

The interest occasioned by the success of this new enterprise had its influence in soon creating the desire for similar schools in different parts of the neighborhood, and in a few weeks Miss Sallie Meeker, daughter of Col. Josiah Meeker, was appointed as director over a school which was organized in the stone school-house, and for many long years she proved her devotion to the cause by earnestly laboring for the children's spiritual growth.

We next associate the name of Mr. Obadiah Meeker, the first gentleman superintendent and teacher in this school, who also for many years expressed by service the deep interest he felt for the young, and long after health failed him for active service did he love to advise and counsel for the school's prosperity.

Later, we find his son Henry following in the same footsteps, as a zealous and efficient worker, the record of whose life of devotion is familiar to the youngest child in our schools.

About the same time a school was organized and held in Mr. Matthew Scott's house and other houses in the immediate vicinity of Evergreen Cemetery. In this school no regular superintendent was appointed, but efficient aid was rendered by the Rev. Lewis Bond, Messrs. Elihu Bond and James Brown, who alternated from time to time in rendering aid both as directors and teachers, Mrs. Scott and Mrs. Tichenor being the first teachers.

Still another gathering of children during the same autumn assembled at the house of Mrs. Grummon, and held the first session. After a few Sabbaths the place of meeting was changed to the home of Mr. Samuel R. Winans, until the building of the red school-house, in 1819, and there continued for many years, with Mr. Winans as its first superintendent, Mrs. Grummon, Mary Lyon, Abby Bond, Mr. Jonathan Winans and Mr. Styles as teachers.

All of the schools were under the superintendency of Mrs. Ogden, who went from school to school to cheer by her bright face and happy Christian life, thankful to God that she could be numbered among the laborers of the vineyard.

Quarterly and semi-yearly gatherings of the schools were held in the stone school-house, as the most central locality, where encouraging words of cheer were spoken to the faithful teachers and scholars, stimulated in their studies by public recitation of Scripture verses, catechism and hymns. The privilege was so much appreciated by the scholars in the different schools that as many as sixteen hundred verses have been rec-corded as a recitation from one of the scholars, learned in one quarter. So many were desirous to recite to their teachers that Saturday afternoon gatherings were introduced to enable all to participate, and not to take from the hour of school on the Sabbath.

The names of Mrs. Daniel Price, Miss Abbie Wilson, and Rachel Cooper, Mrs. Winans, Mrs. Grummon, Mrs. Robinson, Mrs. Brown, Mr. Jonathan Winans, and Thomas Hand are prominent names among the scholars of the primitive schools, of which some are still living.

From these primitive schools we have those associated (at this time) with the Presbyterian and Baptist Churches and the Union School at Waverly.

Never through winter or summer have these schools been discontinued, and they have ever exerted a potent influence over the generations which have been blessed by their instructions, and made stronger and better men and women to meet life's obligations.

Scholars who have grown to manhood, sheltered and nourished by these schools, have assumed responsible relations as pastors, elders and church workers, and have made better neighbors and more useful citizens by their influence.

Noteworthy Persons—CYRUS DURAND.—Prominently identified with the industries of this township and the county was the late Cyrus Durand, one of the most remarkable inventive geniuses of the age in which he lived, or most any other age. Born in 1787; was the second son of John and Rachael (Myers) Durand. His father was of the Huguenot stock, and came to this country after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and settled in Derby, Conn. His grandfather, Samuel Durand, came to New Jersey in 1750, and settled in what is now Jefferson village, then a part of Springfield township. The education of Cyrus was limited, his whole schooling costing but about fourteen dollars. He made up the deficiency by reading all books that he could get hold of. When the Edinburgh Encyclopedia came out Cyrus was among its first patrons. To this work he was greatly indebted for thoughts that subsequently developed into the most useful mechanism of the age in which he lived. At the age of fourteen he began work in his father's shop, soon mastering the arts and sciences taught there. Besides this, he made sleeve-buttons, finger-rings and other goods of a similar character, finding sale for his wares among his near neighbors. He next took up the silversmith trade, there being two men following it in Newark at that time.

At the age of nineteen he took up the trade of clock-making, and invented and made the machine for cutting from solid brass all the gearing, and, in fact, all parts of the clock except the face and bell. At that time he often walked to New York for some little casting that he wanted. Jersey City was then Paulus floock, and the ferrage was nine cents.

He married at the age of nineteen, and removed to Newark, where John Taylor advised him to turn his attention to turning-lathes for brass and iron work and for jewelry. This was the beginning of a line of inventions in lathe and press work that has brought our bank-note engraving to its present high character. From that time onward his life was filled up with inventions,—machines for line engraving, pencil and watch-case ornamenting, etc. One of his singular inventions was the "grammation," a machine on which any sentence could be placed, and the office of each part of speech clearly seen. His prominent work in life, however was his geometrical lathe work for bank-notes. Through his efforts the work has been carried to its highest perfection, which he taught to a few of his assistants. In short, it may truly be said that Cyrus Durand was, when in the prime of life, the inventive genius, the mechanical brains of Newark. He was master of twenty-four different occupations, either of which would afford him a living. He died in 1868, mourned by all who knew him.

HENRY MECKER.—The remote ancestors of Henry Mecker in this country are traced back to William Mecker, who was registered at New Haven, Conn., in 1644, and with his sons Benjamin and Joseph are recorded among the associates who bought the site of the town of Elizabeth, N. J., of the Indians in 1644. His grandfather, Obadiah Mecker, born in 1738 and died in 1828, served through the Revolutionary war as a captain of cavalry, under the command of Gen. Philemon Dickinson, of New Jersey; he was at the battle of Monmouth, and subsequently was made a prisoner, and confined for some time in one of the Jersey prison-ships, near New York.

Henry Mecker's father, Obadiah Mecker, Jr., was born in the township of Elizabeth Feb. 17, 1782, and died Oct. 2, 1855. He was a farmer, and lived an industrious, useful life. He was called to positions of honor and trust in the county and State.

His mother, Jérusha Cook Harrison, was born in the village of Connecticut Farms, N. J., Sept. 25, 1784. For more than sixty years a consistent follower of Christ, abounding in all good works, wearing her years not as a burden, but as a crown, children and children's children arose and called her blessed. She died Oct. 15, 1871.

Henry Mecker was born March 19, 1808, on the old homestead between Newark and Elizabeth, held in the family for many generations. His is an unsullied record. Through his long life of seventy-five years he held many positions of trust and usefulness, and faithfully were they filled. The Presbyterian Church was the one of his choice, and for the greater part of his life he held the positions of elder and Sabbath-school superintendent. At Mankato, Minn., whither he had gone on a summer trip, Aug. 31, 1883, the prayer, "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am," was answered for him, and now with the pure in heart he sees God, and is satisfied in His likeness.

Industries.—The early records allude to several saw mills; thus in a survey for a road which was made in 1709. It began "at the saw mill path; thence running as the path runneth to Brown's line," etc.

In 1712 a survey was made "to John Brown on Elizabeth River, beginning on Bushy Plain Brook where the path that leads to the Saw mill crosses said Brook," etc.

The mill was probably completed in accordance with the foregoing agreement. Mr. Treat, however, having returned to Connecticut, it is set forth in "Town-Meeting," May 16, 1683,—

Be it known that I, Richard Harrison, having bought Mr. Treat's Part of the Mill, and an obliged according to the Covenant and Conditions thereof aforesaid, having formerly, and do now again make over, all my Right to the Mill unto my Sons Samuel, Joseph and George Harrison; they being become obliged unto the Town in all particulars mentioned in the said Covenant, to observe and keep the same in all Respects as fully as I, the said Richard Harrison, was obliged to. And the said Samuel, Joseph and George Harrison, have and do declare in the Town-Meeting, their acceptance of the Mill, upon the same Conditions as is in the said Covenant express. Also, the Town doth declare their Acceptance of the said Samuel, Joseph and George Harrison, in their Father's stead—this was voted in the Meeting above said.

By deed dated Dec. 28, 1693, in consideration of thirty-eight pounds, half in silver money, Samuel and Joseph Harrison conveyed to Samuel Plum "Two parts in three of the Grist Mill on the Mill brook, and two parts in three of twelve acres on Mill brook Plain, having Samuel Rose on the west, John Ward Turner and Samuel Plum north Highway E. & Mill brook or Highway south." In the division of the estate of Samuel Plum, made between his son, John Plum, and son-in-law, John Medis, by agreement March 1, 1707-8, the grist mill was to be retained and jointly owned by them with a covenant that neither should sell his interest without consent of and first refusal of the other.

"Town Meeting, January 20th, 1714-15, it was then agreed by Vote yt John shold have Liberty to Sett a Mill below ye old Mill; and that he should have a quarter of an Acre of Land."

The foregoing is all that the record contains in reference to the first corn mill. Saw mills must have been called for, and this demand was probably soon met by private enterprise. The early records only allude to these mills.

Shortly after the formation of the township, in the year 1836, the Belcher Brothers established their rule factory, and Cyrus Durand, Esq., his watch-case factory on Elizabeth River, and added much to the industry and character of Camptown. The rule factory was burnt in 1868 or '69, and the business transferred to Newark. The watch-case factory was not a success, and was converted into a machine-shop, long the attraction of the place. Cyrus Durand has already been spoken of.

There are two grist and flouring mills in the township, one operated by steam and the other by water-power, both owned and carried on by Nathaniel Drake.

Farming, horticulture and gardening are now the leading industries of the township, and small fruits are a specialty by some of our horticulturists. Elias W. Durand, Esq., one of our citizens, has, after the experiments of fifteen years, taken the premium at the National Exhibition at Philadelphia, for the finest display of new seedling strawberries, one of them, the largest ever produced, the Great American, being nine inches in circumference.

Clinton Lodge, No. 18, I. O. of O. F., meets at Irvington on Monday evenings.

This lodge was instituted on Jan. 28, 1843, and was organized with the following officers: N. G., Aaron Gilbert; V. G., Ezra Durand; Rec. Sec., Horace Van Houten; Per. Sec., Archibald G. Day; Treas., Robert G. Harrison.

The present officers: N. G., Charles W. Harrison; V. G., James Jameson, Sec., Edwin D. Harrison; Treas., Charles H. Paulus.

The membership on April 1, 1884, was twenty-three. Since its organization one hundred and ninety-six persons have been admitted to membership. It owns a substantial three story brick building, renting the first floor for stores and the second for the Town Hall, using the upper floor for lodge purposes. In the early part of April, 1874, the lodge granted withdrawal cards to a number of its members for the purpose of becoming charter members of Hope Lodge, No. 179, at South Orange, which was instituted on the afternoon of April 29th.

At the last session of the Grand Lodge this lodge was represented by Brother Edwin D. Harrison, P. G., and at a caucus of the Past Grands of the district he was unanimously selected for appointment as D. D. G. M. for District No. 6, which comprise Lodges Nos. 7, 8, 11, 18, 28, 135, 152, 181 and Lodge No. 42, Daughters of Rebekah.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ELIAS W. DURAND.

Mr. Durand received a fair education at private schools in New York City, at boarding-school in Mendham, N. J., and finally at the old Academy where the custom-house now stands, in Newark. At the age of fifteen he was taken to New York City to learn the business of bank-note engraving with his father. During a period of depression he was persuaded to try watch-case and jewelry engraving, with Taylor, Baldwin & Co., at Newark, then the most prominent firm in the country. Feeling the restraint incident to close application, and hardly satisfied with the conditions imposed, he concluded, being under no obligation to remain, to return to New York City, and perfect himself under the instruction of John T. White, the most celebrated engraver of the time in that line. Remaining with him about two years and becoming a master in the art, he concluded to purchase and pursue the business of his employer and instructor, continuing it with several journeymen and apprentices. Finding those spasmodic periods of depression incident to the business and so discouraging in their results continually occurring, he concluded to try wood engraving, as not only more reliable, but affording a higher and more desirable range in art, receiving all the necessary instructions, under J. A. Adams, then engaged with the Harpers, and about to done portraits, and in company with his uncle (the world-renowned A. B. Durand), proceeded at once to study from nature. Being already prepared by an extensive and varied experience in art, he made rapid progress, continuing until completely prostrated by the necessary confinement it imposed.

When commencing the life of a landscape painter he removed to Newark, in Essex County, but later removed to Greenville, on Bergen Neck, going daily to his studio in New York City. Finding it impossible to continue, he again returned to Irvington, his present residence.

issue his pictorial Bible. With his previous experience, he soon became master of the art, pursuing it for a time very successfully. At the age of twenty-two he married Emma, daughter of Lyman S. Averill, a merchant of Irvington, N. J., at which place he resided while engaged in business in New York. About this time he, assisted by his father, invented and perfected a machine for the purpose of engraving the skies and tints upon wood, which, proving a great success, he sold advantageously. He concluded at the age of twenty-five to turn his attention to a higher art, that of portrait and landscape painting. Finding the study of landscape far more enticing, he soon aban-

With opportunity for more vigorous exercise in the way of gunning and fishing, which afforded partial relief from dyspeptic troubles, he pursued his art until a recurrence of ill health warned him that entire life out of doors was a positive necessity.

Reluctantly the pencil and brush were laid aside awaiting renewed and established health or abandonment forever.

Finding this course imperative, he commenced the erection of ice-houses upon his place. Having more leisure time, and an inclination to be inventive and experimental, and being also a fair mechanic; with his father's tools and machinery at hand, he proceeded to make guns and pistols for his own use, in which he was successful, and some of which he still retains. His love for landscape would occasionally force him to the easel, but every effort insuring a return of the old dyspeptic symptoms, he concluded upon a more active out-of-door life. In 1857 he became acquainted with Seth Boyden, who at the time was experimenting successfully with the strawberry, and becoming interested, Mr. Durand also began a series of experiments to satisfy himself as to the peculiar effects in the way of originating. He soon became involved in all the perplexities that thorough investigation must invariably provoke.

For a period of twenty years the brush and the pencil, the colors and palette, have been laid aside, to be again taken up with the same old love and renewed health, coupled with caution and care for its continuance. Being spare and light in build, and active in habit, he still retains the vigor of boyhood and as an intense student of Nature yet bids fair to become as well known in art as in agriculture.

ELIAS W. DRAKE.

Mr. Drake is of English ancestry. His grandfather, Nathaniel Drake, was born in Metuchen, N. J., and

Elias W. Drake

At times he would determine to abandon the whole work, but hesitating to lose the results of so many years of intense labor, has continued in a more moderate way, the whole matter becoming more certain and plain by the establishment of certain principles, which an extensive experimental course only can confirm. In the production of this fruit he has excited the wonder of and astonished the whole country by the extent and value of his productions. Being deeply interested in agricultural pursuits, and especially in the improvement of all fruits, the public must now and in the future be greatly indebted to him for his efforts in this direction.

later removed to Plainfield, N. J., where he conducted a successful milling business. His three children were Nathaniel, Daniel and Elkanah. Nathaniel was a native of Plainfield, where his birth occurred in 1788. He followed the business of his father, first at Plainfield and later at Scotch Plains, Essex (now Union) Co., and married Miss Huldah Paine, of Oak Tree, Middlesex Co., N. J. Their children were John P., Isaac, Elias W., William, Corra O., Eliza Ann, Sarah, Hannah, Nancy, Emma and Cornelia. Elias W. was born Aug. 27, 1821, at Scotch Plains, N. J., where he remained until sixteen years of age, meanwhile attending the neighboring school or finding useful employment at home. His first independent effort was made in Newark, where he engaged as a grocer's clerk, and remained four years in that capacity. Returning at the expiration of this time to the place of his birth, he entered his father's mill, and soon after, on attaining his majority, engaged in the flour and feed business in Newark, which he conducted for four years. Mr. Drake then leased a mill at Scotch Plains and operated it for three years, when Irvington became his home. Here he purchased the mill property he now owns and has managed successfully for a period of thirty-two years, during which time he has been one of the most important factors in the business interests of the place. He erected, in 1871, a steam mill in Newark, now conducted by his sons. Mr. Drake was married, on the 1st of January, 1842, to Harriet C., daughter of Mahlon Smalley, of Somerset County, whose children are George D., Mahlon S., Jr., Nathaniel, Augusta and Harriet C. (Mrs. Irving B. Harrison). Mr. Drake has, while manifesting a reasonable degree of public spirit, participated but rarely in the political movements of the time. He is a Democrat in politics and has held various township offices, but does not aspire to more exalted political honors. He is in his religious views a Baptist and member of the Baptist Church of Lyons Farms, Essex Co., in which he has held official relations.

JOSIAH L. BALDWIN.

Mr. Baldwin traces his lineage to England, from whence a branch of the family came to America more than two centuries ago and settled in Connecticut, removing at a later date to Newark, N. J. In the line of descent from one of these pioneers was Josiah, a native of South Orange, Essex Co., where his father followed the employment of a farmer. He married Lydia Ogden, of North Orange, and had children.—Abram, Samuel, J. Ogden, Rachel, Abigail, Polly and Lydia. Samuel was born in 1782 in South Orange township, where he managed the double interests of a farmer and manufacturer of shoes. In 1808 he purchased a farm west of Newark, in Clinton township upon which he spent the remainder of his life. He married Mary, daughter of James Meeker, of Connecticut Farms, Essex (now Union) Co., N. J., and had children,—Harris M., Josiah L., Samuel O., Abigail L. and Mary (Mrs. Joseph Belcher). Josiah L. was born Nov. 4, 1810, on the homestead farm in Clinton township, where his early life was spent. He received the usual advantages portant factors in the business interests of the place. He erected, in 1871, a steam mill in Newark, now conducted by his sons. Mr. Drake was married, on the 1st of January, 1842, to Harriet C., daughter of Mahlon Smalley, of Somerset County, whose children are George D., Mahlon S., Jr., Nathaniel, Augusta and Harriet C. (Mrs. Irving B. Harrison). Mr. Drake has, while manifesting a reasonable degree of public spirit, participated but rarely in the political movements of the time. He is a Democrat in politics and has held various township offices, but does not aspire to more exalted political honors. He is in his religious views a Baptist and member of the Baptist accorded to farmers' sons, and until 1849 was actively employed in the labor incident to agricultural life. During the latter year he removed to New York and engaged with his brother in the wholesale boot and shoe business. In 1851 he formed a copartnership with George P. Brown for the manufacture of patent leather and continued this enterprise for three years. The death of his father in 1855 influenced his return to Clinton township, when he assumed charge of the homestead farm and cultivated the land until 1871, when the property passed by purchase into other hands. Since then Mr. Baldwin, having retired from business, has made Irvington, N. J., his place of residence. He is in politics a Democrat and was formerly active in the political arena, having for a period of fifteen years, though not consecutively, held the office of freeholder of the township, and in 1868 been elected to the State Legislature. He is a Free and Accepted Mason and member of Franklin Lodge, No. 10, of that order. Though not directly connected with any church, he is a supporter of all religious denominations.

Josiah L. Baldwin

MILLBURN TOWNSHIP.¹

Geographical and Topographical.—This is the southwest corner township of Essex County, and was erected from Springfield in 1857 upon the erection of Union County. It is bounded on the east by South Orange, the south and southwest by Union County, on the northwest by Morris County, and on the north by Livingston township, Essex County.

It is watered on the northwest by the Passaic River, which forms that boundary line. Canoe Brook rises in Livingston township, flowing northwesterly to near the Poor Farm, in Millburn, thence westerly into the Passaic River. The east branch of Rahway River rises in West Orange, flowing southwesterly enters this township at its northeast corner, continuing in the same direction to near the village of Millburn, where it deflects to the south, leaving the township at its southwest corner. There are several other small streams, sufficient to give the township an abundant supply of water for all purposes.

The surface of the township is quite broken, especially the northern portion adjoining Livingston township.—White Oak Ridge, near the centre of the township, so named from the fact of large quantities of white-oak timber growing in that locality; Short Hills, near the southern border of the township and west from Millburn, was so named from the large number of low hills or knobs located near each other.

Roads.—Of public highways there is a large number, the most prominent of which is the old Morris turnpike, forming three quarters of the boundary line next to Union County. Washington Street, or pike leaves the Morris Pike west of Millburn, passing through that and Wyoming village and leading into South Orange. Brookside Avenue, crosses the southeast part of the township nearly parallel with the east branch of Rahway River. The Millburn road runs from Millburn village northerly across the township into Livingston. South Orange Avenue lies across the northeast corner of the township from E. R. Halsey's, in Millburn, to Ward's hat factory, in Livingston. The Millburn, Short Hills and White Oak Ridge road, runs from Millburn northwesterly through the township, through the settlement of White Oak Ridge. Besides those named, there are several other roads that intersect with the above.

The business portion of the township is well supplied with railroad facilities by means of the Morris and Essex Division of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad. This road enters the township on the Reeve farm, east of the village of Wyoming Station, passing through the village of Millburn, past the Short Hills Station, and crosses the south border of the township about two miles west from Millburn. The New Jersey West Line Railroad was surveyed through this township from a short distance south of Wyoming Station, northwesterly to a point half a mile north of Millburn village, thence westerly through Short Hills settlement, and left the township near the residence of Rev. John H. Hobart, on the old Morris turnpike. A portion of the road-bed was built through this township but work on this line was abandoned and the trestle-work and bridges are fast going to decay.

Soil.—The soil of the township is mostly of a gravelly loam, and is susceptible of a high state of cultivation. The farmers of late years have turned their attention to the production of milk, which finds a ready market at any of the three railroad stations at quite remunerative prices.

Civil Organization.—By an act of the State Legislature, approved March 20, 1857, so much of the township of Springfield, in the county of Essex, lying north of the north line of the county of Union, was made a new township, to be called and known by the name of Millburn, and in accordance with the provisions of the fourth section of that act, the township committee met on the 21st day of April, 1857, and made the apportionment required by that section. The committee subscribing to the agreement on the part of Millburn consisted of Ezra S. Gardner, William Taylor, Robert McChesney and Thomas A. Reeve.

The first township election was held in accordance with the provisions of the act of incorporation, on the 13th of April, 1857. The officers chosen at this and subsequent township elections appear in the following:

Old Families.—SAMUEL CAMPBELL came from Scotland during the last century and settled in this township, where he passed the remainder of his life. He reared a large family, but only three of his descendants now reside in the township.

JOHN THOMAS, STEPHEN AND JACOB DENMAN were residents of Millburn township early in the present century, and the family is still largely represented here by their descendants.

JOHN BRISON came from Ireland and settled in the township early in the present century. His son David is now a resident here.

STEPHEN PARKHURST came from Saybrook, Conn., before the Revolution. His sons Abraham and Samuel were the progenitors of the representatives of the family now residing in this vicinity.

A. D. TRAPNAGEN, of this township, is one of the descendants of a family, four brothers of whom came from Holland, and settled in New Jersey at an early day.

WILLIAM C. WALLACE came to Millburn sixty years since, and located near Chatham Bridge, where he still resides. His brother Joseph came at the same time, and located near him. He is recently deceased.

BISHOP HOBART came to Millburn township in the latter part of the last century, purchased a farm, built on it, and resided there. The farm is still owned by his descendants.

COL. AARON HAND at an early day owned the present hotel property in Millburn. He afterwards built on a farm east from that place, and there died. His son Isaac, a merchant in New York, built a fine country seat on the same farm, and died there. His son, Edward Hand, still owns this place. Joseph, the brother of Isaac, lived and died in a house erected by him, which is still owned and occupied by his descendants.

PHILEMON DICKINSON was an exhorter in the Methodist Church. He died many years since.

JAMES HENDERSON, a Scotchman, located in this township early in this century. He was the father of Dr. John J. Henderson and the grandfather of William Henderson, the present owner of Fandango Paper Mill.

DEACON GILBERT REEVE resided in the east part of the township, where he died. His brother, Walter S. Reeve, lived and died in the same neighborhood. Some of his descendants still reside in the township.

EZRA BALDWIN, the owner of Baldwin's saw-mill, and a large land-holder, was the father of Capt. Daniel Baldwin, and Col. Stephen Baldwin, who located and died near the residence of their father. Their descendants still reside in the township.

STEPHEN AND JACOB MOREHOUSE were early residents. Jacob was the father of Harvey W. Morehouse, who now resides here.

THOMAS PARSH was an old man sixty years since. He left sons whose descendants are still here.

JOHN DREW was also an old citizen more than half a century since, and numerous descendants of his are still here.

CAPT. JOHN EDWARDS died fifty or sixty years ago, leaving a numerous family still represented here.

CAPT. AARON EDWARDS, a brother of Capt. John, was a prominent merchant. His family is represented in the female line.

SAMUEL BAILEY was a nail-maker in early times. He left sons Thomas, David and Samuel. The descendants of Samuel reside in the township.

ELIAH AND STEPHEN LYON were residents in the early part of this century, but there are few, if any, of their descendants here.

JACOB AND DANIEL DEAN, whose father was known as Priest Dean, were early residents.

Sandy (Alexander) McLeod was an early resident. He had sons John, David and Alexander, the last of whom resides on the paternal homestead.

JACOB COLIE was the father of Charles Colie, who now resides in the township.

WOOLFERRIDGE EAGLESFIELD was an Englishman, who became a resident of this township about the commencement of the present century. His descendants in the female line are still here.

WALTER SMITH was a resident of this township in the first half of the last century. His son William was born in 1754, and inherited his large landed estate. He had two wives, and was the father of sixteen children, the youngest of whom was born in 1804. The descendants of William Smith in Millburn are numerous, and among them are William H. Smith, Lewis Smith, Theodore Smith and Charles H. Smith, the keeper of the Millburn Hotel.

ISRAEL D. CONDIT came to Millburn in the winter of 1820-21, and engaged in mercantile business. He soon became interested in the manufacture of paper, and was concerned in three of the mills in this vicinity. He introduced the manufacture of fur hat bodies, and for many years he was engaged in that business. His active business life is illustrated in the histories of the various manufactories here. His wife was Caroline Eaglesfield, and they have a daughter—Mrs. Dr. Whittingham and two sons residing here.

VILLAGES AND HAMLETS.

Millburn.—At different times in the past Millburn has been known by different names. Runn Brook, Riverhead, Vauxhall and Croton were among these, but by reason of the mills in the vicinity, it was more generally known as Millville. When the township was erected and a post-office established it was necessary to adopt some other name, for there was already a town and post-office of that name in Cumberland County, N. J. The name Millburn was finally adopted because of its appropriateness. The word is from the Scotch, and means mill-stream. Prior to that time the place had had no regular post-office, though it had come to have a population nearly equal to that of Springfield.

As late as 1835 there were at Millburn only a blacksmith-shop, a store, a tavern, a paper mill and a few dwellings. Other paper mills were in the immediate vicinity, but not in what is now considered the central part of the town. At that time the principal residents were Mrs. Butterworth, Joseph Hand, John Brisson, John White, Thomas Lyon, Joseph P. Smith, and Israel D. Condit and their families.

After the construction of the railroad the place commenced a growth which has continued till the present time, and now the town extends to the county line, and practically is almost one with Springfield.

The manufacture of paper was established here very early, and the products of the mills were hauled to Elizabeth, and thence sent by sloops to New York, and supplies were brought back by the same means. The establishment of railroad communication with New York, by affording a direct means of transportation, not only greatly facilitated manufacturing operations that were already established, but led to the increase of an industry that was then only in its infancy,—the manufacture of hats, which is now the principal industry here.

In addition to the manufactories that are noticed in detail, the town and township has three hotels, four saloons, five general stores, one boot and shoe store, one drug-store, three markets and dealers in meats, fish, fruits, vegetables, etc., two dealers in stoves and tin-ware, one jewelry-store, one barber-shop, one bakery and confectionery, one billiard saloon, one laundry, one coal-yard, three physicians, and the ordinary mechanics and mechanic shops required in country towns and rural districts.

Short Hills.—This name, which, from time immemorial, has been applied to the strangely irregular, undulating hills, which form the broken terraces of the Orange Mountains and lie in the gap between them and the equally bold and heavily timbered Springfield Mountains, has recently been bestowed upon a village, founded in 1877, which has flourished most healthfully since, and bids fair to give the time-honored name wide renown. In the year mentioned Stewart Hartshorn purchased several hundred acres of land here, and began literally in the wilderness the work of improvement, which has now progressed far enough to indicate his plan and to vindicate his wisdom and the practicability of his ideas. The village has now a population of several hundred souls, over forty private dwellings, a church, a public music or assembly hall (which also contains a school-room), a railroad station, express and telegraph offices and a post-office, the latter established in 1881, with L. C. Goodrich as postmaster. Such, in brief, is the story of Short Hills.

But Short Hills differs from the thousands of new villages in this broad land, whose history may be thus easily and briefly told, and possesses features that are worthy of and command more deferential recognition and careful attention. It has been brought into existence as an attempt at a solution of the long battling problem of how to make beautiful and healthful suburban homes. Mr. Hartshorn has made such homes, with all of the happiness and comfort which they imply, attainable to those who fall far short of being wealthy, and his enterprise in this direction, although it has by no means reached full fruition, is perhaps the most practically successful one which has been undertaken in this country, and it may be added that its result is at least as fair to the æsthetic eye as to the examination of the utilitarian.

Many ambitious endeavors to found tasteful villages in proximity to the great cities have failed, and the reasons of failure have been various. In some instances pretty but meaningless collections of architectural curiosities have been heaped together to satisfy a passing whim for the fashions of art and for the bizarre, and the people who have endeavored to live in and among such museums of the odd and grotesque have found that after the sensation of novelty had passed they did not satisfy,—did not make a home. Elaborate and well-directed efforts have in some cases resulted in building up villages of costly and beautiful houses, in which almost every desideratum has been attained except—alas! fatal defect—safe sanitary conditions. In such aggregations of country residences the family fleeing from the noise and bustle and heat and weariness of life in the city, finds diseases which cannot enter the better parts of the great town, and thither they return convinced that if the hope of a healthful country home is not a delusion, it is at least only to be realized in some Utopia of the far future, when minds which can aim at the creation of beauty may also have a practical side for the consideration of such matters as water supply and sewage, which, in reality, form the great groundwork of suburban village building, even as a certain President said in his message, that "agriculture formed the great groundwork of national prosperity."

A very prevalent cause of failure in these projects has been the inability of members of the companies undertaking them to agree upon methods of work and nature of the plan to be elaborated. Another frequent reason of half success lies in the fact that individuals possessing the necessary capital have seldom been endowed with the equally important requisites of taste and patience. The capitalist seeks investments requiring less labor and productive of greater and more immediate profits, or if he enters upon the enterprise, relegates the practical part of the work to landscape gardeners and architects, who devise and execute without union of design and often with only half interest.

If the endeavor made and making at Short Hills is already more solidly successful and promises better things in the future than do many others, it is because it is the work of an individual rather than a company, and because the projector and proprietor has not only wealth and an appreciation of beauty, but enthusiasm and patience and perseverance. Mr. Hartshorn entered upon his work with a love for it, rather than a passing penchant, and has found pleasure in its every step. His conception of what a town of suburban homes should be was thoroughly formed, and he has labored painstakingly and with zeal, but never with impatient haste, to carry it out.

The site of the improvement was well selected. The rolling hills upon and among which he began building his unique village were in 1877 covered with a rich forest growth, and are still, wherever the eye rests, except in the centre of the tract chosen for the development of the enterprise. Mr. Hartshorn purchased several hundred acres of this woodland, presenting a southerly exposure, lying north of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, ten miles from the metropolis and ten miles from Newark, and with immense labor brought it into subjection to his purpose. But this was a work carried on with rare discretion and was not a rude "clearing" of the land. The noblest trees were left about the sites of future homes, and thus the place was given the appearance of a great park, by which term, indeed, Short Hills is better described than by any other.

Streets and drives were laid out through the tract, with no attempt at regularity, but curving gracefully about the swelling knolls, never destroying, but always enhancing the beauty of building sites. This adaptation to the natural features of the ground is everywhere visible throughout the mile square which includes most of the actual and prospective improvements.

The practical was never lost sight of in the search for beauty. A carefully devised scheme of surface drainage and of underground sewage was carried out, and in connection with the latter a novel and valuable idea was introduced which in time must be frequently imitated. This is a system by which the sewage is filtered and deposited in settling basins, where it is hermetically sealed by running water until such seasons as it is convenient to remove it to the gardens or large green-house, which occupy a contiguous position. While this is an economic plan, it was adopted less for that consideration than as an example which it is to be hoped may soon be followed in many localities where streams are contaminated by filth, which might be diverted to good use. An admirable system of water-works was also established, pipes laid throughout the park and pure water supplied to every house.

The proprietor's plan being to make here a village of tasteful permanent country homes in proximity to the metropolis, rather than a showy aggregation of houses for fashionable summer sojourn, his project was from the outset, as may be inferred from the work we have mentioned, one requiring large outlay of care and thought and money.

The building of the individual houses was undertaken with the same thoughtfulness and has been carried on with the same thoroughness which characterized the general work. Not a single residence was built in undue haste or of poor material or from a design which was insincere or lacking in the conditions which make a wholesome, substantial living place,—in short, a home. Believing that mere architecture aiming to please the eye with prettiness fails of attaining the very object sought, unless it subserves other purposes and is subservient to surroundings, Mr. Hartshorn, and those whose assistance he has relied upon, have carefully studied the adaptation of every dwelling to the site upon which it was proposed to build, and so successful has this study been that there is not one which seems inappropriately placed. It is only the best of art which nature appears not to regard as an intrusion upon her domain, and enhances rather than belittles. Some of these park houses rising upon their rugged stone foundations from quietly sloping hillsides and surrounded by at least century old oaks and maples and elms seem almost to have grown there, and look as if they had been homes enjoying the closest friendship of nature from very distant years. Indeed, the disagreeable sense of newness which pervades too many suburban villages nowhere obtrudes itself upon the observer at Short Hills, except where a house is in actual process of construction.

In the construction of the houses Mr. Hartshorn has relied not upon one, but upon many architects, with a view of securing all that was excellent in originality and variety. No two houses in the two-score or more already erected are alike, and yet each group reveals harmony, and every house gains something from its neighbor as well as from the broad picture formed by natural surroundings. In design the several structures exhibit in various degrees the modified Gothic, the sturdy Norman, the Flemish, quaint elements of the colonial and odd traces of the Dutch schools of architecture, and there are frequent suggestions of the recent tendency toward what may develop through eclecticism into a new order of domestic house building. Stone, brick and wood are used quite impartially, frequently in very pleasing conjunction, and sometimes reinforced with fine effects of slate and tile. The nice adaptation of the houses to their locations is everywhere observable; as a single instance, we may mention a house which stands in a comparatively exposed situation. There are but few trees to shelter from the storm or veil from the heat of the sun, but the heavy stone walls and the massive half-inclosed verandah, speak eloquently of warmth in winter and refreshing coolness in summer, and the dwelling stands there with a character strongly marked as an exponent of the value of brain in buildings, which even he who runs may read.

About forty houses have been built at Short Hills, and all have become homes. For the convenience of the people who have settled here in this old appearing, new park village, other buildings for general use were demanded and have been supplied. Of these, Music Hall, as it is called, a very striking and unique structure near the tasteful little station, was the first provided. It is a most picturesque building, containing a great audience-room, which is a theatre, lecture-hall and place for general convenings of the Short Hills folk. It is beautifully finished in pine, and contains among other charming features, a huge fireplace, capable of receiving an English yule log, or the great "back log," which warmed and lighted the cabin of the American colonist or pioneer. The massive chimney with its heavy mantelpiece of blue stone is inclosed in a deeply recessed arch, which is a master stroke of bold originality in designing. In the basement of this hall, which the artist delineates better than the writer can describe, are kept two select schools.

Another building which the growth of the village made necessary is a little chapel or church, which must soon be enlarged to accommodate an increasing congregation. This is built of rough stone, and is as honest and strong a specimen of English Gothic architecture as can be found in the land.

A club stable renders unnecessary private barns, which too often prove unsightly adjuncts to dwellings. Some of the building sites, however, have been especially arranged with a view to the erection of stables where they cannot offend.

It has been Mr. Hartshorn's especial study to prevent the introduction of any of those elements which may be prejudicial to any particular part of the park or mar in any degree the plan of the whole. Hence a few restrictions, easily complied with, are imposed for the common good upon the lessees or purchasers of properties. So thoughtful has he been of insuring the permanent agreeableness of the model cluster of houses which he has established, that a wide border of field and forest has been left around the entire park. Hence there can be no obtrusion of undesirable buildings to mar the plan of the town or of evil institutions to harm the morals of the little community and neutralize the influences of home life.

Patient thought and working out of things, practical and earnest endeavor in the direction of the truest and highest æsthetic education and attainment, seem constantly to have been associated in the mind of the proprietor. One can readily imagine after surveying the results of his seven years' study and labor, that he is a firm believer in the utility of beauty. Another thought arises irresistibly in the mind of an observer and it is this: That the projector of this extensive improvement has been animated by a higher ambition than a financial one, by an aspiration higher even than for the creation of beauty. He has been actuated by a desire to accomplish something which will add to the sum of human happiness. Short Hills Park could scarcely be all that it is, if it were simply the work of a financier, landscape gardener and architect. It is the outcome of a mind enthusiastic for moral, social and intellectual, as well as æsthetic betterment of condition.

Short Hills, with all of its beauties of nature and art, its winding undulating walks and drives, its ancient trees, its lawn and woodland, hill and dale, its breezy heights and cool ravines, and its forty restful homes, has been discovered and created within seven years. This lovely region lay hidden by the forest awaiting embellishment and human habitation, until Mr. Hartshorn making himself a country home in the vicinity, recognized its beauty and its superb adaptability to the purpose which he conceived and has now partially executed.

The comfort and healthfulness and freedom of his own country life led to the thought of placing the advantages of such life within the reach of others, and thus the proprietor of Short Hills entered upon the noble occupation of building the village Beautiful, which will probably continue to claim his best thought and energies until the park is the pleasant, healthful, happy home of more than a hundred—perhaps of several hundred families.

Wyoming.—About ten years since, a company was formed under the name of the Wyoming Land and Improvement Company. This Company purchased from Edward Hand and Thomas R. Reeve one hundred acres of land, on which they laid out streets and village lots, and on these several tasteful houses were erected. Lots were sold, many of which are not yet built on. The company ceased to exist, and the unsold land reverted to the former owner.

About twenty-five houses have been erected, and there is a prospect of a more rapid growth in the near future. A railroad station is established. Water from the Orange water-works reservoir passes through the place, and a church is in process of erection.

Churches.—ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH (Protestant Episcopal). The first services, according to the rites of the Protestant Episcopal Church, were held in Millburn, in December, 1851, in the public school-house, by Rev. E. A. Hoffman, a missionary from Grace Church, Elizabethport. The parish was organized Jan. 10, 1853, and a building lot donated by Mr. Israel D. Condit, and a church edifice erected thereon in 1853-54 and consecrated July 24, 1855, by the late Bishop George Washington Doane. Rev. H. H. Reed was the first rector, and remained two years, or until the autumn of 1859, when he was succeeded by Rev. George C. Pennell. He was followed in 1861 by Rev. W. C. Brown, who remained four years, when Rev. H. P. Hay, D.D., was called to the rectorship in 1866, and remained one year. He was followed in 1867 by Rev. B. Morgan. In 1869, Rev. W. B. Morrow became the rector and remained till May, 1874, when he was succeeded by Rev. Lewis P. Clover, D.D., who commenced his labors in June of that year.

The wardens in 1881 were Israel D. Condit and J. L. Benedict; vestrymen, E. S. Renwick, Horace Park, P. J. Bodwell, J. W. Pierson, E. T. Whittingham, M.D., Amzi Condit, E. S. Hand, W. H. Emerson, J. F. Chamberlin, D. L. Cleveland; superintendent of Sunday-school, W. H. Emerson. Communicants, one hundred and forty-one. Value of church property, fifteen thousand dollars.

THE CHURCH OF ST. ROSE OF LIMA (Catholic), was organized in 1852, by Father R. J. McQuade, in Springfield. A house of worship was erected in 1852, and removed to its present location in Millburn, in 1876. It is a wooden structure with three hundred sittings. The parish has five hundred souls. A cemetery is fitted up near the church.

A parochial school was established here ten years since, under the charge of the sisters of charity. It has two teachers and from eighty to ninety scholars.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH of Millburn was organized in 1858. The first trustees were William Richards, James James, Jotham Meeker, Samuel Edwards and William N. Meeker. The organization took place in Washington Hall, and that was during three years the place of worship.

In 1860, the erection of the present church edifice on Millburn Avenue was commenced and it was completed in 1861. It is a wooden structure, forty by sixty feet in size, and it is finished in modern style. A parsonage was erected in 1871 on the same lot with the church.

The pastors of this church have been in succession, Revs. H. C. Townley Kelsey Wadling, J. D. Merrill, Adam Chambers, A. B. Woodworth, C. A. Babcock, Henry Westcott and the present pastor, M. E. Bogart.

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH of Wyoming was organized in 1879, with fourteen constituent members. Its place of worship has been the railroad depot, but in 1883 a church edifice was commenced, and it is nearly completed. It is a frame structure, with a seating capacity of one hundred and fifty, and its cost will reach three thousand dollars. There has been no regularly installed pastor, but Rev. B. Emerson ministered to the congregation during six years. His health failing, the congregation has had occasional supplies for the last two years.

AFRICAN M. P. CHURCH OF MILLBURN.—This was first organized in 1879, but the organization was not kept up. It was reorganized in 1881 with but two members, and Joseph King as pastor. The first place of worship was the town hall, but in 1883 a house of worship twenty-eight by thirty feet in size was erected on Mechanic Street at a cost of six hundred dollars. Mr. King is still the pastor, and the membership is eight.

CHRIST CHURCH (Episcopal) at SHORT HILLS.—This parish was organized in the autumn of 1882 with fifty constituent members. Up to the present time, December, 1883, the place of worship has been the basement of Music Hall, where a room has been fitted up for that purpose. A church edifice is in process of erection which will have a seating capacity of four hundred. It is a gothic structure built of native stone, and it will not be the least of the attractive features of Short Hills. Rev. F. Landon Humphries has been the rector of this parish from the time of its organization.

Public Schools.—There are three school districts in the township of Millburn. They are known as White Oak Ridge, No. 24, which has a small wooden house, Short Hills, No. 25, in which there is a larger framed school-house, and Washington, No. 26, in the town of Millburn. The last has a two-story framed school-house with two school-rooms and conveniences for one hundred and fifty pupils. Two teachers are employed in this school, which is kept during ten months in each year. In the other districts the term is about the same.

Societies.—STAR TEMPLE OF HONOR, No. 9, was instituted in 1867, with twenty charter members. Its career during several years was prosperous, and much good was accomplished. About six years since it became inactive, and so remained till the autumn of 1883, when it was revived, and its prospects for usefulness are good.

The officers are R. S. Oliver, W. C. T.; Joseph Senior, W. V. T.; M. Oliver, W. T.; F. Bailey, W. F. R.; A. Overmiller, W. R.; Rev. William E. Bogart, W. C.

UNION COUNCIL, No. 6.—GOLDEN STAR FRATERNITY was organized in December, 1882, with the following officers:

W. W. McCullom, Moderator; N. C. Cox, Vice-Moderator; W. R. Ayers, Orator; J. M. Drake, Sec.; Thomas Partington, Fin. Sec.; W. E. McCullom, Treas., and George Cornell, Chaplain.

Section 2, of the Constitution of the fraternity reads, "The object of the fraternity shall be the promotion of the social, moral, intellectual and pecuniary good of all its members."

The Council has thirty-eight members. The present officers are, N. C. Cox, Moderator; W. R. Ayers, Vice-Moderator; J. Burling, M.D., Orator; George Cornell, Sec.; J. J. Hoff, Fin. Sec.; W. E. McCullom, Treas.; E. A. Barber, Chaplain.

Industries.—CAMPELL'S PAPER MILL.—Prior to the Revolution a forge stood on the site where this mill was afterwards built. This forge was purchased by Samuel Campbell at a very early date, and a paper mill was erected there. It was burned in 1805, and was rebuilt by Mr. Campbell. He was succeeded in the ownership of the mill by his son John, who operated it during many years. It was leased to Samuel Clark, who, after some years, was succeeded in the business by his son James Clark, and his son-in-law Oliver E. Bailey, under whose administration the mill was burned about twenty-five years since. The stamp on the paper manufactured at this mill was the figure of a thistle, hence it was often called the "Thistle Mill."

DIAMOND MILL.—A paper mill stood on the site of this mill at a very early day, but it was burned early in the present century, and the site became the property of Samuel Campbell. From him it was purchased about 1820 by Jonathan Parkhurst, who erected on it a binder's board mill, which was carried on by his father Abraham Parkhurst, and himself, till about 1855, when he sold it to his son-in-law Dr. Frederick Bennett. A year later it became the property of Israel D. Condit, and was conducted by Condit and Traphagen. This firm was succeeded by Israel D. Condit, with J. J. Henderson as manager. It then passed into the hands of Condit, Henderson, Bradbury & Company, who changed it to a straw print mill, and two years later to a paper mill. It became the property of Condit alone, and about six years since it was purchased by the Diamond Mills Paper Company of which C. T. Reynolds is the president. Since that time it has been run on white and colored tissue papers. Twenty-five hands are employed, and one thousand five hundred pounds of paper are manufactured every twenty-four hours.

In addition to the water of the stream on which it stands (a branch of Rahway river), two steam engines are used, one of one hundred and the other of twenty-five horse power.

This mill was burnt in 1844, and was rebuilt by J. Parkhurst. In 1861 it was altered and enlarged.

SHORT HILLS PAPER-MILL.—In 1800 a paper-mill was established on the site of this mill by John Clark. It was a two vat mill, in which all varieties of paper were manufactured. Mr. Clark continued to operate the mill till 1806, when John Lang purchased half interest in it, and in 1807 he became the sole owner. In 1808 Abraham Wooley purchased the property. He sold it to John Breath in 1811, and by him it was operated till his death.

In 1817 Thomas Campell purchased the property from the executors of Mr. Breath, and operated the mill till 1839, when it was leased by the present owner, Wellington Campbell. Mr. Campbell became the owner of the property on the death of his father, in 1848, and he has ever since conducted the business.

The mill was twice burnt and rebuilt prior to the time when it became the property of the elder Mr. Campbell. It was a water mill up to the time when it came into the possession of the present owner. Steam power has been introduced by him, and all the modern improved machinery used in the manufacture of paper has been adopted.

Since it was last burned and rebuilt, additions have from time to time been made and its capacity has been increased, till now it has a daily capacity of three tons. The machinery is propelled by two steam engines, aggregating one hundred horse power, and twenty-five to thirty hands are employed. Hanging, print, and card paper are the principal kinds manufactured at this mill. The buildings are mostly brick, and are located on Springfield Avenue—half a mile south from the depot at Short Hills, on a branch of the Rahway river.

The grandfather of Mr. Campbell removed in 1745 from Scotland to the north of Ireland, where his father Thomas Campbell was born. Thomas came to America in 1792, and in 1817 settled in what is now Millburn. Wellington was born in 1816. It is worthy of remark, that he was born in a house that stood next to a paper-mill, and that he has always lived next door to one. Mr. Campbell has five children,—two sons and three daughters,—living.

W. N. WADE'S BINDERS' BOARD MILL.—About ninety years since, a calico mill was erected on the present line between Springfield and Millburn, near the village of Springfield. The line between the counties of Essex and Union passes through the mill. It was subsequently converted into a woolen mill and as such was owned and operated by Hezekiah Miller in 1825. Tradition says that prior to that time it was twice burned and rebuilt.

Daniel N. Denman and Samuel Miller succeeded

Hezekiah Miller in the ownership of the property and converted it into a paper mill. The firm soon afterward became Denman & Ayres. The manufacture of wrapping paper was continued till 1835, when William and Abner Stites purchased the mill and converted it into a binders' board mill. In 1858 William Stites withdrew from the firm, and the mill was conducted by Abner till the time of his death.

In 1871 it was purchased from the heirs of Mr. Stites by the present proprietor, W. N. Wade, who has operated it to the present time. The mill was propelled by the water of a branch of the Rahway River till 1860, when a steam engine of thirty horse-power was added. Ten hands are employed and the annual production is two hundred and fifty tons of board. The mill has a capacity of three tons in twenty-four hours.

FANDANGO PAPER MILL.—As early as 1810 this was an old mill and was owned by Capt. Jonas Wade. It had previously been owned by a man named Tyler, but when or by whom it was built is not now known. In 1820 it had become the property of Thompson & Chanev, and about 1825 they were succeeded by James White, and by him the mill was sold in 1856 to Israel D. Condit, Amzi Condit and R. D. Traphagen. About 1860 Mr. Traphagen sold his interest to Condit, Bradbury & Co., who changed it from a paper to a binders' board mill which it still continues to be. In 1868 it was purchased by J. J. Henderson and inherited by his son, William Henderson, the present owner and operator.

It is a wooden mill and it stands on a branch of the Rahway River, the water of which branch propelled its machinery till fifteen years since, when a steam engine of one hundred horse-power was added.

Twenty-five hands are employed in the establishment, and its daily production is three tons of boards. Its full capacity is six tons in twenty-four hours.

SMITH'S BINDERS' BOARD MILL was built in 1822 by three brothers, Joseph P., John W., and William C. Smith, and it was operated a few years by the three till William C. withdrew from the firm. It was then carried on by the other two till 1838, when Joseph P. Smith became sole proprietor. In 1852 William H. Smith, son of Joseph, and James W. Roll the brother-in-law of William, became proprietors and operators. It was carried on by them till 1872, when it was discontinued and business has not been resumed in it.

CONDIT'S HAT-BODY FACTORY.—Early in the present century, probably 1810, this was a paper-mill, owned and operated by Woolebridge Eaglesfield. It was afterward leased by John and James White. It was purchased by Israel D. Condit and conducted by him and Elijah Smith, sons-in-law of Mr. Eaglesfield, and by them converted into factory for forming doornat bodies. Mr. Smith afterward withdrew from the firm and the business was changed to a manufactory of fur-hat-bodies, and continued twenty-five years, or till the partial destruction of the head race by a freshet. Business was then suspended and the property was purchased by Charles A. Lighthipe and A. D. Traphagen. It was leased by them to Sparrow, Venino & Co., as a hat factory, and after a short time it was burned. It has never been rebuilt.

LIGHTHIPE HAT-BODY FACTORY.—Early in the present century, a cotton factory stood on the site of this establishment. It was burned about 1812, and eight years later it had been rebuilt as a binders' board mill, and it was then owned and operated by Samuel Parkhurst. It was subsequently owned and conducted by John White. It became a hat-body factory and was operated by Peck, Todd & Co. Afterward Aaron Peck and Israel D. Condit owned and operated it. They were succeeded by Burr & Co., and they in 1865 by the present owner, C. A. Lighthipe, by whom the business has since been conducted. Mr. Lighthipe has of late introduced new and improved machinery by which a better grade of work is produced with fewer hands than formerly. Fifty hands are employed, and one thousand eight hundred bodies per day are produced.

GRAVES' HAT FACTORY.—In 1849 William Pettigrew established this factory, on the corner of Church and Main Street, in the town of Millburn. Here he conducted the manufacture of hats till 1863 on an extensive scale, employing from one hundred to one hundred and fifty hands in the business. In that year Mr. Pettigrew became a volunteer in the army, and business in the factory was suspended.

In 1869 Henry M. Graves purchased the establishment, and he has continued the manufacture of hats here since. The works cover an acre of ground and the machinery is driven by an engine of thirty-horse power. Sixty hands are employed and an average of thirty dozen felt hats are manufactured daily here, business aggregating about one hundred thousand dollars annually.

BUTLER'S HAT FACTORY.—In 1861 William Bodwell established a manufactory of hats on the corner of Spring and Church Streets, in Millburn. He continued the business till his death, about ten years later, and it was then conducted by his two sons, under the firm name of Bodwell Brothers, till 1880, when it was purchased and conducted by Butler & Spriggs, afterward Butler, Spriggs & Co., and since 1882 by P. J. Butler alone. The machinery in this factory is driven by an engine of twelve-horse power. The capacity of the establishment is sixty hands and thirty dozen hats daily.

SUMMERS' HAT FACTORY.—In 1870 Stephen A. Mecker erected a factory on Spring Street, Millburn, and the manufacture of hats was commenced in it by Edwards & Henderson, who continued about three years, and were succeeded by O. H. Summers, who continued till 1877, when the establishment was burned. It was rebuilt in June, 1883, by Philander Bodwell, and business was resumed by O. H. Summers, who still conducts it. The capacity of the factory is one hundred dozen hats per week.

WICKMAN'S HAT FACTORY.—In 1882 Albert Wickman erected a hat factory in Millburn township, near the line of Springfield, and commenced the manufacture of hats. The establishment gives employment to twenty-five hands.

EDWARD BROWN'S HAT SHOP on Main Street in Millburn was established in April, 1882. Eight hands are employed, and an average of twelve dozen hats are sized daily.

WILLIAM DILLON'S HAT SHOP on Main Street, Millburn, was established in August, 1882. In this shop seventeen hands are employed, and the daily average is twenty-four dozen hats.

SHAW & DUFFY'S HAT SHOP on Ocean Street, in Millburn, was established in November, 1882, by Sylvanus J. Shaw and Edward Duffy. Sixteen hands are employed, and the daily number of hats sized is twenty-five dozen.

REEVE'S SAW MILL.—The "memory of man runneth not" back to the time when the old mill on Canoe Brook, in the northern part of the township, was built. The "oldest inhabitant" remembers it as Ezra Baldwin's saw mill. From him it passed to his son, Daniel Baldwin, and from him to his son-in-law, Abner D. Reeve, by whom it was rebuilt farther down the stream about thirty years since. After the death of Abner D. Reeve it was leased by a Mr. Hidden, who introduced machinery for the manufacture of leather boards. The experiment was a financial failure, and the mill was purchased by its present owner, George W. Reeve, the son of Abner D., who reconverted it into a saw mill.

DREW'S MACHINE SHOP on Church Street, was established by George R. Drew in 1880. It is a repair shop, and its machinery is driven by an engine of ten-horse power.

Poor Farm.—Previous to 1875, the plan was pursued of farming out the poor of the township, to be cared for by the lowest bidder. Under this plan it was hardly possible to avoid gross abuses, and the direct care of the overseer was substituted for that of contractors. This, although an improvement on the previous plan, was attended with difficulties, and in 1879 a farm of sixty-seven acres, on White Oak Ridge, was purchased by the township, and a man was employed to conduct it, and to care for the paupers on it. So successful has this plan proved that the township will soon save in expense more than the cost of the farm, and the paupers are better cared for than ever before. Caleb Van Wert has been in charge of this farm from the time of its purchase to the present.

Millburn in the Civil War.—A large majority of the people in Millburn township were intensely loyal during the war of the Rebellion. An union league of more than one hundred members was established and the township sent to the union armies a large number of men in proportion to its population. A liberal fund was raised for the payment of bounties and the procuring of substitutes. The whole of this sum has been paid, and the township has now no floating debt.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

WELLINGTON CAMPBELL.

The Campbell family are of Scotch antecedents. Thomas Campbell was born in the north of Ireland, Sept. 22d, 1769, and married March 11, 1792, to Agnes McFaul, of County Down, Ireland. Their children were Jane, Rebecca, Daniel, Agnes, Thomas, George W., John S., Mary and Wellington. Jane became Mrs. Crocraft; Rebecca, Mrs. Samuel Bradbury; Agnes, Mrs. Denman; Mary, Mrs. Brundage. Mr. Campbell emigrated early in the present century to the United States, and settled in New York State, where he engaged in farming. He subsequently leased a mill in Schoharie, N. Y., and embarked in the manufacture of paper. Later he operated a mill in Manchester, Dutchess Co., and in 1817 removed to Essex County, N. J., where he purchased a paper mill and conducted it with success for many years. His son Wellington was born Jan. 24, 1816, in Manchester, Dutchess Co., and removed, when an infant, with his parents to Essex County, receiving until twelve years of age such advantages as the common schools offered, after which time he became a pupil of the boarding-school of Ezra Fairchild, at Mendon, N. J., and remained two years under his instruction. He continued his studies at home, and at sixteen, entering his father's mill, acquired a thorough knowledge of the process of paper manufacturing. He, in January, 1839, became the lessee of the mill, and managed it successfully until the death of his father, in 1848, when it became his by inheritance. Mr. Campbell kept pace with the times and with the increase of business, introducing steam-power and various modern mechanical inventions whereby labor is lightened and the productions of the mill rendered superior in quality, hanging-paper or the stock from which wall-paper is made being made a specialty. He is doubtless the oldest representative of this manufacturing interest in the State, having been for a period of more than half a century engaged in the business which he still conducts. Mr. Campbell was, in 1844, married to Mary T., daughter of Oliver Wade, of Springfield, Essex (now Union) Co. Their children are Emily, Hattie W., Charles, Wellington and Mary D. Charles is a partner with his father in the mill, and Wellington a successful physician at Short Hills. Mr. Campbell is in his political predilections a Republican, having formerly been allied to the Whig party. He has held various local offices, and been active in promoting the interests of the township, having by his influence secured the first post-office within its limits. He was also a zealous supporter of the government during the war, advancing money for the recruiting service and in various ways manifesting his loyalty in critical periods of the country's history. He is a director of the Merchants' Bank of Newark, but not identified with other business interests aside from those at his home, at Short Hills, in Millburn township.

CHAPTER LXI.

As early as 1658 a settlement was begun upon what was called the "Bergen grant," on which a trading station had been established by the Dutch forty years before. In 1663 a band of Puritans from Long Island obtained permission from the Dutch to plant their institutions on the banks of the Raritan and Minnisink. In the following year some Quaker families were found on the south side of Raritan Bay. In the same year King Charles the Second, by letters patent under the great seal of England, granted to his brother James, Duke of York, a tract of land stretching from the Connecticut to the Delaware River. Of this extensive grant, the portion now called New Jersey was conveyed the same year, by deeds of lease and release, to John, Lord Berkeley, and Sir George Carteret.

This portion was again divided, in 1676, between Sir George and the assigns of Lord Berkeley, the former taking the eastern part.

Carteret, by his will dated Dec. 5, 1678, devised to certain trustees therein named a power to sell East New Jersey, which trust was executed three years after, and the territory became the property of twelve proprietors, and subsequently twenty-four proprietors, who appointed a council of proprietors, to consist of at least one-third of the whole number.

To encourage immigration, Berkeley and Carteret published their "Charters of Concessions," prescribing the rules and methods by which property in their lands should be acquired.

One rule was "That all such persons who should transport themselves into the province within a certain time should be entitled to grants or patents, under the seal of the Province, for certain quantities of land, paying therefor yearly the rent of one half-penny for every acre so to be granted."

Another rule was that all lands should be purchased through the Governor and Council, at the same time recognizing the right of the Indians to compensation.

In August, 1665, Philip Carteret, brother of Sir George, received an appointment from the proprietors as Governor of the colony, and appeared among the tenants of the scattered cabins about Elizabethtown, which was then but a cluster of four houses.

In 1666 the settlement of Newark began by immigrants from Connecticut, the movement being occasioned by dissatisfaction with certain measures attending the union of the New Haven and the Connecticut colonies, of which one of the most obnoxious was the "Half-way Covenant," that secured certain ecclesiastical privileges, such as the baptism of children to persons not in full communion with the church.

The pioneer company, which comprised about thirty families, came from Milford, Conn., in the spring of 1666, and their first town-meeting held on the 21st of May of that year. Delegates were present from Guilford and Braintree to assist in the organization, when it was asserted that the great object was "the carrying on of spiritual concerns, as also of civil and town affairs, according to God and godly government," which had ever been the cherished idea of the Puritans.

The settlement at Newark was among the last experiments that demonstrated the delusive hope of the old Puritans, who were greatly wise in many things, but not in all.

By the Concessions all lands were to be purchased of the Indians by the Governor and Council, in the name of the proprietors, and by this understanding the colonists expected to find all Indian claims pacified, and the way clear for undisturbed occupancy of the lands as they were needed.

As will be seen by reference to the history of Newark, whatever difficulties and fears that seemed to intervene were soon dispelled, and amicable arrangements were made, the first and second purchases from the Indians promptly ratified, and the settlers allowed to locate in peace.

The second purchase, here alluded to, covers the mountain slope upon which is Llewellyn Park and the fine summer villas of numerous New York business men, and the reader who is acquainted with the location can scarcely imagine that it was once purchased for the nominal sum of "two guns, three coats, and thirteen cans of rum," and probably diluted rum at that.¹

¹ It may interest the reader to find a fragment of the language spoken by these primitive masters of the soil, still remembered by the venerable Aaron Burr Harrison. We can fancy how often they were repeated during the negotiations above described. As will be seen, they are in the decimal system.

1. een.	11. een dick.
2. teen.	12. teen dick.
3. tethor.	13. tethor dick.
4. fether.	14. fether dick.
5. fimp.	15. bumsack.
6. latter.	16. een bumsack.
7. satter.	17. teen bumsack.
8. po.	18. tethor bumsack.
9. dibbety.	19. fether bumsack.
10. dick.	20. enock.

The territory thus acquired in the two purchases, by moral right from the native and a legal right from the proprietors, embraced the present Newark City, Clinton township, all the Oranges, the townships of Belleville, Franklin, Bloomfield, and Montclair.

For one hundred and forty years did the inhabitants of old Newark live under a single township government, and when the population became so numerous that it began to be an unwieldy multitude to handle, the aid of the State Legislature was invoked, and the following act passed:

AN ACT to incorporate a part of the township of Newark, in the county of Essex, into a separate township, to be called the township of Orange.

Passed the 27th day of November, 1806.

"I BE IT ENACTED by the Council and General Assembly of this State, and is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That all that part of the township of Newark, in the county of Essex, lying and being within the following boundaries, to wit: beginning at a spring called the Boiling Spring, on the land of Stephen D. Day, running thence in a straight line southwardly to the bridge in the highway, near David Peck's; thence running southwardly in a straight line to a bridge in the highway near Sayres Roberts, in Campdown; thence southwardly in a straight line to Elizabeth township to the line of springfield township; thence along the same to the line of Caldwell township; thence along the line of said township to a point on the first mountain, called Stephen Crane's Notch; thence southwardly to Turkey Eagle Rock; thence eastwardly to a bridge on the highway, near Phineas Crane's; thence eastwardly to a bridge on the highway, between the house of Silas Dod and Nathaniel Dod; thence in a straight line to the Boiling Spring, the place of beginning; shall be, and the same is hereby set off from the township of Newark, and the same is hereby established a separate township, to be called 'the Township of Orange.'"

Geography and Topography.—The territory embracing what is now known as "The Oranges" was originally a part of the town of Newark, and in 1806 was erected into a township named Orange. The territory embracing the four Oranges, into which they were subsequently divided by acts of the State Legislature, are bounded as follows: northeast by Bloomfield and Montclair townships, southeast by the city of Newark, south by Clinton township and Union County, southwest by Millburn township, northwest by Livingston, and north by Caldwell township.

The topography of the Oranges is such that the drainage is exceptionally fine. Between the prominent line of hills known as the Orange Mountains, but more technically termed First Mountain and Second Mountain, crossing the northwest part of the territory from northeast to southwest, and the latter forming the northwest boundary line between West Orange and Livingston townships and the low land lying west of the Palisade range, are a series of gentle elevations, not sufficiently well defined to be termed hills, but prominent enough to serve as barriers to standing water; the rainfall is, therefore, shed by these undulations, the streams finding their way into the Passaic on the northeast and Rahway River southwesterly. The result is a perfect system of natural soil-drainage, leaving all parts of the Oranges free from natural dampness, with its malarial effects.

Hygiene.—The Oranges have long enjoyed an enviable reputation for the healthfulness of the locality, and metropolitan physicians in the earlier part of this century recommended invalids to seek the air of Orange for bronchial or pulmonary affections. Being far enough inland to save the debilitated from the too bracing effects of the salt sea air, and not too far for the refreshing Atlantic breeze to reach and modify the heated midsummer air, and being equidistant from low, miasmatic river-banks and the rude, inclement winds that visit mountain heights, therefore its inhabitants are exposed neither to the deadly "chills" which rack so many constitutions nor the insidious "lung complaints" begotten so plenteously by a hard, cold climate. The long highland ridges known as the Orange Mountains send down their life-giving currents along the valleys below, and at the same time serve to shield them from the fierce blasts of midwinter. Hence this retreat affords advantages by which health cannot only be regained, but retained.

PIONEERS OF THE ORANGES.

The settlement on the Passaic River very soon began to spread itself in the direction of what is now the Oranges. The inviting plain between the Passaic and the mountain could not long remain an uncultivated woodland, with a race of hardy yeomanry growing upon its border. The following are the names of some of those who took up lands and first located in this part of the wilderness:

Aug. 19, 1675, Robert Symon, by warrant, had forty-four acres, "part of his third division on the mountain," bounded northwest by the mountain, northeast by lands of John Baldwin, Sr., southeast by Capt. Samuel Swaine, and southwest by Richard Harrison.

Aug. 28, 1675, Samuel Swaine had forty acres at the foot of the mountain, bounded on the north by John Baldwin, Sr., on the west by Robert Symon and Richard Harrison, on the east by Richard Harrison and on the south by the Common.

Sept. 10, 1675, John Baldwin, Sr., had for his third division, forty acres near the mountain, and bounded north by Capt. Samuel Swaine and John Cutlin, on the east by Richard Harrison, on the south by John Ward (distinguished as John Ward, Turner), on the west by the top of the mountain.

The Baldwin Family.—Joseph Baldwin was born about 1649, and died Nov. 21, 1681. His wife was Sarah Cooley, who died in 1689.

Benjamin Baldwin was born in 1642, and married Hannah Sargent.

Jonathan Baldwin was born Feb. 15, 1649, married, first, Hannah Ward, 1663-1693; second, Thankful Strong, and died Dec. 13, 1730.

Benjamin was probably the one that settled in Newark, or what is now South Orange. His children were Benjamin; Jonathan, married Susannah Kittell; Sarah, married Robert Young; Joseph.

Among the children of Jonathan was John, born

May 22, 1683, died Jan. 20, 1773; Joseph, baptized in 1685, married, so tradition says, a Miss Bruce, and died in 1777.

The Pierson Family.—Thomas Pierson, the progenitor of that name in Essex County, married a sister of Sergt. Richard Harrison, and in 1666 came with a colony from Connecticut, and located in Newark. His sons were Samuel and Thomas. Samuel was

Samuel Harrison, one of the sons of Richard Harrison, owned land at the mountain, but never lived on it. His wife was Mary, daughter of John Ward, Sr. By his will, dated Jan. 7, 1712-13, he gave fifty acres to his son Samuel. This lot was bounded on the north by lands of Anthony Olive; on the south by lands of Widow Abigail Ward, on the east by a highway, and on the west by the mountain. The farm was improved by Samuel, whose descendants are now numerous in the Oranges.

The Dodd Family. a numerous race in Essex County, and especially in the Oranges, are descended from "Daniel Dod" (from England), who died in Branford, Conn., in 1664-5. He and his wife, Mary, having died before the emigration to New Jersey took place, and their sons being all minors, the name of Dod does not appear among the subscribers to the fundamental agreement. Of their children, Daniel had a lot assigned him in Newark and a farm on the hill west of the town. Ebenezer was admitted a planter (on subscribing to the agreement) in 1674, and Samuel was admitted in 1679, while Stephen settled in Guilford, Conn. Mary married Aaron Blatchly; another daughter not accounted for.

The Condit Family.—John Condit,¹ the progenitor of the Condits in this country, a weaver by trade, is supposed to have been born in Wales. He came to America, and located in Newark in 1678, bringing with him a son Peter, and probably a son John; however, it is not positively known in which country the latter was born. His wife was Deborah. Mr. Condit made his will in 1703, and died in 1713, and was undoubtedly buried in Newark; yet there is no evidence of the exact location of his last resting-place.

Peter, the eldest son of John the elder, was married in 1695 to Mary, a daughter of Samuel Harrison, and grand-daughter of Richard Harrison, who settled in Newark in 1666. Peter was a clothier by trade, and probably a weaver. He made a will in February, 1714, and died during that year, leaving a widow and seven children, the oldest of whom was about twenty years of age. His children were Samuel, 1696-1777; Peter, 1699-1768; John, about 1701-1780; Nathaniel, 1703-1746; Mary, 1705, m. W. Gould; Philip, 1709-1801; Isaac, about 1711 or 1712.

Later the descendants of Nathaniel moved to Morris County, and, with few exceptions, remain in that county to the present time.

Israel D. Condit, of Millbra township, is a descendant of John the third.

Of Isaac Condit's male descendants, none are known to be in the Oranges.

Samuel, the eldest son of Peter the first, tradition says, purchased lands of the Indians, in the valley between the Orange Mountains. These lay on either side of what is now the Mount Pleasant turnpike. Samuel was a farmer, and secured to each of his sons a homestead of fifty acres. He died July 18, 1777, leaving children,—Daniel, 1723-1785; Jotham, 1727-1752; Samuel, 1729-1776; David, 1734-1777; he was known as Col. David Condit, having been colonel of a regiment of militia before or at the beginning of the Revolutionary war.

Jonathan, known as Capt. Jonathan Condit, was born in 1735, was a captain of militia during the Revolutionary war, and died in 1820.

Silas Condit, another son of Peter, was born in 1738, became a member of the State Council in 1776 at its organization, and remained a member till 1780, when he was elected a member of the Continental Congress, in which he served one term, and died in 1801.

The youngest child of Amos was Amos Ward Condit, born in 1796. He m. Mary Tichenor, by whom he had two children,—Mary E. and John M. Mary subsequently became the wife of Gen. Alfred F. Munn, one of the present prominent citizens of East Orange.

Lindsley Family.—One of the very early settlers of Newark was Francis Linlee, or Lindsley, as it is now written, from whom the Lindsleys in the Oranges have descended. In the old colony records of New Haven, the names of John and Francis Lindsley, two brothers, appear as early as 1644. The births of two daughters of Francis—Deborah and Ruth—are on record in Branford. The sons of Francis were Benjamin, John, Jonathan, Joseph, Ebenezer (and probably Daniel), who were born in Newark. Through Ebenezer, Benjamin, John and John M. Lindsley the line is traced down to Nelson and George Lindsley, the oldest living representatives of the name in the Oranges. Ebenezer died in Orange in 1743, aged 78. Joseph died at Whippany in 1753, aged 77. John, in whose will a brother Daniel is mentioned, died in Morristown in 1749, aged 82. Francis, the ancestor, was living in Newark in 1704, and must have been at that time more than eighty years of age. John Lindsley died in Orange, in 1819, aged 67. Benjamin died at the same place in 1780, aged 70, and John M. Lindsley died in Orange in 1863, aged 79. Samuel Lindsley died there in 1820, aged 60.

The Peck Family.—Henry Peck, the progenitor of the numerous Peck families of what is now Essex, as well as other counties in this State, came to this country and settled in New Haven, Conn., in 1638, and died in 1651. His son, Joseph Peck, was baptized in 1647, and died in 1720. His sons were Samuel, John, James and Joseph Joseph Peck, Jr., was born Oct. 9, 1675, settled in what was then Newark, now East Orange township, in 1694, married Lydia Ball, and died Jan. 9, 1746. His children were Sarah, Timothy, John and Joseph. The last named was born in 1702, married Jemima Lindsley, and died July 21, 1772. To follow the Munn family in their varied lives any further would not only occupy space that should be allotted to other families or subjects, but weary the reader with the many details in which but a comparatively few are interested. It is proper, however, to state in this connection that Gen. Alfred F. Munn, of East Orange, is a lineal descendant of one of the two brothers that settled in what is now Orange. Gen. Munn was born March 22, 1818, and married Dec. 1, 1841, to Mary Elizabeth, daughter of Amos W. Condit, who was born Aug. 6, 1821. Their children are Matilda F. and William C. Gen. Munn has risen through the various gradations in the State militia to that of brigadier-general, and is known throughout the county as one prominently identified with the best interests of the militia of this State, and as an officer of noble bearing and a strict disciplinarian. He is also prominently identified with the political affairs of the county and township, holding at present the offices of county coroner, justice of the peace and town clerk. He is also first and foremost in every progressive movement or enterprise calculated to benefit his community or the township in which he lives.

Among the foregoing list of pioneer names there might have been a few, and no doubt there were such, who took up land as stated, but never settled upon the tract assigned them. A few of the Newark settlers owned tracts of land at the mountain, owning at the same time small lots in "Our town on the Passayak," which they traded with town lot owners, thereby procuring at a nominal sum a good-sized farm at or near the mountain, now the Oranges. Thus, by taking up a small tract of the then forests running back from the "Passayak" (now Newark), to and including what was known as "First Mountain," and latterly as "Orange Mountain," and subsequently trading a town lot or acquiring by purchase another or adjoining lot of land, the original settler was soon possessed of all the land he could well attend to; not that it was an agricultural district, for the territory now included in the Oranges was one dense forest down to near the middle of the last century.

The pioneers who settled what was then a part of Newark (now the Oranges) had little thought that a historic interest could ever attach to them. Reared among the peasantry of England, or in the American wilderness, before the schoolmaster was abroad, they had simply the knowledge taught by their Puritanic ancestors, and the ambition to live as a godly community. Many of them could not write their names. Thus, in signing the fundamental agreements, Thomas Lyon made his mark with an L, John Brooks with the letter B, Robert Lymens with the letter V, Francis Linle with the letter F, and Robert Denison with the letter R. With none of the latter-day opportunities for education, these and other pioneers learned to make a single capital letter to answer for their signature, when and wherever they were obliged to sign a public document or a paper for record. Yet those same illiterate men made their mark upon the institutions of this territory, impressing upon them a character they never have lost. Such was the stock whence others have sprung, who have adorned the highest stations in the gift of their fellow-citizens. The pioneers brought into the wilderness with them the energy of the Anglo-Saxon, and the rigorous, yet vigorous and stable, religious principles of the Puritan. Entering this then forest with bold hearts, they placed the rude cabin by the side of the wigwam, and made the forests vocal at once with praise to God and with the sounds of civilized industry.

Early Settlers.—John Catlin had sixty acres, extending to the top of the mountain.

Richard Harrison had fifty acres on the north side of Widow Freeman's lot; also fifteen acres "upon the branch of Rahway River," bounded on the west by John Catlin and John Baldwin, Sr., on the east by a small brook running from the mountain, and on the north and south by the common.

In June 9, 1679, Thomas Johnson's tract lay at the foot of the mountain, and was in size thirteen by fifty chains, and bounded on the north by lands of John Ward, Jr., on the south by lands of John Ward, Sr., on the east by the plain and on the west by the top of the hill. Said tract to remain for fifty acres, allowance being made for bad land.

John Ward, Sr., had fifty acres, bounded on the north by Thomas Johnson, on the east by the plain, on the south by John Catlin, and on the west by the hill. Ward was one of the pioneers of the Oranges.

Anthony Oliff (or Olive) had fifty acres, bounded on the south by Samuel Harrison, on the west by the mountain, on the north and east by unsurveyed lands. This farm included on its northern border the street now known as Valley road, or that part near Tory Corners. It appears from the town-book that the owner at first took possession of more land than the agreement allowed, confessed his fault, submitted the land to the town's disposal, and by his request was admitted a planter in 1678. He married the widow of George Day, the progenitor of the families of that name in Essex County, and died without issue March 16, 1723, aged eighty-seven years. The headstone at his grave in the old cemetery bears the oldest date of the many stones in the old graveyard.

The next owner of the Oliff farm was Peleg Shores, who, on the 23d of April, 1723 (a little over a month after the death of Oliff, or Olive), conveyed the eastern and southern portions of it (one equal half) to Jonathan Lindsley, the deed being witnessed by Rev. Daniel Taylor and Matthew Williams. May 18, 1726, Mr. Lindsley sold the same to David Williams, who, in 1730, purchased the other half of the farm, the deed being again witnessed by Rev. Daniel Taylor and his wife, Elizabeth Taylor.

On June 13, 1679, Fifty-nine acres of upland were surveyed to Joseph Harrison. It was bounded on the north by lands of Benjamin Harrison, and on the northwest by "Perroth's Brook."

If, up to this time, any of the above named farms were under improvement, they were scarcely occupied as homesteads, for it was not till Dec. 12, 1681, that surveyors were chosen, of whom Richard Harrison was one, "to lay out highways as far as the mountain, if need be, and to lay out the third division to all who have a desire to have it laid out, and passages to all lands."

In March, 1685, Paul, George and Samuel Day, sons of George Day, had surveyed to them sixty acres of land, bounded on the west by the mountain, on the south by Matthew Williams' land, on the east by Wigwam Brook, and on the north by the common.

Matthew Williams, having been admitted a planter, with others, in 1680, "provided they pay the purchase for their lands, as others have done," after securing a plantation, returned to his native State, where he remained for nearly eighteen years, when he returned and made this his home during the remainder of his life. His brothers, Amos and Samuel, located here after his return, in about 1700.

In January, 1688-89, George Day exchanged lands with Matthew Williams, the latter parting with a dwelling-house, shop, orchard, and other property and lands near Newark, and receiving two tracts at the mountain, one bounded east by the Wigwam Brook, and the other (swamp land) bounded by Parrow's Brook. This last-mentioned tract evidently lay in what is now the city of Orange, and probably in the Third Ward. The place to which Williams seems to have removed his residence about that time was subsequently given the name of Tory Corners, and later Williamsville, and is still spoken of by each name. Mr. John C. Williams, in his "Reminiscences," speaks at length of this locality.

April 27, 1694, a warrant was issued to John Gardner, in right of Abraham Pierson, for a tract at the foot of the mountain, bounded on the northeast by lands of Azariah Crane, and on the southeast by lands of Jasper Crane.

CHAPTER LVII.

THE ORANGES.

The Oranges in the Land Troubles of 1740-50.—As early as 1744 we find the settlers about the mountain (now embraced in the Oranges) adopting measures for the defense of their land titles.

Contributions were raised for defraying the expenses of agents sent to Connecticut and to Horse Neck, (Caldwell), for the purpose, it is presumed, of obtaining papers or affidavits tending to confirm their rights. These land troubles and the causes leading to the difficulty are treated of more particularly in the general history of this work.

In an account book of Samuel Harrison's, preserved by Edward Pierson, Esq., of Newark, in which may be found the following "account of what each hath paid in order to the establishing their rights of land, and in defraying the charge." The dates following belong to the year 1744.

And so on through the old book may be found charges similar to these.

We find the following entry also about that time. "Jan. 23, 1744-5. Samuel Freeman brought to me two wolves' heads, and I marked it according to law, and gave him a ticket for the same." We may infer that Mr. Harrison was a magistrate, and that Deacon Freeman did not consider the poor wolves entitled to the charities of his office.

As a sample of town legislation on the subject of land troubles, we give the following:

March 10, 1746-7. It was unanimously voted, that who-ever shall cut any wood or timber on any of the land called the parsonage-land shall forfeit for every cart-load ten shillings, and so in proportion for a larger or lesser quantity, for the use of the poor; also to forfeit the wood and timber, to be fetched away by any person, for the use of the poor, the person cutting the wood or timber to be paid by the overseer of the poor. —Joseph Peck, Josiah Lindsley, Emanuel Cocker, David Crane, Samuel Plum, and David Bruen were chosen to take care of the parsonage-lands and prosecute the offenders.

In all these land troubles the proprietors looked to the judiciary for relief. Even Governor Belcher was suspected of weakness, but the courts were more reliable. Riots were followed by arrests, arrests by indictment and conviction. At the June term of the Supreme Court in 1755, a number of people were indicted, among whom were some of the good people of the "Mountain Society," viz: Jonathan Squier, John Vincent, Thomas Williams, Samuel Crowell, Nathan Williams, Samuel Parkhurst, John Harrison, Moses Brown, Benjamin Perry, Levi Vincent, Jr., Josiah Lindsley, Bertrand Pierson, Nathaniel Ball, John Baker, Nathan Baldwin, Abel Ward, John Dodd, Timothy Ball, Ely Kent, Jonathan Davis, Jr., Ebenezer Lindsley, Eleazer Lamson, Enos Baldwin, Samuel Ogden, John Brown, Jr., Timothy Meeker, Zebetee Brown, and Thomas Day. The following-named persons were fined five shillings each: Daniel Williams, Amos Harrison, John Tompkins, Ebenezer Farand, Robert Young, Paul Day, Joseph Williams, and Elisha Lindsley. Recognition of one hundred pounds for their good behaviour, for three years, and stand committed till fine and fees are paid."

It does not appear from records that the mountain settlers, as they were called, were ever called upon to stand behind the prison-bars, or pay the one hundred pounds, and no doubt they were fully established in their right to hold their possessions, which they should have been under a free government.

Extracts from Old Papers, Commissions, Etc.—Mr. William Williams, of Orange, a great-grandson of the original Williams, settler, has in his possession several copies of the Centinel of Freedom published in Newark in 1813, also military commissions formerly held by his father, from all of which we have been permitted to make a few extracts, as follows:

"On the 16th, by the same gentleman, Mr. James Matthews to Miss Elizabeth Jagger.

"On the evening of the 29th, by the same gentleman, Mr. Gabriel Foster to Miss Philetia Condit.

FOURTH OF JULY CELEBRATION, 1813.—Notwithstanding the United States were yet in their swaddling clothes, and were in the midst of a second encounter with Mother England, the patriotism of the people of Orange was bubbling up in their breasts, and even boiling over with devotion to the cause for which some of the pioneers had given their lives, while others remained to tell of the hardships, privations, and hairbreadth escapes of themselves and comrades, when we find the following notice in the Centinel of Freedom for June 8, 1813:

"At a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Orange, convened at Ira Mann's agreeable to public notice in order to make arrangements for the celebration of the coming Anniversary of our Independence, Noah Matthews was appointed moderator, and Nathaniel Bruen clerk.

"1st. Resolved that the day be celebrated.

 "NOSH MATTHEWS, Moderator
 "NATHANIEL BRYEN, Clerk."

MILITARY COMMISSIONS.—Mr. Williams has in his possession the several commissions granted to his father, William Williams, as follows: One dated Feb. 2, 1809, commissioning him as ensign of the Fourth Company, First Battalion, Fifth Regiment of the Essex Brigade.

One dated May 9, 1804, making him ensign of the Orange Volunteer Company of the Second Battalion, First Regiment of Essex.

Another is dated April 27, 1809, commissioning him as lieutenant of the Fourth Company of the First Battalion in the Fifth Regiment of the Essex Brigade.

The next one is dated June 19, 1811, promoting Lieut. Williams to be captain of the Fourth Company, First Battalion, Fifth Regiment, Essex Brigade.

The above commissions were signed by Joseph Bloomfield, Governor of New Jersey.

On Feb. 10, 1816, Governor Mahlon Dickerson commissioned Capt. Williams to be major of the First Battalion, Fifth Regiment, Essex Brigade, and on Feb. 11, 1818, Isaac H. Williamson, then Governor of New Jersey, commissioned Maj. Williams to be colonel of the Fifth Regiment of the Essex Brigade.

DRAFTS—ORDER TO CAPT. WILLIAMS—TORIES.—COURT MARTIAL—FINES.—The drafts made upon the Newark militia from time to time took many from their farms from this, then part of Newark, township. An order dated Newark, Aug. 29, 1777, and signed by Samuel Hayes, was addressed to Capt. Williams, or the officer commanding in his absence, to detach his proportion of men to relieve those on duty there whose month was just expiring; also to meet with his subalterns "at the house of Capt. Pierson, to-morrow at three o'clock, p.m., to appoint officers for said detachment, to be marched into this town on Sunday, at three o'clock, p.m." There were some Tories, of course, upon whom these orders were ineffectual.

"At a court-martial held at Newark Mountain (now Orange) July 7, 1780, at the house of Samuel Mann, for the trial of several persons, soldiers in Col. Philip V. Cortlandt's regiment, Essex County Militia, belonging to Captain Thomas Williams' company, being charged with disobeying orders in not turning out on their proper tour of duty on the 20th day of June last, and on the alarm on the 23d of June, and for desertion, agreeable to an act of the Governor, Council and General Assembly in that case made and provided, entitled 'An Act for the more effectual defense of the State in case of invasion or incursion of the enemy.'"

The court having met according to the order, found three persons guilty of the above charges, and unanimously agreed to fine them in the following sums: Jonathan Williams, five hundred pounds; Charles Crane, two hundred pounds; Joseph Tompkins, three pounds and fifteen shillings. The presiding officer of the court-martial was Capt. Josiah Pierson. The other members of the court were Capts. Thomas Williams, Isaac Gilliam, Henry Joralamon, Lieut. Henry Squier and John Edwards. Ensigns Remington Parcel, Thomas Baldwin and Ralph Post.

The fines thus imposed look quite large, and the old adage that "figures will not lie" has its falsification in our Revolutionary history.

By the act of June 9, 1790, about a month before these penalties were imposed, the Legislature had estimated the currency of the State "at the rate of one Spanish milled dollar in lieu of forty dollars of the bills now in circulation." So depreciated was the currency, as stated by the officers of the Jersey line in a memorial addressed by them to the Legislature "that four months' pay of a soldier would not procure for his family a single bushel of wheat," and "the pay of a colonel would not purchase oats for his horse." These facts will correct any extravagant opinion the reader may have formed of the atonement rendered by the above delinquents.

EXTRACT FROM SAMUEL HARRISON'S WILL, 1778.—Samuel Harrison was born in 1684, and April 6, 1748, he made his will, and Sept. 15, 1776, when the then feeble colonies were struggling for an existence, he departed this life. He was not only a Christian gentleman, but a prominent actor in the affairs of the township, and conspicuous in the land controversies that had taken place in Essex County during his lifetime.

In the distribution of his property, as related in his will, twenty-eight years before his death he divided his real estate between his sons, Amos, Samuel and Matthew, and to Samuel he gave a yoke of oxen, a horse and his young riding mare; also "a horse colt, one year old." It is very doubtful whether the yearling ever lived to be interested in the execution of the will, as it would have been twenty-nine years of age and ready to retire from active service. The "team tackling, to be equally divided as they do agree," he gave to Samuel and Matthew. This, also, if it had been kept in use the whole twenty-eight years, could hardly have given much occasion for strife. A "pale white brindle cow, with white head," was given to Jane Buel, and to Abigail Shores he gave a brindle cow, "with two suits of apparel, one for Sabbath-day and one for every-day wear, with a Dutch spinning-wheel and a Bible, and to her and her heirs and assigns forever, as a reward for her services." These tokens of grateful remembrance must have proved of small account,—the Bible excepted—provided they (Jane and Abigail) lived as long as the devisor. A blind providence is man's, but it is more commonly death, and not life, that deranges his plans and disappoints his good intentions.

HARRISON AVENUE LAID OUT.

"New Jersey, November 29th 1844.

"Whereas, application hath been made to us, the undersubscribed, surveyors for the County of Essex, to lay out a highway, four rods wide, beginning at the highway that runs up to the mountain, near the house of Amos Williams, bounded north upon his fence and a Chestnut Tree; thence running eastward over the brook on the land of Lewis Crane, by a line of marked trees; thence northeast across the land of Lewis Crane and David Crane to a maple bush marked on four sides in the line of Loui Vincent; thence running eastward along the line between David Crane and Loui Vincent to the highway that runs up to Nathaniel Crane's; thence eastward on the south side of the brook on the land of David Crane to a hush bush; thence turning over the brook and running by a line of marked trees to the northwest corner of John's (Gadman) his land, thence running down said John's his land to Tomes Brook; thence running over the brook by a line of marked trees to the road that runs by Jonathan Davis in confirmation of which we have subscribed our names."

PIONEER BOOM FOR ORANGE.—The following advertisements in Wood's Newark Gazette and New Jersey Advertiser of June 19, 1795, indicates that "building lots" and "boarders" were beginning to figure in the business nomenclature of the village at that early date:

"TO BE SOLD,

"By way of public venture, on Saturday, the 25th of July, twenty-three building lots, pleasantly situated in Orange Dale, ~~on~~ the main road, opposite the meeting-house, and adjoining the academy. Four of said lots have a never-failing stream of water running through them, which renders them convenient for tanning business. On one of said lots there is a well of excellent water, and likewise a number of good fruit-trees dispersed through the different lots, all of which are fronting on a road, which renders them convenient for both mercantile and mechanical business. They are situated in a very flourishing part of the country, and would be very convenient for any person or persons who may wish to take in boarders.

"MATTHEW CONDIT,
"JOSEPH CANT.

"N.B.—Seythe-makers, nailers and silversmiths will find it tend greatly to their interest to settle themselves, and carry on their business in this place, as they are much wanted."

The following "ad." also appeared in the same paper:

"THE ACADEMY AT ORANGE DALE.

"Opened on Tuesday, the 17th inst., under the immediate instruction of Mr Wyckoff, who has taught the English and learned languages, the arts and sciences in this place, with approbation and success, for a number of years. Those who choose to send their children to this institution may be assured that great care and attention will be paid both to their education and morals, under the attendance, direction and influence of a board of trustees annually chosen by the parish for that purpose.

"JEREDIAH CHEVEMAN, President."

"Orange, May 24, 1796.

The expenses of instruction are not given; but in an advertisement of the Newark Academy, published at the same time, and signed by "Alexander MacWhorter, minister of the First Presbyterian Church," and "Uzal Dodd, rector of Trinity Church," we have the English language, writing, arithmetic, and public speaking taught for two dollars per quarter; geography, book-keeping, Latin, Greek, and the mathematics for three dollars and twenty-five cents; French, by a native, for one guinea. Who at the present day (1884) can obtain an education at the above figures?

Orange as a Watering-Place.—Within a hundred yards of St. Mark's Church, at the base of the mountain, there was once the celebrated chalybeate spring that, up to 1824 made Orange the Saratoga of America. Every season brought to this spot hundreds of invalids and pleasure-seekers, whose presence added a new feature to the social character of the place, as this spring was from 1812 to 1824 the most fashionable resort in the United States. The chalybeate fountain of old shows now no signs or particular traces of its ancient ambition to attract the stranger. Around the old spring are groves and running waters, cascades and artificial ponds, fences of rustic-work, the foot-bridge that lightly spans the chasm, and the solid staircase hewn from the rock. The place now has for the visitor a double interest, from the beauties the grounds now exhibit and from its historic associations.

Pioneer and Later Merchants.—In the earlier period of the settlement of Orange there were no inducements for men of mercantile pursuits to embark in what would at that early period seem to be a foolhardily undertaking with a population so sparse that their combined patronage would not support a store of the smallest dimensions, and for the first thirty or more years the settlers went to "Our town on the Passayak" to do their trading and obtain their supply of groceries, which, of course, was not at that date as elaborate and expensive as at the present day.

The pioneer merchant of Orange, or, at least, the earliest that can be remembered by the oldest inhabitant, or by tradition from their ancestors, was—Stryker, who kept a small store on the main road, below what is now Day Street.

STEPHEN D. DAY was a merchant here in the latter part of the last century. His store was near that of Mr. Stryker's.

JOHN M. LINDSLEY, was one of the Orange merchants at the beginning of the present century. His store was on the corner of Main and Cone Streets, on the site now occupied by the Orange National Bank.

Another of the pioneer merchants of this place was William Condit, whose store stood on the corner of Main and Centre Streets, on the site now occupied by the flour and feed store of E. W. Hine.

IRA MUNN was also among the early merchants of Orange.

MOSES, father of William Condit, kept a store for several years in the beginning of this century on the site now occupied by the mansion and grounds of Alexander Hudnut, on upper Main Street.

Course of Travel, Highways, Railroads, Etc.—Previous to the construction of the Hoboken Branch of the Morris and Essex Railroad passengers were carried by the Morris and Essex road to East Newark only, where they were transferred to the New Jersey, (now Pennsylvania) Railroad. Just at the close of the panic of 1857 the directors of the Morris and Essex road thought they must do something to increase the income of the road; they therefore adopted a resolution to increase the fare fifty per cent. on commutation tickets, and twenty-five per cent. on way fares to Newark, and also to reduce the number of trains about one-half. This action caused great dissatisfaction among all travelers between Orange and New York, as Orange was then just coming into note as a place of residence for New York business men. A public meeting was called, and a committee of leading citizens appointed, among whom were Henry A. Howe, Lowell Mason, Rev. B. F. Barrett, Charles A. Light-hipe, I. J. Everett, Nelson Lindsley, George Lindsley, and many others, to wait upon the directors of the Morris and Essex Railroad. The committee were met by the directors with a contemptuous refusal to recede from the ground they had taken, and were told to go back to the citizens of Orange and inform them that the directors of the road understood their business; that Orange travel was not worth having, and if the people did not submit, they would "bridge" Orange over. Upon the report of the committee, the people resolved that they would be independent of the railroad and its managers, and in less than two weeks an omnibus company, under a general law of the State, was organized with a capital stock of five thousand five hundred and seventy-five dollars, subscribed in shares of twenty-five dollars each. The company elected Philip H. Kissam president, and Edward H. Ensign secretary, treasurer and manager. Single fares between Orange and Newark were ten cents, and yearly commutation tickets between the two points was fixed at twenty-five dollars.

Preceding the organization of the omnibus company Rowland Johnson and William Vreeland started a stage line between Orange and Newark, and ran it twice a day till the omnibus company was ready to take it.

During the first year the omnibus company carried eighty thousand passengers between Orange and Newark, while the capital stock was increased to ten thousand dollars, besides paying a dividend of ten per cent. to stockholders. The omnibus line was continued three years, and was made a success. Then the present street railroad was chartered and built, superseding the omnibus line, and that, too, has proved to be successful beyond expectation. The first cars were small things, and only made two trips a day, with Mr. Sharp as driver and conductor. The omnibus company was dissolved, its property sold, and about seventy per cent. returned to the stockholders.

During this time the Morris and Essex Railroad Company reduced the fare between Orange and Newark to five cents, and subsequently raised the fare to ten cents, at which rate both steam and horse cars now carry passengers between the two points.

The railroad facilities of the Oranges are unsurpassed by any of the suburban towns of New York City. The Morris and Essex being under a lease to the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad for a term of ninety-nine years, and operated by that company, with several first-class railroad-stations in all the Oranges, is giving the people an opportunity of visiting New York City twenty-eight times every twenty-four hours.

The street cars also have long afforded one of the principal means of travel from upper Main Street, Orange City, passing down Main Street, through East Orange, down Broad and Market Streets, Newark, to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot, leaving each terminus every ten minutes from five o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock in the evening. A line of street cars also runs from the Pennsylvania depot, in Newark to the Morris and Essex Railroad station in South Orange. All of these lines are well patronized, and the accommodations highly prized by the people, and thousands of the inhabitants of the Oranges pass over these lines daily.

Among the great attractions of the Oranges are the fine Macadam or Telford roads and streets. In fact, there is nothing that gives greater pleasure to the stranger within the gates of the Oranges than a ride over these perfect roads, some forty odd miles of which are laid, and which includes every thoroughfare of any importance within the territory of the Oranges. These roads are made by grading to the depth of from nine inches on ordinary carriage drives to sixteen inches on thoroughfares used by heavy trucks, and filling in with crushed trap rock, which abounds along the ridge of First, or Orange Mountain. The stone is used in several sizes, the bottom course being of larger pieces, and the others graduating up to the finest screenings, which, when rolled with a heavy steam-roller, forms a smooth, hard surface, delightful to ride upon. Daniel Brennan, Jr., introduced and constructed a majority of these roads in the Oranges.

Pioneer and Later Taverns.—The pioneer tavern of what is now Orange stood on the site now occupied by the Park House. The building was formerly the residence of Rev. Daniel Taylor, and stood on the corner of what is now Main and Hilyer Streets, and after the death of Mr. Taylor, in January, 1747-48, was removed to where the Park House now stands, and converted into a tavern, the first in Orange.

Just when the old hostelry was opened is not remembered by any of the inhabitants of the present day, but probably as early as 1755, as at that time Orange Dale, as the hamlet was then called, had assumed the proportions of a large hamlet or small village, and although the township business was all transacted at "Our town on the Passayak," yet it is presumed that from the number of inhabitants at that time a tavern or place of "entertainment for man and beast" was one of the necessary evils of the time.

The first dispenser of "provender and Jersey lightuing" remembered by the oldest inhabitant was Samuel Munn. How long he kept the old hostelry, or when he entered upon his duties, is not known at the present day. He died, however, July 28, 1812. His successor in the old Orange Dale tavern was Ira Munn, who kept the place for several years, and was succeeded by — Kilborn, who kept it as late as 1840.

The next tavern at this place was the Orange

House, on the site now occupied by the Central Hotel. It was kept from about 1800 to 1820 by Moses Condit, who was known throughout this section of the country as Landlord Condit. He was killed in 1820, while assisting in repairing his cider mill, then standing on the site now occupied by the hardware-store of Hindel & Williams, Main Street. Mr. Condit's distillery occupied a portion of the Freeman Block, between the Methodist Church and Centre Street. Mr. Condit's widow kept the Orange House for several years, and was succeeded by Isaac A. Smith, who kept it for a time and sold to Allen Reeve. Reeve sold to William Allen, who, in a few years, sold to Reeve, since which time it has been in the Reeve family, and is now owned by Edward Reeve.

G. C. Austin, who for a number of years was proprietor of the Park House, in Newark took possession of this hotel upon the 1st of November, 1884, succeeding E. Reeve. He has expended considerable time and money in refitting it. The Mansion House, a three-story brick and frame structure, located opposite the Park House, on Main Street, was built in 1870.

Other hotels are the Farmers', kept by Frank R. Harff, and the National, kept by F. Reinhardt.

CHAPTER LVIII.

CITY OF ORANGE.

GORDON, in his "Gazetteer of New Jersey," p. 201, says "Orange is a straggling village, and a post-town, extending along the turnpike road from Newark to Dover, and distant about 3 miles N. W. from the former, 219 N. E. from W. C., and 53 from Trenton; contains 1 Episcopal, 2 Presbyterian and 1 Methodist Churches, 2 taverns, 10 stores, 2 saw mills and a bark mill, from 200 to 230 dwellings, many of them very neat and commodious. A large trade is carried on here in the manufacture of leather, shoes and hats. The country about it is level, red-shale, and carefully cultivated. A chalybeate spring near the town is much resorted to."

"Orange City has a geographical position which imparts to its climate some favorable peculiarities. While it is approached by the sea on the southeast, it is very seldom that winds come from that quarter, so that invalids for whom a sea atmosphere is too severe find a shelter from its influence within a few miles from the coast. The south winds are always bland, and those from the northeast, coming from the New England coast, have left the ocean at too great a distance to be sensibly affected by it. Hence persons suffering from pulmonary complaints often experience much benefit from a residence here."—Hayt, p. 254.

The distance from Newark is about four and a half miles, and from New York twelve miles. With both places there is constant communication by the Morris and Essex Division of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, the trains of which convey passengers from Orange to New York twenty-eight times in twenty-four hours, and returning from New York, make the same number of stops at the Orange City Station. Besides this large number of opportunities for leaving the city, the Newark and Orange street car accommodations are also perfect in that direction, giving the people an opportunity of visiting Newark every ten minutes, between the hours of 5 A.M. and 11.30 P.M.

The business of the town is mechanical, mercantile and manufacturing.

The stores and large business houses which line Main Street, and which have of late years branched out on parallel and cross streets, carry on a large wholesale and retail trade. Year after year the old farm boundaries vanished, the fields were converted into gardens and building lots, the meadows into lawns, the old mud roads into Telford boulevards and shaded avenues, the straggling country village into a live, wide-awake city.

Municipal Organization.—"A meeting of the citizens of Orange, was held at Willow Hall, on Thursday evening, Nov. 17, 1859, pursuant to a call of the Township Committee, to consider the propriety of applying to the Legislature for some change in the laws regulating the Township Government. The meeting was called to order by Mr. Nelson Lindsley, when Dr. Babbit was appointed Chairman, and E. D. Pierson, Secretary. The Secretary read the call of the meeting, when Dr. Pierson moved, in order to test the feelings of the citizens, 'That it is expedient to take measures for the better government of the town,' which motion was carried unanimously. It was then moved and carried that 'a committee of five persons be appointed, who, with the Township Committee, shall determine upon some plan to carry out the wishes of this meeting, as expressed by the first resolution, and report the same to a subsequent meeting.'

"The several matters mentioned in the call, viz.: grading of streets, a police and fire department, license for the sale of liquors, division of election districts, &c., were then taken up separately, and after considerable discussion, which was participated in by Messrs. Dr. Pierson, Nelson Lindsley, Albert Pierson, J. L. Blake, R. Johnson, E. Gardner, F. P. Sanford, John Bonnell, Simon Harrison, the Chairman, and D. N. Ropes, were each referred to the Committee."

"The Chairman then announced the following as Committee to act with the Township Committee, to draft a plan as aforesaid: Messrs. William Pierson, Simeon Harrison, Napoleon Stetson, Isaac J. Everitt, and Jesse Williams. It was moved and carried, that the Chairman be added to the Committee. The meeting then adjourned."

The Town Incorporated.—In accordance with the action taken at the above stated meeting, the committee applied to the State Legislature, and on Jan. 31, 1860, an act was approved incorporating the town of Orange, the second section of which defined the boundaries of the town and wards as follows:

"And be it enacted, That the said town shall be divided into three wards, as follow: viz., the first ward shall comprise all the territory lying east of a line commencing at the junction of Centre Street and Clinton Township, thence along the centre of the same to its junction with Harrison Street, thence to the spring near William Crane's, the origin of Parrow's Brook, thence along said brook to Main Street, thence in a direct line to the centre of North Park Street, thence along the centre of said street to the Bloomfield line; the second ward shall comprise the territory lying west and north of the west line of the aforesaid first ward and the centre of Main Street and of the turnpike road to Livingston Township; all the remaining territory of the town shall constitute the third ward."

The subsequent twenty-one sections of the act pertain to the duties and power of town officers, election of town officers, mode of elections, Common Council, marshal, and various other matters and happenings in a new-made town.

Name Changed to City of Orange.—April 3, 1872, by an act of the Legislature approved on that day, the corporate name of the town of Orange, was changed to that of "The City of Orange." Thus the old long, straggling village, described as such by Gordon in 1834, has grown into a full-fledged city, with all the machinery of a city with a million inhabitants, and in 1883-84 water was introduced through pipes, from a reservoir on the west branch of the Rahway River, located between First and Second Mountains, in West Orange. (See Water Supply of Essex County in general history.)

CITY OF ORANGE.

Educational.—The history of education in the city of Orange cannot be written without trespassing upon the adjacent territories of South Orange, East Orange and West Orange, those townships having formerly been included in the old township of Orange; therefore, some of our history must be omitted to the historians of those townships.

As is well known, the settlement of Orange was coeval with that of Newark, both having been made by people who came from New Haven and its vicinity. To say that these immigrants highly prized the education of the young would be like saying that the people of Connecticut were thus minded—a fact so well known and understood as to make any affirmation of it at this day quite unnecessary.

All the love of learning which the settlers of Newark and Orange brought with them from Connecticut was transferred to these new settlements, but Orange was destined to be for a long time a purely agricultural region, sparsely populated and comparatively poor, circumstances often, if not always, adverse to educational interests.

What our early inhabitants did to promote their religious faith and interests are matters of record. In these things they are known to have been faithful to their traditions, and thence it is fair to assume that in the secular education of their children they were equally faithful.

Our people have always had the reputation of being well informed.

The proportion of those whose signatures appear by their mark is exceedingly small at all periods of our history, and this fact is always taken as an indication of a well-educated people.

It is not claimed, neither is it likely, that these first settlers and their early descendants were as enterprising in the matters of education as the people of their mother-country, but it is claimed that they were always abreast of other settlements from the same source, so far as their circumstances allowed.

The earliest incident of a purely literary character which has made itself a place upon our historic pages is the classical school for boys taught by the second pastor of the then village church, the Rev. Caleb Smith. How long he was engaged in this work is not now known. He was pastor from Nov. 30, 1748, to Oct. 22, 1762—nearly fourteen years—living in the then new parsonage (now remembered as the old parsonage) all the while, with the exception of a few of the earliest months of his pastorate. This school was probably accommodated in the study. Mr. Smith was a graduate of Yale College, and for a short time previous to his settlement here had assisted his prospective father-in-law, the Rev. Mr. Dickinson, in teaching a class in Latin, at Elizabeth, then called Elizabeth Town; a fact going to show that he probably entered upon the enterprise of teaching here soon after the beginning of his pastorate.

The evidence of the existence of this school is found in an old account book kept by Mr. Smith, with his parishioners. Evidently it was not his first book. In it we have accounts with six young gentlemen, who are charged with the price of tuition, with Latin and Greek grammars, with several classical books, one with Lucian's Dialogues, and some of them with the price of their board.

Rev. Jedediah Chapman, also a graduate of Yale College, succeeding Mr. Smith as pastor, held the pastorate from 1766 to 1800—thirty-four years. The early part of his pastorate embraced the stormy period of the Revolutionary war and the preparation for it. Whatever was done to promote learning during those years was overshadowed by political interests, and education was, to a large extent, necessarily neglected.

But we know that such abeyance, whether much or little, was short-lived. Peace had no sooner come than measures were taken to erect an academy, which was completed in the year 1786, and proved to be a substantial building of two stories, yet standing on Main Street, opposite the First Presbyterian Church. The names of the architect and artisans of this building are lost.

On April 2, 1845, the State Legislature, in authorizing the sale of the academy lot, recites certain facts as the preamble, viz.: "That on the 30th day of December, 1785, Matthew Condit conveyed by deed, duly executed, unto the Rev. Jedediah Chapman, Col. John Condit and Henry Squier, a certain lot of land in the township of Orange, in the county of Essex, in this State, of the dimensions following, to wit: One chain and thirty-six links (89½ feet) front on Main Street, in Orange aforesaid, and seventy-five links (49½ feet) deep, to hold the same in trust 'to be and remain a place for an Academy, which shall be for the use of a public school for all the inhabitants of Orange in general,' upon which said lot a school-house was erected immediately after the execution of said deed, and that after the decease of the Rev. Jedediah Chapman and Henry Squier, two of said trustees, Col. John Condit, the survivor, by his deed dated Nov. 14, 1823, made a conveyance of the above described lot not as a surviving trustee, but as in his own right, to Stephen D. Day, Rev. Asa Hillyer, Daniel Babbit, John M. Lindley, Daniel D. Condit, Abraham Winans and Samuel W. Tichenor, as trustees of said Orange Academy district, for the same use as specified in the original deed from Matthew Condit, and that it has become necessary to build a new school-house."

Rev. James Hoyt, in his "History of the First Presbyterian Church in Orange," on page 134, says, "Closely following this enterprise (the Orange sloop) was another of more lasting and vital importance to the parish. This was the founding of a public school, long known as the Orange Academy. Incipient measures were taken at a meeting of the parish, of which Deacon Bethuel Pierson was moderator, held in April, 1785. Mr. Chapman, Dr. John Condit, Dr. Matthias Pierson and four others were appointed a committee to select the location and obtain subscriptions. A site, one-tenth of an acre, was obtained of Matthew Condit. In the following January the same three persons, with Josiah Hornblower, Esq., and Bethuel Pierson, were chosen trustees. A substantial two-story building of brick and stone was put up, in which a parochial school of high grade was soon in successful operation. Mr. Chapman's name uniformly headed the list of trustees, who were appointed annually, and his love for sound learning, as well as sound doctrine, made him an efficient patron of the institution."

In making his deed above referred to, in 1823, Dr. John Condit, otherwise called Col. Condit, speaking of the character of the academy, uses this language: "To be kept and held by the trustees of the aforesaid academy, forever in trust, agreeable to the above conveyance (the original deed from Matthew Condit in 1785) to myself and others, which is as follows: 'For all the inhabitants in general of the place and neighborhood of Orange, to be and remain a place for an academy which shall be for the use of a public school.' Furthermore, it is the true intent and meaning of these presents that no particular sect or profession of people in said place shall have any right to said premises on account of the profits which may arise from it more than another, but it shall be and remain for the purpose of a good public and moral school of learning, for the use of all the inhabitants which now are or ever shall be in said Orange to the end of time."

This deed of John Condit, in 1823, having been given in his own right, and not as surviving trustee, it therefore became necessary, in order that the trustees of 1845 might be able to give a good title, for the Legislature to remedy the defect, which it did in the said act of that year.

A word or two in memory of some of these pioneers in academic education will not be out of place just here. Mr. Chapman is so well remembered as the honored pastor of the parish for more than a third of a century that he does not stand in need of special notice at this moment.

Dr. Matthias Pierson was a great-grandfather of Dr. William Pierson. He began a race of physicians which has reached its fourth generation in the person of this gentleman. He was also a student of Rev. Mr. Smith, and was prepared to enter upon the study of medicine at the classical school in the parsonage.

Josiah Hornblower, a man of erudition, a native of Staffordshire, England, came to this country in very early manhood, became a resident of Belleville, and was, just about the time he was first elected a trustee of the academy, a member of the old Continental Congress. Subsequently he was a member of the State Legislature and Speaker of the House, for many years a justice of the peace, dying in 1809, at the age of eighty, and at the time in commission as judge of Court of Common Pleas of Essex County. He is better known to later generations as the father of our late Chief Justice Hornblower.

The association which built the academy was probably for a few years purely voluntary. The earliest statute for incorporating institutions of learning which has come to the notice of the present writer was enacted in the year 1794. The trustees doubtless availed themselves of it, and soon thereafter became an incorporated body.

Our academy to-day is of very unpretending appearance, made so by age, and more so by having been used for the last thirty-seven years for the baser purposes of trade only, being used at present as a harness shop by Eugene Smith; but in its early days it was regarded with pride and pleasure as a model of architectural beauty and fully adequate to the wants of the place, as well as a high evidence of the enterprise of the people. It was used for the purpose of elementary, but more especially for classical education, and its fame drew patronage from abroad.

John McPherson Berrien, long known as a prominent and honored citizen of the State of Georgia, who served his adopted State as judge of a District Court for twelve years, in the State Senate two years, in the United States Senate fifteen years, and was also Attorney-General of the United States two years, was a native of New Jersey, and finished his education preparatory to entering Nassau Hall, at Princeton, in this academy.

Joseph C. Hornblower (son of Josiah, above mentioned), the late chief justice of this State, was a student in our old academy, and it was here that he finished his education preparatory to the study of the law as early as 1798, being then twenty-one years of age.

There is no evidence that the old academy was ever used as a parochial school, or ever intended for that purpose, in a sectarian sense. If the school taught therein was at any time regarded as parochial, the reason must have been simply that it was the most prominent one in the parish, which, at the erection of the academy, and for more than forty years afterwards, included the whole settlement. It was always a secular affair, notwithstanding the pastor and influential parishioners were its chief supporters.

NOTE.—Just here our oldest inhabitant reminds us that very early in the present century a stone school-house which stood near what is now the Brick Church, in East Orange, was demolished. It is not clear that it was taken down because worn out, but if that was the reason, it must have been built in the middle of the last century.

TEACHERS.—It is to be regretted that the names of the first teachers in the old academy were not preserved, since we come so near to them in the following notice, which appears in an old copy of Wood's Newark Gazette and New Jersey Advertiser:¹

"The Academy at Orange Dale opened on Tuesday, the 17th inst., under the immediate instruction of Mr. Wyckoff, who has taught the English and learned languages, the arts and sciences, in this place with approbation and success a number of years," etc. This notice is dated May 24, 1796, and signed Jedediah Chapman, pres't.

As the notice states that Mr. Wyckoff has taught in the academy a number of years, it is fair to infer that if he was not the first teacher, he was a very near successor of the first.

The prices to be paid are not set out in the notice, but the prices in Newark at that time, as appears by a similar notice of the Newark Academy, were: For instruction in the English language, writing, arithmetic and public speaking, two dollars per quarter; geography, book-keeping, Latin, Greek and mathematics, $3.25; French, by a native, for one guinea. The quarters were twelve consecutive weeks. The French study will no doubt raise a smile among the present members of the Board of Education of our city. Of the public speaking in the Newark Academy notice, it may be well to say that our parish voted in the year 1793, "that the public exhibition of the academy school may be held in the meeting-house," which looks as though public speaking was taught in Orange as well as Newark.

How long this favorite teacher remained at the academy is not known.

Mr. Everett, a graduate of Dartmouth College, is the next man that appears as teacher in the old academy. He is said to have taught the Academy School in the years 1801 and 1802.

Mr. Garrison, also a graduate of Dartmouth, succeeded Mr. Everett, and taught some three or four years.

Mr. Gillette, another Dartmouth graduate, succeeded Mr. Garrison, and taught about one year. We would like to give the phenomenon of the several stars in this galaxy, but it was not the fashion of the day to give them.

Abraham Harrison.—We must now introduce Abraham Harrison, the first teacher to the manor born that we hear of,—a graduate of the College of New Jersey, of the class of 1797. There is no doubt that Mr. Harrison was prepared for college in the old academy, and not unlikely by Mr. Wyckoff.

Mr. Harrison's term of teaching extended from 1807 to 1810 or 1811, at which time he was succeeded by Caleb Quinby, another native teacher, who taught in the academy about a year. Mr. Harrison's teaching, however, did not terminate at this time. He taught a classical school in his own house, at intervals, for many years afterward, and there are not a few middle-aged men now in Orange who remember him with gratitude for his skill and faithfulness. His life closed in the month of November, 1851. The late Mr. Daniel D. Reynolds was one of Mr. Harrison's pupils at the academy, and spoke of a fellow-student named Elias Harrison, who afterwards became a very eloquent minister of the gospel.

Nathaniel Bruen.—The year 1812 gives Nathaniel Bruen in charge of the academy. Mr. Bruen owned a relative by marriage of Mr. John Nicol, and owned and occupied the house now owned by Mr. Nicol, opposite Grace Church. How long Mr. Bruen held the position is not remembered. He resigned it and opened a store in the front part of his dwelling, which he conducted for a few years. Mr. Nelson Lindsley, now one of the old and respected citizens of Orange, was one of his pupils.

Polly Condit.—The time had now arrived when other schools were spoken of. During the war of 1812, or soon after its close, a school was opened by "Aunt Polly Condit," in her own house, which was a two-story building, standing on the north side of Main Street, on the site now occupied by the three-story brick building of Isaac Gans, Esq. Mr. Lindsley was also one of her pupils.

The names of Andrew H. Clark, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. O'Hara and Mr. Wood appear severally as successors to Mr. Bruen, and they cluster around a few of the following years until we come to the year 1818, during some part of which Col. Chester Robinson, a native of Massachusetts, taught the school in the academy.

Chester Robinson was born in Granby, Mass., on the 10th of January, 1793. After acquiring a thorough education he, in 1817, came to Orange as a teacher in the old academy, and at the expiration of an engagement of two years returned to his native State. In 1821 he was invited again to the principalship of the same school in Orange, and accepting the invitation, taught for a period of twenty consecutive years. He possessed signal ability as an instructor, and a rare faculty of discipline, which rendered his career an eminently successful one. Col. Robinson was very happy in his oratorical gifts, and as a public speaker forcible and impressive. His judgment was excellent, and his opinions in matters of civil and social import greatly respected. He possessed a cultivated literary taste, and was an influential member of the Lyceum, as also actively identified with the town library. He was formerly a Whig in his political associations, and later became a Republican. He filled the office of commissioner of deeds, and held various minor township positions, being also skillful as a surveyor. Col. Robinson was a man of generous instincts, and ever ready to extend a helping hand to the needy and deserving. He married, in 1822, Miss Maria Peck, daughter of Stephen Peck, of Orange, to whom were born eight children, the sur-

About the year 1831 he began to teach in Orange, at first in Masonic Hall, and afterwards in a building of his own, in the rear of his dwelling, on Main Street. This building he moved down to the bank of Parrow Brook, continuing his school in it. Formerly for a long time there stood on the lower end of the common, east of the brook, a number of willow-trees, and from these trees his school-boys named the building Willow Hall. When Mr. Pierson erected the three-story brick building over the brook he transferred the name to the new building, which it still retains.

vivors being two sons and three daughters. The latter occupy the homestead and inherit the ability of their father as instructors, being at the head of a flourishing private school in Orange. The death of Col. Robinson occurred at his home in December, 1870, in his seventy-eighth year.

Mr. Pierson as Teacher.—Albert Pierson, another teacher of the native stock, a grandson of the ancient trustee of the academy, Matthias Pierson, was a graduate of Princeton of the class of 1816, at the age of seventeen. He began his work of teaching, soon after graduating, in the Bloomfield Academy, where he spent ten years, part of the time as principal.

Mr. Pierson's teaching in Orange was generally of a classical character, and covered many years, but not continuously. He spent two years in Louishurg, Va., in teaching. In 1844 he commenced teaching as assistant in a classical school in Flushing, on Long Island, and continued there some two and a half years, making his home in Orange. In 1847 he engaged with Rev. Mr. Seymour to assist him in his select school at Bloomfield, continuing in it till the summer of 1850. Resuming his labors in Orange in his original Willow Hall, he taught a few years longer, until, on becoming invested with a justiceship, he bade the boys seek for themselves another teacher, and applied himself to his judicial functions. Mr. Pierson died in 1864.

During Mr. Pierson's first attempt at teaching, in 1831, in Masonic Hall, he had the assistance of a young man fresh from the Emerald Isle, who subsequently became one of the heroes of the Mexican war, and afterwards gained a national reputation, in the person of Gen. James Shields, as an United States Senator from Illinois.

Mr. Bracket's Experience.—Alonzo Bracket, another man of Massachusetts, spent some ten years here as teacher. Coming about the year 1840, he soon after began teaching in the old academy, continuing there several years. Purchasing the property on the west corner of South Main and Common Streets for a dwelling, which property is now owned by Mr. Chas. N. White and was latterly occupied by the late Col. Truman Hillyer, he either erected a school-house for his use, or finding a building on the ground, fitted it up for the purpose. This building, thus supplied, was occupied by Mr. Bracket to the close of his life, and is yet standing. He usually had a few boarders, but his scholars were chiefly the boys of parents living in Orange.

Albert Pierson's school was also in operation, and, as the two buildings were less than two hundred feet apart, we can imagine what were the sports at recess between these rival schools. Mr. Bracket died in the summer of 1853, at nearly forty years of age.

In 1850 or 1851, Mr. Bracket, feeling that his health had become inadequate to the proper performance of his duties, invited Mr. Charles W. Monroe to his assistance, to which invitation Mr. Monroe responded, and remained an assistant to the end of Mr. Bracket's life. Mr. Monroe afterwards, for many years, had charge of the school in West Orange, near St. Mark's Church. For a few years he had charge of the public school in Franklin district, East Orange.

Mr. Bracket had a remarkable fascination over his pupils, who were always ready to serve him in any capacity, in season and out of season. They would hasten at his wink hither and thither, bring him this and that, saw his wood, dig his ditches, the idea of compensation being the last to interest them.

INCREASED SCHOOL ACCOMMODATIONS.—About the time that Mr. Wyckoff was teaching with such success in the academy a young man was also teaching in that part of West Orange known as Tory Corners. The young man was one of Scotia's sturdy sons, Simon Simpson by name. How long he served the neighborhood is not a matter of record, but something not taking on a shape suitable to his wishes, he resigned his position and returned to Scotland. In a short space of time he married a lady of good family; was favored with children,—one son and three daughters. They were all well educated at Edinburg, and, having arrived at their maturity, came with their parents to this country, and settled near the locality of their father's early labors in education.

These young ladies were the Misses Simpson, well remembered by many as popular instructors in Orange for many years. At first their school occupied Masonic Hall, themselves residing in the Dr. Rabbit house, above the First Church. Subsequently they dwelt and had their school in the house which Mr. Bracket afterwards occupied, as already mentioned. Mr. Simpson returned to this country, as stated, with his family, in 1831 or 1832. In 1837 the family was induced to buy and build on the northwest corner of Hillyer and William Streets, and the school was continued there nearly ten years. This building was till recently occupied by Miss J. B. Dearborn's school.

After the Simpson ladies relinquished their school, the building was occupied from the spring of 1847 to 1848 for a dwelling and school by Alfred S. Williams, a son of the late Ebenezer Williams. Mr. Williams' school was a select one for boys. He continued it during a few months of 1848 on Main Street, leaving it in September of that year to take a position in an institution of learning at Lewistown, Pa.

Some little time subsequently Mr. Kelsey and another gentleman had a school in the same building, which was continued a year or so.

In October, 1852, Thomas C. Ingalls opened a school in the Simpson building, and his success was such that he was persuaded to build a house on the same lot in the following spring for the use of the school, he continuing to reside in the original structure. Mr. Ingalls' school was in operation about two years.

Our space will not admit of extended notices of all our schools; therefore we must be content merely to name them, and that, too, without regard to chronological order, and pass on.

Mr. E. L. Foote erected a school building near the cemetery, which was subsequently destroyed by fire.

Rev. Dr. Joshua D. Berry had a school for girls, with a sprinkling of boys, on High Street. William S. Hall afterwards had a school in the same building, and several years subsequently at his residence, on Main Street, where for several years before Mr. Hall's occupancy the Rev. Dr. Philip C. Hay had his school. Mr. Ten Broeck in Simeon Harrison's stone house, had at one time an excellent boarding-school for boys.

The school itself was kept in a neat little frame building in the curtilage, a few feet from the dwelling-house; Rev. S. S. Stoecking had a school in the upper part of Main Street; Mr. Nott in Bodwell's Hall, where is now the German-English school; and Miss Mary O. Williams' school was a little over the present Orange line, in Hillyer Street.

The Misses Bradshaw had at one time a very interesting school for girls in the near vicinity of the Baptist Church.

About 1870 or 1871 the Misses Stanley and Smith established a school, which was well patronized, and which they called the Orange Institute, in the old Dr. Pierson mansion, then standing on the site now occupied by the Central Presbyterian Church.

THE BRICK CHURCH YOUNG LADIES' SEMINARY.—An important enterprise, which drew much attention at its beginning and during the years of its continuance, came to the front in the year 1847. Matthias O. Halsted, a prominent citizen of liberal views residing in the vicinity of the Brick Church, saw growing up around him many young ladies of various ages not favored with educational advantages commensurate with their possibilities, and the claims which they had upon the society in which they moved. Regarding this state of things as furnishing some one an opportunity for usefulness, he conceived the idea of a seminary of a high order for the benefit of this class of young people, as well for our own citizens as for any such who might be attracted from abroad.

In pursuance thereof, he fitted up a two and a half story building, standing upon the west corner of Main Street and Washington Place, a building which had been erected about twelve years before by Amos W. Condit, another prominent citizen of that neighborhood, for a store and manufactory. This building had fallen into disuse upon the death of Mr. Condit, and by a proper arrangement of partitions and stairways, with a hot-air furnace in the cellar, was soon in the condition for the reception of pupils.

Rev. F. A. Adams, a graduate of Dartmouth, was selected as the principal of the institution, and he was domiciled in the dwelling-house adjoining thereto, a building now standing, and in about 1875 converted into a store.

The seminary opened under the most favorable circumstances. Thirty-six persons were enrolled the first day. Regarded as a necessity of the time and place, it was soon filled with the class of students for which it was designed, drawing also some from abroad, who were domesticated in the family of the principal.

Continuing for five years in its original location, furnished at the sole expense of the founder, it became necessary to have enlarged facilities for the grand purposes of the institution, which necessity led to the organization of a company of gentlemen for providing the means for placing the enterprise upon a larger basis. The company purchased the property extending from Main Street to the railroad, including a large and eligible vacant lot, upon which they erected a concrete building, planned to suit the wants of the school. In this building Mr. Adams continued as principal another five years, when finding rest and recreation to be a stern necessity, he retired from the position, with the regrets of patrons and pupils. After the retirement of Mr. Adams the institution passed to the management of other instructors, who, yielding to adverse circumstances, abandoned the field, and the seminary building is now occupied as a dwelling.

The ten and more years of this young ladies' institute mark a very important era in our history. Its advent was exceedingly opportune, supplying a great popular want at a period in which the material aid necessary to create and continue it was ready at hand. No one ever felt poorer for patronizing it, and all became richer for the intellectual stimulus and force which it was so highly instrumental in providing.

After a season of refreshment, and two years' management of the Newark Academy, Mr. Adams resumed his labors in Orange, and for about twenty years conducted a select school for boys with such continuity and success as to fully justify the popular regard for him as the veteran teacher of the city.

Mr. C. J. Prescott, at one time associated with Mr. Adams in teaching, continued his English and classical school for boys in a very fine building erected by him up to within a few years, when he accepted a position as principal of a public school in Jersey City.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS.—Orange has a number of private schools of high grade at the present time, taught by ladies, first among whom are the Misses Robinson already mentioned. Within a few years these ladies built a model school building, two and a half stories high, with all the modern improvements indispensable in a well-ordered school.

Miss Mary Eveline Ward has a pleasant little school at her residence, on Park Street, near Ward.

Miss J. B. Dearborn had a flourishing school which occupied the whole of her large building (the Simpson house, above mentioned). She afterward united with Miss Morgan, who had an excellent school on Main Street, and together they built an elegant and commodious school building on Main Street, near Hillyer, where they have one of the most flourishing schools in this section of the country, and known as the Dearborn-Morgan school.

The Misses Dobridge, Sarah and Selina, continued their labors in education at their residence, No. 18 Bell Street, Orange City, until within a few years.

About the year 1863 German citizens organized a German-English school, which was conducted in a rented building for three years, when they purchased the property on the corner of Park and Williams Streets, known as Bodwell Hall, of Philander J. Bodwell, and, moving the school thereto, it has been conducted to the present time, and is well patronized.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION.—ORANGE EDUCATIONAL FUND.—The history of public schools of New Jersey, if ever written, will be an illustration of our traditional caution and the reluctance of the great body of the people to consent to the advancement of education at the public expense. From Feb. 9, 1816, and at various times since then, as will be seen in the General History, the State Legislature has contributed towards the furtherance of educational interests. However slow it may have been, nevertheless it has been progressive.

If such was the temper of the State, it ought not to be considered surprising that the people of Orange participated in it. Why colonists from Connecticut, where public education was so early provided for, should have entertained such a sentiment does seem strange, but, like emigrants generally, they appear to have adopted the ruling feeling and views of their new home. It is not to be doubted that our ancestors believed that every parent was bound to see that his children were educated; but as one settler was nearly as well off as another, they naturally supposed it ought to be done at individual expense.

For the education of those children whose parents had come to be unable to pay Orange had provided a fund as early as 1817. It was founded on the voluntary contributions of the benevolent, who organized under the act to incorporate societies for the promotion of learning.

This fund was nourished with great care by its patrons, chief among whom was Abraham Harrison. Its proceeds were carefully and annually applied as intended, and were the means of educating many children, who without it would probably have failed of obtaining an education. The fund is yet remaining, and the revenue therefrom is devoted to the education of children at the Orphans' Home. The people of Orange will not be accounted very peculiar if it should be said of them that this fund, and the academy and the school-houses which they built, to be used rent-free, expressed their highest idea of education at the public expense, and were taken to cover all that could be required with equity for such purposes by the State.

The school officers of Orange availed themselves of the State appropriation at a comparatively early date, but twenty thousand dollars even at that stage of our population was a mere pittance among the school districts, and when, in 1838, it was increased to thirty thousand dollars, it was yet scarcely appreciable. The form of the statute was always respected, school committees were chosen at the annual town meetings, and districts elected trustees. Since 1846, when the statutes created the office of town superintendents, Orange has elected the following-named persons as superintendents: Charles R. Day, Abraham Harrison, Horatio Groves, Jesse Williams, Albert Pierson, Alexander H. Freeman, Hiram Ingalsbe, Frederick A. Adams, Benjamin F. Barrett, James Hoyt and Richard Vanhorne who filled the position successively down to the advent of the Board of Education.

Most unfortunately and strangely, the record-book kept by the town superintendents is not to be found. The book kept by the town clerk, records that in the year 1848, the town-meeting having failed to make any appropriation for the poor, for roads and common schools, the town committee cured the neglect by voting the necessary appropriation, the sum for the support of schools being required to be equal to the State appropriation.

In the year 1851, as appears by the same book, the town-meeting voted one and a half dollars per child within the lawful ages. In 1849, $154.81 was received from the State; in 1850, $170. In 1851, $205. The amount raised by town, $1.50 per child, is not on record.

The year 1852 indicated the potency of the statute of 1851; that year the town voted $2000; the next two years, $2500 each year; from 1855 to 1862 inclusive, $3000. In 1860 the town received from the State $762.94; in 1863, $629 was received from the State, while the town voted the sum of $2300. For the two years 1864 and 1865, $1414 was received from the State, the town voting each year $3500. In 1866 the town tax was reduced to $2500, and $759.18 was received from the State.

SCHOOL BUILDINGS.—At the annual town-meeting in 1851, Abraham Harrison was elected town superintendent for the fourth time, his services being closed by death in November of that year. The town then comprised eleven districts, requiring a fraction of South Orange to complete one of them (now Clinton township).

The larger and more central districts availed themselves promptly of the new legislative privileges, wrote out anew and with more precision the certificates of their several boundaries in conjunction with the superintendent, and filing them with the county clerk, advanced at once to the dignity of corporations.

The loss or disappearance of the town superintendent's minute-book is a serious embarrassment to your historian. Precisely how the schools have been managed down to the period now under consideration was in that book a matter of record. Now recollection must be substituted for record, and that just here seems to be provokingly faint; that the schools were managed as well as they could be under the circumstances, and that the teachers worked cheaply, that the people paid, or as many of them as could be persuaded to pay, is about the sum of information from this source.

The trustees of the academy district having in the year 1845 obtained the legislative aid they desired, sold the lot and building to John M. Lindsley, and purchased a part of the lot in Day Street on which the old frame school building lately stood, and now occupied by the tank of the Orange Gas-Light Company, who bought the lot when the Park Avenue School-house was built.

The first purchase was made by Ezekiel B. Smith from Thomas D. Spiking, and the deed dated Oct. 26, 1846; the lot measured fifty feet front by one hundred and twenty feet deep, and the price paid was one hundred and fifty dollars. Mr. Smith bought it apparently as the agent of the trustees, for on the 4th of September, 1847, he conveyed it to them.

A building three-fifths the width of the old frame school building was constructed in 1846-47, and was ready for occupancy early in 1848. The rear part of the lot (it is two hundred feet deep) was afterwards purchased of Stephen D. Day, Esq. Judge Day sold at a price per acre, naming a rate which he thought sufficient, but when the measure was applied, it amounted to an insignificant sum, very much to his amazement. This building, after being used for many years, was sold when the Park Avenue School-house was built, and became a tenement.

Before the house was completed and the walls dry the trustees had arranged with Miss Eunice P. Robinson, daughter of Col. Robinson, to move her private school of some forty pupils into the second story and transfer it to the female department of the public schools. This position was held by Miss Robinson for two years. The first floor was assigned to the boys, the teacher of whom being Alexander S. Lincoln. Mr. Lincoln made himself janitor, general manager, etc., relieving Miss Robinson of all care of that kind. Mr. Lincoln resigned after teaching one year, and was succeeded by a gentleman who resided in Newark, who taught another year only.

Upon the retirement of Miss Robinson and the male teacher, in the early spring of 1849, Miss Letitia G. Halsted, of New York City, assumed the duties of the female department April 16th, and E. Monroe Dodd was appointed teacher of the male department. This arrangement continued satisfactorily for the next two years, or until the last of April, 1851, when the building was closed, and remained so during the summer and fall months of that year. This suspension was caused by lack of funds. Late in the fall of that year the trustees engaged Robert N. Cornish, a graduate of the Normal School of Albany, N. Y., to take charge of both rooms. He entered upon his duties Dec. 8, 1851, with an enrollment of forty scholars, and before the winter closed the rooms were filled, and a room in Masonic Hall hired and also filled by the primary department. At the close of the term, in June, 1852, two hundred scholars were enrolled.

The first district school tax, under the law of 1851, which we hear of in this town, was levied at a meeting held in the old academy district, which had, under the statute, assumed the name of "Central" in the spring of 1852. The levy was four dollars per child. The sum realized by the tax is not on record, but it was judiciously applied, by anticipation, by the trustees in enlarging the building during the summer vacation of 1852.

During the terms of Mr. Cornish, which extended over a period of over four and a half years, he had at various times as his assistants his brother, Alonzo G. Cornish; Miss Harrison, daughter of the late Abraham Harrison; Miss Adaline Carroll, a lineal descendant of Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, and a niece of Rev. Hollis Read, then a resident here; Mary Quinby, Endora Smith, Anna Babcock and several other ladies of equal merit.

In 1858, at a cost of three hundred dollars, an addition of thirty feet was made to the school lot, which completed its present dimensions, the money being raised by a district tax. Like the first purchase, the title was taken by an individual, Hiram Ingalsbe, who was then town superintendent, and was held by him till June 14, 1861, when he tendered it to the trustees.

Jan. 31, 1860, the State Legislature changed the legal standing of the township, by raising it to the dignity of a town or borough corporation, placing its municipal government in the hands of a mayor and Common Council; all tax levies to be fixed by the popular vote, as heretofore, and no change was made in public school organization.

In 1861 the propriety and advantage of combining the districts lying in the central part of the town, came to be seriously considered and much discussed. The movement is said to have begun in the Ashland district, now included in the township of East Orange.

Mr. E. L. Bartholomew was one of the teachers there. He found a great lack of uniformity in text-books, with all grades of pupils. He invited the then principal of the Young Ladies' Seminary (the history of which is herewith given), to address the patrons of the school and trustees. The desire for centralization was strengthened and diffused by discussion, and during the fall and winter of 1861-2, became quite general in the Ashland, Central, and St. Mark's districts, embracing territory reaching on Main Street, from Walnut Street, in East Orange, to the top of the first mountain, and having a northern and southern boundary of various courses, and containing as per statement and report of the superintendent, two-thirds of the eligible children of the town.

About March 1, 1862, measures had been taken by the town superintendent and a majority of the trustees of each of these districts, which they supposed had resulted in the abolition of the districts according to law.

April 7, 1862, the legal voters of the districts met as one district at Willow Hall, upon the call of the town superintendent. Mr. F. A. Adams was chairman of the meeting, and J. Addison Freeman the secretary. The meeting elected three trustees for the district, viz.: David N. Ropes, Benjamin F. Barrett, and William Pierson, Jr. This board of trustees, jointly with the superintendent, on the fourth day of June then next ensuing, filed in the county clerk's office their certificate of incorporation.

On the 16th of June, a meeting of the new district which had been named "Central District," was held at Willow Hall and after a lively discussion adjourned. The adjourned meeting was on the 28th, and for want of room for the audience, adjourned to Library Hall, where Andrew Britton was made chairman and L. H. Hill secretary of the meeting, when two very important measures were adopted. One was the adoption of St. John's parochial school as one of the schools of the district, and the other was to tax the district the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars, for the support of the schools for the current year. This was a district tax the town already having voted the customary three thousand dollars.

This was just at the beginning of the second year of the Rebellion, and every man was alarmed at the financial condition of the country, quite as much as at the Rebellion itself. With the present population of Orange, that tax would seem very moderate, but then it was looked upon as extravagant. One gentleman in the audience, a prominent man and heavy tax-payer, and the only one who had the courage to raise a dissenting voice, gave as one of his reasons for dissent, the fact that he had already recently been taxed for school purposes in two districts the sum of ten dollars.

Blunders were found in the action of the trustees in abolishing the then old district, and relief was sought and obtained through the courts, and the former proceedings set aside. The supreme court at its session in June, 1864, having heard and considered all the evidence pro and con, and the arguments in relation to the three original districts and the formation of the consolidated "Central District," uttered these words through the Judge, who delivered the opinion: "I think the three districts were never legally abolished, and consequently, that the tax was illegally imposed, and that the abolishment and the vote imposing the tax should be declared void, as against the prosecutors. Proceedings set aside." This opinion was based upon the illegality of the proceedings taken in abolishing the three original districts.

The opinion of the Supreme Court dissolved the central district into its original elements and the old regime was allowed to resume its sway in peace.

In 1863, a successful effort was made in the legislature to divide the township. The year before, for geographical reasons, the township of Fairmount had been set off. This township included all the mountain district, west of Perry Lane. Now the disintegration was continued and a new line some distance east of the valley road was made our western boundary line, the intervening district being added to Fairmount, and the whole of it called West Orange. The township of East Orange was broken off on a line a few hundred feet west of the Brick Church, and continued on a course which ran near the eastern boundary of Rosedale Cemetery to the Bloomfield line. Thus Orange was dispossessed of much of its territory, but it still retained the bulk of population.

For the next five years the public schools of what had become the town of Orange, reduced to two districts, and a few fragments of districts, followed the usual methods of district organization, until the 3d day of April, 1868, the Legislature enacted that the public schools should thenceforth be under the management and control of a Board of Education, incorporated by the name of "The Board of Education of the Town of Orange."

This board was constituted of nine members; three from each ward; and the legislature made the first appointments in manner following, to wit: For the

In the next succeeding year the charter of the town was thoroughly and systematically revised except in relation to the Board of Education, which having been so recently enacted and drawn with great care, did not require revision.

This centralization of the work of public instruction, in the hands of one body of men, has been attended with the anticipated and customary good consequences. The varied interests have become one. Uniformity in the course of study and in the adoption of text-books; a thorough system of discipline; the selection by rigid examination of principals for the several buildings, and teachers for all the departments; the choice of a superintendent as the general agent of the board in all matters of tuition; providing school-houses and keeping them in repair and in a comfortable condition at all seasons; the sum of these duties proceeding from one source, produces and promotes a unity of effort of great value, which can be obtained in no other manner.

In concluding this historical sketch, the historian cannot forbear to congratulate his fellow-citizens upon the condition of the educational interests, present and prospective, in Orange. He has noticed briefly our principal private schools, which stand high in the public estimation, and justly so.

SCHOOLS IN 1884.—The condition of the educational interests of the city, so far as the public schools are concerned, is given in the following lines, compiled from the annual report of Prof. U. W. Cutts, superintendent of schools, for the year ending in March, 1884:

The statistics show a gain of 59 in the total enrollment, 84 in the average enrollment, and 99 in the daily attendance, as compared with the numbers of the year 1882-83, and of 131 over the average daily attendance of 1881-82.

The best interests of the schools, regarded from every point of view, demand that the school-rooms shall not be crowded. With one exception, Orange has less pupils to a teacher, on the average, than any other city in the State.

The work accomplished during the year compares favorably with that of previous years. In some of the branches of study there has been a decided improvement. In the teaching of arithmetic in the younger grades numerical frames and counters of various kinds are used for purposes of illustration. In the older classes practical questions have largely taken the place of abstract examples.

The closing exercises of the High School were held in Music Hall on the 28th of June, 1883. The music was furnished by pupils of the high and grammar schools, under the direction of Mr. Butterfield. The graduating class was smaller than for several years previous.

Out of thirty-three pupils in the A grammar class of 1879, fourteen entered the High School in the following September, and this number was reduced to four at the time of graduation. The names of the graduates were George M. Gill, A. Alonzo Stagz, Grace A. Condit, Harriet E. Van Ness.

MEMORIAL.—In the death of the Hon. A. H. Freeman, late president of the Board of Education, the public schools of the city experienced a loss not easily estimated. The senior member of the board in age and, with one exception, in length of service, he had been for years closely identified with the educational interests of Orange. To a strong common sense he united a broad intelligence and decided literary and scientific tastes. His interest in the schools was unceasing, and of a nature paternal in its character. Cautious in his acceptance of new methods, he heartily welcomed those which were approved by sound judgment, or which had stood the test of fair trial. To the teachers he was the wise counselor and the trusted friend, and his memory will always be held by them in grateful esteem.

The Orange Free Library.—In the early part of October, 1883, a committee of ladies, consisting of Miss Martin, Mrs. J. L. Blake, Mrs. John Gill, Mrs. J. S. Cox, Mrs. John Burke, Mrs. J. T. Kirtland, Miss Pierson, Miss Linne and Mrs. J. F. Dennis, met, and after a full discussion of the subject, and an impartial consideration of the obstacles, as well as the encouragement to the project, decided and planned the opening of a free circulating library and reading-room. They also decided that it would be wise to limit their first undertaking to a term of a few months, and that they would not appeal to the general public of Orange for assistance, but defray the necessary expenses by their own exertions. On the 7th day of December, 1883, the Free Circulating Library of Orange was opened, a room on the second floor of Central Hall having been hired for the purpose.

This room is free to all, from three until nine p. m. The reading table is furnished with the best daily papers of New York and Newark, with various local papers, and the best supply of magazines and periodicals that the committee are able to procure. The shelves now contain a total of three hundred and forty-eight volumes.

Since the library was opened the average daily attendance the first month was fifty-three, and the average number of books loaned eleven. The second month, sixty-two the average attendance, fourteen books daily loaned; the smallest attendance, twenty; the fewest number of books loaned, three; this was on the opening day. Total attendance first month, nine hundred and seventy-nine; second month, one thousand six hundred and fifty-seven,—showing an increase of six hundred and seventy-eight. As ninety-five readers have attended the reading room in one afternoon and evening, it is plain that the room, twenty-four by eighteen, is greatly overcrowded.

The expenses incurred since the opening of the library show that at least eight hundred dollars will be necessary for its annual support. A few interested friends have contributed money, books, letters, tables, chairs, pictures to decorate the room. Painters, carpenters and others have also given their time and aid.

The experiment proved a great success, which no doubt confers lasting honor on the intelligence of the reading public of Orange, who rallied so nobly to the support of this branch of the educational interests of this prosperous little city. The secretary and librarian in 1884 was A. McK. Dennis.

CHAPTER LX.

CITY OF ORANGE.

Industries of Orange—Societies—Fire and Police Departments—Banking.

In the occupation of opening and developing an unbroken forest, as was the case two hundred years ago with the territory now embraced in the Oranges, the first industrial pursuit to be engaged in or that attracts the attention of the pioneer is the clearing of a small patch, large enough on which to erect his cabin, and on which to raise a few vegetables for the first or succeeding year. From 1666 to 1700 but little advance was made in the settlement of the territory, now covered with a population of over thirty thousand souls. During that period, as will be seen by reference to "Pioneer Settlers" on another page, there could be seen only the smoke from an occasional cabin curling itself heavenward and mingling with the ethereal blue above it. Then the Indian path that led from the Newark settlement on the Passayak, up through a dense forest, to the foot of and over the First and Second Mountains, was the only avenue of travel, which answered every purpose of the original occupants of this territory. The sturdy pioneer, as he marched boldly up the old Indian path, now Main street, with his haversack hanging by his side, and his axe and rifle upon his shoulder, saw at once the difficulties and dangers that beset him. He found the red man peaceable and ready to be treated with for a portion of his possessions, but he saw also in the dense forests a deadly foe in the form of wild beasts and reptiles. Looking around him, he saw the sturdy oaks, the lofty pines, the branching and giant hemlocks; the beech, the maple and all other kinds of timber natural to this climate, and, more especially, larger quantities of the beautiful ash, of both varieties. Standing upon the tract which had been pointed out to him as his purchase, or warranted tract, he thought of the comforts of that beautiful home he had left in the Connecticut Valley for the forests, wild beasts and Indians that surrounded him; and what a contrast! The decision had been made, and, almost like the law of the Medes and Persians, was unalterable. He thought of his loving wife and little ones, who were depending upon him for a home and future support and happiness. Here he was: the first blow had to be struck; he selects the top of a knoll, or the little plateau just up a little way from the brook, upon which to build his cabin. The first giant hemlock or basswood is felled; the bark is peeled off in lengths of four, six, or ten feet, as he wants them, to make a shelter until he can get something better. Thus he works till night comes on, when he gathers wood and brush for a small circle of fires, inside of which he can rest secure during the night, from the attacks of the howling wolves, the hungry bear or the blood-thirsty panther. Thus he works from day to day, until he has a patch of ground cleared, logs enough cut, and of the required length, to build his cabin, when he invites his neighboring pioneers to help him "log up" his mansion. Now, every one knows how a rough log house is made; therefore we will not describe it. In a few days, or weeks at most, the pioneer family moves in and civilization is established. For several years their nearest neighbor is beyond the sound of conch shell or tin horn, and neighborhood feuds are unknown. Thus the first industrial blow was struck in what is now the Oranges. From the pioneer log cabin has developed a large and bee-hive-like city. From that first little patch of cleared land has grown the many beautiful farms and gardens embraced in this territory. From the old Indian path has grown the large number of streets, broad avenues, the street and steam railroad, improvements that never entered the most vivid imagination of the most air-castle-building pioneer of two hundred years ago.

In the clearing up and settlement of this part of Newark, afterward's old Orange township, the first mercantile industry that presented itself to the pioneers, who were wondering what to do with the surplus timber, was the manufacture of staves and heading, from the large quantity of oak and ash timber then standing upon the site of the present city of Orange.

As this part of what is now Essex County was heavily timbered, and of the kind suited for cooperage purposes, it became a source of profitable revenue for the pioneers who had payments to make upon their land purchases. The market for staves and heading yearly or quite two hundred years ago, was Newark, or rather, "Our town on the Passayak." The purchasers were sloop-owners sailing between that point and the West India Islands. The staves and headings thus split from the oak and ash of what is now the Oranges, and sold to West India traders, were manufactured into sugar and molasses hogsheads, and carried to all parts of the then civilized world. This industry was carried on for many years, or until saw mills were introduced, which was well towards the year 1700, or a few years later.

The pioneers that opened this territory came from a land of frame houses and barns, and after a few years' experience in building log houses and barns, felt the necessity of a saw mill whereby their exceedingly fine timber could be converted into the kind of lumber they had been accustomed to see in buildings.

Mills, Tanneries and Shoemaking.—The pioneer saw mill, as nearly as can be ascertained, was built on Wigwam Brook, in 1728, by Samuel Harrison, a son of Richard Harrison, one of the pioneers who came here in 1666. A man by the name of Sanford was the carpenter or millwright. The mill stood about sixty rods above where ex-Judge Jesse Williams now lives, corner Day and Washington Streets, in the city of Orange.

In 1780, Mathew Williams built the grist mill that stood on the site now occupied by the old stone mill of Judge Williams, on Day Street. In 1840 the present stone building was erected while the old mill was yet in operation. The present stone walls were built around the outside of the old frame mill, floors and machinery adjusted without interfering with or delaying the grinding that was being done for customers. The old mill stands as a monument of former times, and is a link binding two centuries together. It stands on Parrow Brook, and was abandoned for milling purposes several years ago. Capt. Thomas Williams was for many years the "old miller" at the stone grist mill.

Some time during the last quarter of the last century Col. John Condit built a paper mill about half a mile above what is now Day Street bridge, on Wigwam Brook. A large business was done at this mill for many years. The foreman of the mill in its palmy days was no less a personage than Charles J. Ingersoll, afterwards United States Treasurer under General Andrew Jackson's administration. The old mill went to decay many years ago.

Still farther up the Wigwam Brook was the saw mill of Abijah Harrison. This, too, served its time, and went to decay before most of the present generation was born.

Another lumber mill stood still farther up the old Wigwam, built by Matthew Williams. In connection with the saw mill was the Williams' tannery, which for many years was the principal tannery of this section of country. After serving their allotted time, both were abandoned for the purposes for which they were built, and now scarcely anything remains to mark the spot of these once flourishing business places.

During the latter part of the last century, and long before St. Mark's Church was thought of John Condit had a small tannery and shoe shop near the present site of the church. This, with other tanneries, went to decay soon after the hemlock and oak bark had become scarce and cost too much for the profit of small tanneries. There were during the same period, two or three small tanneries, farther down the valley, along the banks of the upper Rahway River, which, like the others, succumbed to the necessities of the time.

One of the important pioneer industries of the Oranges was the manufacture of boots and shoes, made from the leather manufactured at the several tanneries in Orange and vicinity. One of the pioneers in the business was a Mr. Canfield, who was probably a larger manufacturer in that line than any one in this locality. Another of the pioneer shoe manufacturers was John Dean, whose factory was near what is now Brick Church Railroad Station, in East Orange. The business was commenced here in about 1785, and in 1820 it had become the principal business in the Oranges, even as much so as the hatting business is of the present period. The boot and shoe manufacture continued brisk until 1850, when it declined a little until 1860, or at the outbreak of the Rebellion, in the spring of 1861, when there was a revival in the boot and shoe trade, when Orange once more became one of the great boot and shoe manufacturing centres of the United States. Thus it continued until the close of the Rebellion, when another retrograde movement began, which has continued to the present.

The pioneer tailor for the Oranges was Giles Mandeville. He "whipped the cat" from house to house, the same as the pioneer shoemaker, and made "fits" for young and old out of home-made cloth. He was known far and near as "Uncle Giles, the tailor." His son Abram, born in 1805, occupies the old mansion on Main Street, Orange.

Hat Manufacturing.—The manufacture of fur hats was established at what is now Orange in 1785 or 1790, and, as near as can be ascertained, James Condit was the pioneer hatter of the territory now embraced in the Oranges. His shop was on Centre Street, over Parrow Brook, in which he was succeeded by — Haslet. He was soon followed in the business by Cyrus Jones, when they became the leading hat manufacturers, and remained so for several years. In these shops the now venerable Abram Mandeville learned the trade, commencing in 1821, when fifteen years of age. Then came Israel Hedden, Lewis Williams, — Griffin, Stephen Stetson, Albert Tichenor, and others. Hedden's shop was about on the site now occupied by Eckert's paint-shop, near Willow Hall. These were all in the hat business here previous to 1840. John Stryker had a shop where Smith's drug-store now stands, corner of Main and Centre Streets. Just where all these hat shops were located, or the number of men employed, is not in the memory of any one now living. Probably the most of them were along Wigwam Brook, as the water of that stream is said to be the best for the manufacture of hats. No doubt Mr. Stetson located on the Rahway, in the valley where the Stetson factory is now located. James Condit had a hat-shop in the early part of this century on the corner of what are now Main and Cone Streets, on the site now occupied by the Orange National Bank. The hat, like the boot and shoe business has been subject to many changes, and so numerous and transitory have been the hat manufacturers of Orange from the establishment of the business here until the present time that it would be impossible to give the name and location of each one.

E. B. WHITING.—The firm of Mandeville & Whiting was established in 1858, on the corner of New Street and McChesney Lane, in a shop originally built and occupied by Robert McChesney, in what is now the city of Orange, where for several years they carried on the hatting business. Mr. Mandeville subsequently retired from the firm, since which time Mr. Whiting has continued the manufacture of soft fur hats. In 1858 the factory was enlarged to double its original capacity, and can now turn out fifty dozen hats per day, with an average force of fifty persons employed.

F. BERG & Co., corner of Forest and South Jefferson streets, are among the largest hat manufacturers in Orange. Their works are large and capacious brick buildings, with first-class machinery operated by steam. The capacity of the works is from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dozen soft fur hats per day, which gives employment to over two hundred hands. The firm is composed of Frederick Berg, F. Berg, Jr., and Francis Berg. The New York office is at 91 Spring Street.

JAMES YOUNG & SONS, New Street near Day.—The original hat factory, on the site now occupied by that of Messrs. Young, was built in about 1840 by —McChesney. Mr. Young commenced the hatting business at this place in 1850, where for many years he did a large business in the manufacture of hats on commission. In 1873 the factory was enlarged to a manufacturing capacity of one hundred dozen per week, with a working force of fifty persons. In 1881 his son John became a partner in the business, since which time they have manufactured and sold on their own account.

W. F. STOCKER.—In 1852, Mr. D. F. Stocker, father of the present proprietor, built the hat factory located on New Street, and in 1876 enlarged it to its present capacity of three hundred dozen hats per week. Here Mr. Stocker carried on the hatting business until September, 1882, when he died. Since then the business has been conducted by his son, W. F. Stocker, who employs about one hundred hands when the factory is in full operation.

M. EBERLEE & Co., composed of Max Eberlee and William Wang, commenced the manufacture of hats at their present location, No. 69 New Street, in 1869, where they continue the manufacture of medium and fine grade light-colored fur hats. In 1880 the factory was enlarged to its present capacity of eight thousand dozen hats per annum, and now gives annual employment to an average of ninety-five persons.

CHARLES KEARCHER, whose hat factory is on New Street, opposite McChesney Lane, came here in 1869, and purchased the factory of Simon VanNess, and in 1874 rebuilt and enlarged the factory to its present capacity of three hundred dozen medium-grade soft fur hats per week, and now gives employment to one hundred and fifty persons.

J. AND G. H. GILL, Lumber Street, near the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad.—This is the only exclusively hat body forming mill in Orange, and was built in 1872, by the present proprietors, John and George H. Gill. Here the fur used in the manufacture of hats is made into a thin, slazy cone, and when laid flat measures nearly two feet across the base, and about the same distance from base to apex, and more than this for a wide-brim hat. The building is a large three-story frame structure, filled with the latest improved machinery for the manufacture of hat bodies or cones, and operated by steam-power. The Messrs. Gill employ eighty persons on an average, to whom they give steady employment, and manufacture from three thousand to ten thousand hat bodies per day. The discrepancy in the amount made per day is caused by the brisk or slow demand of hat manufacturers.

BRANDIES & Co., Kelsal Place, near Day Street. The officers of the society are: President, Mrs. F. Henderson; Vice-President, Miss Amy Lowrie; Treasurer, Mrs. J. D. Mills; Secretary, Miss C. E. Westcott; Superintendent of Laundry, Miss McAllister; Matron, Mrs. Enderle. Its membership includes ladies from thirteen Protestant Churches in the Oranges, as follows: North Orange Baptist, First Presbyterian, St. Mark's Episcopal, Grace Episcopal, Central Presbyterian, Brick Church (Presbyterian), Munn Avenue Presbyterian, First Methodist, First Reformed, Trinity Congregational, Valley Congregational, Christ Episcopal and the New Church. The object of the society is the permanent improvement of the needy, to effect which it aims: To see that all deserving cases of destitution are properly relieved; to make employment the basis of relief and inculcate habits of self-dependence, self-respect and industry; to prevent indiscriminate and duplicate giving; to secure the community from imposture; to reduce vagrancy and pauperism by ascertaining their cause, and removing it when possible. The society has changed its headquarters several times, being located in a building in Park Street, near Main, for about two years. In the summer of 1883, through the munificence of Mr. Robert F. Westcott, the society came in possession of their present quarters, in Essex Street, near Main. Mr. Westcott purchased the property and building, and at a considerable expense, improved and graded the surrounding grounds, repaired the building and donated the whole to the society for the benefit of the poor of Orange. The report of the treasurer up to Oct. 31, 1883, showed that the receipts during the year had been $1167.54, and the disbursements were $1142.51.

The Orange Fire Department.—The changes of a few years have brought about a radically different state of things regarding the protection to life and property from fire. In 1860, when Orange was making a desperate effort to break from the chrysalis state of existence and emerge into the full vigor of life as a rising and progressive municipality, the township was totally unprotected from the ravages of fire. For a year or two there had been a small hand-engine in the place, brought hither by Mr. H. M. Graham, one of the enterprising citizens of those days, and the "Pioneer" was the joy and admiration of the embryo fireman of the period, but it was a dream that lasted but a short time. The township committee refused to purchase the machine; some of the good old-fashioned folks, who had lived three-score or more years under the same roof as their ancestors, and had never suffered from any extensive devastation by fire, did not think it right that the township should put any burden upon the taxpayers for fire-extinguishing apparatus, and some of the wide-awake citizens were positive that if the machine was kept in the town the boys would burn up all the barns and outbuildings in the remote places, just for the fun of getting the engine into service. Mr. Graham saw it was useless to press the subject upon the town committee, and the engine was returned to its owners. In 1860, when the town was incorporated, Mr. Graham, who was fond of jest, made a burlesque report to the towns-people, of the condition of the fire department of Orange, of which he had for several years been by common consent dubbed the "chief engineer." His report represented the most reliable apparatus of the "department" to be a syringe, a large sponge and a bucket. This satire of the "chief" was well received, but it was nevertheless ineffective, and the town remained so totally unprotected that a blacksmith-shop and dwelling near Willow Hall, not fifty yards from the centre of population, were destroyed by fire in broad daylight, and a woman and two children were roasted alive before a ladder long enough to reach the second story window could be brought to the place.

Happily, Orange is now provided with complete fire apparatus and an effective force of men to use it. An organization was effected in 1865, but it was not until 1867 that the Hook and Ladder Company was formed, a nucleus from which the present department has grown. Charles Arcularius was then the chief engineer, and the volunteer system secured subsequently a steam fire engine, a hose-carriage and a hook-and-ladder truck, besides which there was a hand-engine located near Valley Station.

In 1873 the paid fire department was organized, under Chief Engineer John J. Fell. Another steamer was added, with a hose-carriage, and horses were then first used for drawing the apparatus. The department consisted of fifty-five members, but when the steamers were taken out of service, in 1883, the number was reduced to thirty-eight. With a constant pressure upon the water-mains of sixty pounds to the square inch, and one hundred and eighty-two hydrants, distributed through all parts of the city, the steamers are not likely to be often required for active service, and are now standing idle. The department is now organized comprises the following apparatus: In the Canfield Street house, No. 2 hose-carriage carrying one thousand feet of hose, with necessary tools, and No. 1 truck, equipped with eight ladders, four extinguishers, buckets and the usual implements.

In the Valley engine house, corner of Mitchell and South Jefferson Streets, stands the wagon of Hose Company No. 1, carrying one thousand feet of hose, two extinguishers, a ceiling-hook, bucking-ram, etc. The city has about two thousand six hundred feet of hose, and in case of fire, is now considered well equipped to battle with the flames. The chief engineer is Thomas Harrop, who has been connected with the department since 1869, and has served in all the offices up to that which he now fills. The assistant engineer is William Jaqui.

The city appropriates six thousand dollars a year for the support of the fire department, of which about five thousand dollars is required for salaries.

Police Department.—From the date of approval of the first charter for the town of Orange there has been some sort of a police, or officer answering to that name. As the town advanced in age and population the duties of that branch of the town or city government were increased, and the men became more proficient in their several departments of the work, until, in 1884, we find a very efficient corps of police, under the control of Chief Marshal William McChesney, from whose annual report, on Feb. 29, 1884, we make the following extracts:

"The present police force consists of fourteen men, viz.: the marshal, two sergeants, one roundsman, ten regular patrolmen. They are detailed for duty as follows: The marshal, one sergeant, and two patrolmen for day service; one sergeant, the roundsman, and seven patrolmen for night service, with one man on reserve, who is on duty half day and half night.

"There have been 680 arrests made during the year, being 78 less than last year. Of this number, 628 were males, and 52 females; 642 were white, and 38 were colored. Of the offenses, 243 were for drunkenness, 45 for being drunk and disorderly, 81 for breach of the peace, and 51 for larceny. Of the whole number, 102 were boys.

"There were 2792 persons provided with lodgings at the police station during the year, being 873 more than last year; 2757 of these were males and 35 were females; 2783 were white and 9 were colored. The largest number of lodgers for one month was during the month of March, there being 664. The smallest number was in July, 26.

"Lost and stolen property amounting to $3275.96 has been recovered and restored to the owners.

"There have been fines and costs amounting to $809.78 collected during the year; received from shows, etc., $30. The incidental expenses were $86.33, making the amount paid to collector $753.45.

There were 89 prosecutions for violations of city ordinances during the year. There are 76 saloons having a city license to sell beer, being two less than last year; there are 13 hotels having a county license. There are, in addition to these, 16 places where liquors and beer are sold on draught by measure under an United States license, making a total of 105 places in the city where spirituous and malt liquors are sold."

CHAPTER LXI.

CITY OF ORANGE.

RELIGIOUS INTERESTS OF ORANGE.

First Presbyterian Church.¹—This church, the oldest in the county outside the city of Newark, was organized in 1719, and comprised that portion of the members of the original Congregational Church at Newark then living in what is now Orange and its immediate vicinity. It was organized as "The Mountain Society," and known as such for nearly or quite a century, and by the older people for a much longer period. As late as 1753 the parish embraced what is now all the Oranges, the townships of Livingston, Bloomfield, Montclair, and Caldwell. How changed are the aspects, relations and circumstances of the congregation! Still it adheres in the main to its early faith, but has felt the force of surrounding influences upon its original ecclesiastical usages and forms.

The parent society at Newark was originally composed of Congregationalists only, and the process of change in church polity was necessarily slow. When the second Pierson manifested some leanings toward the Presbyterian order, the displeasure of his people was excited, and troubles arose, which resulted in his dismissal, thus proving conclusively that the change in church government was not made without some little friction. Yet, on Oct. 22, 1719, Joseph Webb, in the line of his successors, was ordained and settled over the same flock by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and the next year took a seat in the Synod with a ruling elder from his church at Newark. That event in all probability precipitated the organization at this place; at least, a comparison of dates makes the supposition appear at least probable.

The records of the Newark Church and those of this church also, it is said, perished in the flames or were lost in the time of the Revolution. But in a parcel of old deeds and other papers preserved by the trustees of this church is a deed for twenty acres of land from Thomas Gardner to "Samuel Freeman, Samuel Pierson, Matthew Williams and Samuel Wheeler, and the Society at the Mountain associated with them," which bears date Jan. 13, 1719. As the year began then on the 25th of March, January followed October in the calendar. The deed was therefore given about three months after Mr. Webb's ordination and settlement in Newark. This coincidence taken in connection with the previous history of the old society at Newark, and with the well established fact of the Congregational form of government of the Mountain Society, until after the death of its first minister, affords presumptive evidence of the opinion expressed above, that the change which took place in Newark, stimulated the new movement at the mountain.

The deed of Mr. Gardner was given in "the sixth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord, George, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, defender of the faith," etc., the deed informs us was sold "for divers good causes and considerations, me therunto moving, but more especially for and in consideration of the sum of £25 current money of New York." It was "to be and remain for the use and benefit of a dissenting¹ ministry, such as shall be called to that work by the grantees before named, and their associates from time to time." The land is described as "scituate, lying and being in the bounds and limits of Newark, aforesaid, on the east side of a brook commonly called and known by the name of Parow's Brook." Beginning at said brook, near a bridge by the road that leads to the mountain; thence running easterly as the road runs, so far as that a southwesterly line crosses the said lot (it being twelve chains in breadth) shall include twenty acres of land, English measure; bounded southerly with Joseph Harrison, westerly with said Parow's Brook, northerly with said mountain road, and easterly with my own land." This locates the land east of the present Willow Hall, south of and including the present park between the Mansion House and Park House.

FIRST CHURCH EDIFICE.—In 1720 ground was purchased of Samuel Wheeler on which to erect a house of worship. This again favors the supposition of a recent organization, and Dr. Stearns places the event "in or about the year 1718,"² as a congregation was doubtless collected at the mountain by that time, and yet it seems scarcely probable that the church had existed two years before steps were taken to build a sanctuary. With such light as the above facts give, there is no doubt the society took organic form some time during the year 1719.

A meeting-house, which was the central object of interest in every community of Puritans, was the next demand. The site selected for it was on the highway, in the middle of what is now Main Street, between Day and Centre Streets. There are men still living in Orange who remember distinctly the location, and how the road-bed parted, and lay on either side of the old church, and united again on beyond. Who the architect was is not known, neither have the particulars of the contract been preserved.

The mountain congregation, however, was not entirely dependent upon the old society, for Samuel Pierson was a carpenter by trade, and his sons, Joseph, Samuel, James, David and Caleb, all of whom lived to man's estate, and were subsequently identified with the interests of the church, and prominent in township affairs, very likely knew something of the trade.

It is surmised that the pioneer sanctuary went up under the supervision of the elder Pierson, though the use of the broad-ax, saw and auger may have been left to younger hands. Doubtless there were others of the craft connected with the building, and many a right hand lent its cunning, while many a rough hand, accustomed more to the labors of forest and field than to those of the carpenter's bench, lent to the enterprise its manly strength. By whom the pioneer edifice was dedicated is not known, but it is probable that Mr. Webb, of the old society, was among the ministers present, for tender ties yet existed between him and the separated portion of his flock.¹

It is much more easy to guess who were some of those who occupied the pews. There was probably Anthony Oliff, or Olive, if not too infirm to attend, and probably the oldest man in the society, eighty-five or more years of age. There was also Nathaniel Wheeler, who had passed his fourscore years, and Matthew Williams, aged about seventy, and probably Azariah Crane, a veteran of seventy-four, and many others.

High up in a little pulpit, with sounding-board above, sat the minister of the day. And in his place, a personage not to be overlooked, stood the precentor, to line out the psalm which the minister had read, and lead the congregation in the solemn service of song.

Time has brought with it many changes not affecting the spirit and benefit of religious worship, and among other things, a change in church polity. The Mountain Society, however, had maintained its independent relations now for about thirty years. But the influences that caused the independent movement resulting in the organization of this church were now yielding to others. The generation of its founders was passing away, and new circumstances produced new views. Either before or in connection with the acquaintance made with Rev. Caleb Smith, who came to them in 1747-48 as their pastor, the church resolved to conform to the prevailing type of ecclesiastical order in the province, which had by this time become almost entirely Presbyterian in form and church government.

SECOND MEETING-HOUSE.—Through all the adverse influences under which the Mountain Society had passed it yet showed signs of prosperity, and Rev. Caleb Smith, their second pastor, had been with them but a very few years when the erection of a new and better place of worship was undertaken. The following contract refers to the finishing of the house the year after its erection :

"Articles of agreement entered into this 13th day of March, 1754, between the Committee of the Society of Newark Mountain, regularly chosen to manage in the affair of building a new meeting-house in said society, by name, Samuel Harrison, Samuel Freeman, Joseph Harrison, Stephen Dod, David Williams, Samuel Condit, William Crane and Joseph Riggs on the one party, and Moses Baldwin on the other party, whereas the said committee have bargained and agreed with the said Baldwin perfectly to finish the said meeting-house, excepting the mason-work, which now remains to be done in the same, which articles of agreement are, as to the most considerable particulars, as follows :

"1. The said Baldwin shall faithfully and honestly finish the said house in the general, after the model of the meeting-house in Newark

"2. The said Baldwin shall find all the material for finishing the said house, such as timbers, boards, sleepers, glass, oil and paints, nails, hinges, locks, latches, bolts, with all other kinds of material necessary for finishing the said house after the model aforesaid, excepting the materials for the mason-work.

"3. He shall ceil the arch ends above the plate and under the galleries, with whitewood boards, and paint the same well with a light sky color.

"4. That he shall take the desk of the old pulpit and so new model it that it shall be proportionable to the rest of the work, and that the rest of the gun-work be as the house in Newark, and oiled.

"5. That he shall make six pews, one on each side of the pulpit, and two on the right and two on the left, fronting the pulpit, with doors and hinges.

"6. That he shall make shutters for the lower tier of windows, painted blue and white.

"7. That he shall set all the glass, and paint the sashes, and put springs in the same to prevent their falling.

"8. That he shall make a row of pews in the front gallery, next the wall.

"9. That the said committee shall pay to the said Baldwin for finishing the said meeting-house, as above mentioned, provided he completes it by the first day of December next, the sum of two hundred and forty pounds current money of this province, the payments to be as follows, viz.,—that he shall be paid forty pounds upon demand, one hundred pounds more upon the first day of December next, and the last hundred pounds upon this day twelve months.

"10. That the said Baldwin shall employ any of the joiners belonging to this society for so long a time as they shall chuse to work, until they have paid what they shall freely give to the said meeting-house, and that he shall allow them four and six pence per day.

"11. That the said Baldwin shall have whatever he can get out of the old meeting-house that he shall work up into the new, together with all books, and hinges, and locks.

"All which articles we whose names are above written do promise and oblige ourselves faithfully to perform and fulfil. In witness whereof we have hereunto interchangeably set our hands the day and year above written." 2

By the autumn or, at farthest, the winter of 1754, the then new house of worship was ready for occupancy. It was built of stone, and was more for endurance than architectural beauty, and stood in the middle of Main Street about midway between the present church edifice and the store of N. & G. Linsley.

THE PARISH INCORPORATED AND NAMING THE CHURCH.—During the pastorate of Rev. Jedediah Chapman, and more than sixty years after the organization of the church, measures were taken to incorporate the parish, its property previously having been held in trust by private individuals for the benefit of the congregation. At a session of the State Legislature, then held in Burlington, an act passed June 11, 1783, incorporating Joseph Riggs, Esq., John Range, Dr. Matthias Pierson, Stephen Harrison, Jr., Samuel Pierson, Jr., Samuel Dodd and John Dodd a board of trustees, the church now receiving the name of "The Second Presbyterian Church of Newark." Their tenure of office was perpetual, and in ease of vacancies by death or removal, the power of appointing their successors was conferred upon the "minister or ministers, elders and deacons of the church." The power also extended to the displacement of a trustee, whenever the said ministers, elders and deacons, or a majority of them, should judge his removal proper and for the benefit of the corporation. The trustees were required to be persons of the congregation, and the number was limited by law to seven.

TRUSTEES' OATH OF OFFICE.—Each trustee, in assuming office, took the following oath:

"1. I do solemnly swear I do not hold myself bound to bear allegiance to the King of Great Britain.

"2. I do solemnly profess and swear that I do and will bear true faith and allegiance to the government established in this State, under the authority of the people.

"3. An oath to execute well and truly the duty of a trustee, agreeably to the true intent and meaning of the Charter."

The charter required these oaths to be taken and subscribed by "each and every of the trustees herein appointed and their successors," agreeably to "an Act for the security of the Government of New Jersey," passed Sept. 19, 1776.

The trustees being duly qualified before John Peck, Esq., at the parsonage house Sept. 22, 1783, organized by appointing Joseph Riggs president, and John Range clerk. Mr. Riggs moved to New York the same autumn, when Jonathan Hedden was elected his successor.

The leading features of the charter were not in harmony with the spirit of the times, and the Legislature, agreeably to a petition of the congregation, so amended it, June 3, 1790, as to make "all regular supporters of the gospel in said congregation" electors in the appointment of trustees. The elections were to be held annually on the second Thursday of April by a plurality of voices.¹

CHANGING NAME OF CHURCH.—By the division of the township of Newark in 1806, and the formation of the township of Orange, it became necessary for the church to change its corporate name, and in 1811 application was made to the State Legislature, when the name and title was changed from the Second Presbyterian Church of Newark to the First Presbyterian Church of Orange, which name it still bears.

THE PRESENT CHURCH EDIFICE BUILT.—During the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Hillyer the present beautiful and substantial church edifice was erected. Mr. Hillyer had been with this people about ten years, when he had become so popular in his ministrations, and occupying the only pulpit then in the Oranges, his congregations were naturally large, filling the old stone meeting-house to overflowing. Mr. Hillyer, no doubt, saw the difficulty standing in the way of greater usefulness, and resolved in his own mind to remedy the evil, provided his parishioners coincided with him.

He felt that a new and larger church edifice, one that would better accommodate the people, was sadly needed. Time and the progress of population had created what seemed to him a necessity for this. He made the proposition to his people, when some approved, some objected, some thought it feasible, while some thought it impossible. He asked certain persons of the latter class if they would favor the undertaking, provided he would secure the subscription of a certain sum of money, which he named. Of course the answer to such a query was in the affirmative. He started out with his paper on Monday morning, and by the close of the week had procured double the amount specified, Mr. Jared Harrison opening the subscription list with five hundred dollars, when a laudable emulation was awakened, and those who refused donations stood ready to purchase pews. The thought once fairly before the people, kindled desire, and desire led to action.

At a parish-meeting held in May, 1811, the trustees were authorized to purchase a half-acre of land for a site, lying on the north side of the road, and it was purchased of Stephen D. Day for the sum of four hundred dollars, the site now occupied by the church. The next year the work began under the direction of the trustees, assisted by a building committee. It was voted by the parish that the front and sides of the new edifice should be built of dressed stone, the rear of undressed. The trustees employed an architect, Moses Dodd, and proceeded with the work, many members of the parish preferring to turn in their labor on subscription account. As near as can be ascertained, the corner-stone was laid Sept. 15, 1812. At a meeting of the parish in April, 1813, it was voted to take down the old meeting-house and use the material in the construction of the new. The stone tablet over the door of the old building was transferred to the inside of the tower of the new, where it remains to the present time. The size of the new building is sixty-three by ninety feet, including the convexity of four or five feet in the rear wall, but not including the projection of the tower in front, of four feet. The walls are thirty-six feet from ground to roof, and the tower, eighteen and a half feet wide was carried to the top of the building, and finished in 1814 by Mr. Dodd, the architect, at an extra cost of two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. The church was dedicated, as nearly as can be ascertained, in December, 1813, Mr. Hillyer preaching the sermon from Gen. xxviii. 17. The cost of the edifice, including the steeple built in 1814, was thirty thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. The parish in April, 1814, voted that the surplus money raised by the sale of pews in the new church remain in the hands of the trustees, to defray the expenses of finishing the house, purchasing a bell and chandeliers, and fencing the church lot. The fund at this time amounted to about six thousand dollars, the most of it secured by bond and mortgage.

¹The time was changed in 1829 to the 1st day of January, and in 1856 to the second Monday in April.

PROPRIETARY LAND GRANTS.—Among the inducements held out to the settlers by the proprietors of East Jersey was the offer of two hundred acres of land for the support of public worship in each parish. A warrant for the survey of two hundred acres and meadow for a parsonage was granted to the Newark settlers Oct. 23, 1776. The actual survey, however, does not appear to have been made till April 10, 1796. In process of time, as the civil and religious affairs of the town were separated, and new religious services were formed, these lands became a source of much contention. The Mountain Society and the Episcopal Church (St. Mark's) demanded a division, claiming for themselves an equal share with the First Society, as they were a part of it when the land grant was made. The latter had the legal title to sustain it in claiming the whole. From 1760 onward for many years the subject was agitated in almost every town-meeting.

Votes were passed and then rescinded, as the opposite parties happened to be in the majority. In March, 1761, "at a very full and public town-meeting," it was "voted and agreed that the said lands, granted by said letters patent to lie for a parsonage be equally divided in quantity and quality, exclusive of the improvements made thereon, among said three societies or congregations." Bethuel Pierson and five others were "appointed agents to divide and allot said lands to said societies, and to apply to the Governor, Council and General Assembly to confirm the same by law." In this committee, those who represented the old society refused to act, and the trustees of the society entered their protest on the record, thus frustrating the measure and prolonging the strife.

In 1784 (Dr. Stearns, by authority of Dr. MacWhorter, gives it 1786 or 1787) the animosity was quieted by a compromise, the new societies (First Presbyterian and St. Mark's, of Orange) receiving a dividend of the lands, but holding them under lease, as tenants-at-will. In May of that year a lease was given to the trustees of this parish for eighty-six acres and sixty hundredths of an acre.

THE OLD PARSONAGE.—If, when Samuel Harrison was writing the accounts of his fulling mill and saw mill, he could have foreknown what was yet to be the historic value of a single leaf of his account-book; that after a hundred and fifty years the church records of that day would all be lost, the names of its officers lost, and all knowledge of the age and origin of the old parsonage lost, till the said account-book should open its bronzed and tattered lips to reveal the interesting secrets; possibly that knowledge would have secured for the volume a more careful handling and a choicer place in his writing-desk. Beyond a doubt it would have put in exercise all his clerky skill.

This Samuel Harrison was the second of that name in Newark, and a grandson of Sergt. Richard Harrison. He exercised the quadruple functions of magistrate, farmer, fuller and Sawyer.

From the entries in his book we learn that in July, 1748, he was sawing "oke plank, gice, sleepers" and other material, and also receiving sundry sums of money "on account of the parsonage." The money was received in sums ranging from a few shillings to near twenty pounds from David Ward, Jonathan Shores, David Williams, Thomas Williams, David Baldwin, Nathaniel Crane, Noah Crane, Azariah Crane, Stephen Dod, John Dod, Eleazer Lamson, Gershom Williams, Ebenezer Farand, Peter Bosteda, William Crane, Jonathan Ward, Jonathan Sergeant, Samuel Cundit, Joseph Peck, Deacon Samuel Freeman, Bethuel Pierson, Thomas Lamson, Samuel Wheeler, Robert Baldwin and Joseph Jones,—a list of twenty-five names, representing, probably, the heads of families.

The old parsonage was not built upon the parsonage lands on the south side of the road (now Main Street), but upon a four-acre lot purchased of Matthew Williams, lying "on the north side of the highway that leads to the mountain, near the house once the Rev. Daniel Taylor's, late of Newark, deceased." It lay opposite the twenty acres previously owned by the parish, and included the lot now owned and occupied by Grace Episcopal Church. The deed was given Sept. 14, 1748, the price being "four pounds per acre, current money of New Jersey, at eight shillings per ounce."

The house was to be of stone, and while Harrison's saw mill was turning out "oke plank, gice," etc., the quarry was yielding solid material for the walls. As spring came on Mr. Harrison's day-book received sundry charges (at the uniform rate of three shillings sixpence per day) for work done on the parsonage. May 3, 1749, was employed in "slaking lime." Another day was devoted to "topping up the chimney." The summer saw the work completed, and in September, 1749, the young minister, Caleb Smith, and his young and beautiful wife were happily installed in the new stone mansion, then one of the best houses this side of Newark.

That mansion was destined to have a long and eventful history. It was occupied about thirteen years by Rev. Mr. Smith, then several years by ten-

"We find the above date (1784)," says Rev. Mr. Hoyt, "in an original paper preserved by the trustees of this parish, from which, and other papers in their possession, we gather also the following facts: The lease given to us about May 10, 1784, to be continued at will, was revoked by the Newark trustees, acting under instructions from the society. May 20, 1787, thus reviving the controversy. In 1802 another conveyance was made, by lease of fifty-six acres, lying between Newark and Orange, the terms of the lease being that it should be renewed at the end of each twenty-one years, forever, the lessee paying an annual rent of sixpence if demanded. The lease was renewed in 1823, which was the only title the old society could give under the original grant. But having applied in 1825 to the Legislature for a special act enabling them to convey the land in fee-simple, such an act was passed, and a deed of the said fifty-six acres was given to the Orange Society, Aug. 29, 1826, which settled all land controversy between the societies. The land, however, has long since ceased to be the property of the parish."

ants, then thirty years by another pastor, and fourteen years by another pastor, and finally occupied as a tenement-house for about forty years before its demolition.

What memories gathered around the old parsonage! There were life's sweetest pleasures and its tenderest joys. It beheld in turn the hymeneal joy and the mourner's anguish, the serene happiness of the fireside, the calm intellectual life, the steady flame of devotion; all that is generous and grateful in the charities of the heart and the benefactions of the hand, had there a home. Many a kind token found a silent way to its kitchen, its wardrobes, and its library. Warm greetings were exchanged within its doors, and vigorous thoughts were born there. Well-beaten oil went from it to the candlestick of the sanctuary; and there freedom found ever an advocate, if not always a shelter, and in the days of the Revolution it was a mark for British vengeance. But He who guards and blesses the habitation of the just, preserved the old parsonage from the torch of war and the accidents of time till more than a century of years had rolled over it.

Sacred as were the associations which once had clustered round this ancient domicile, they had all been separated from it, or nearly so, by its latter uses, and nobody thought of expending upon it a sigh or a sorrow when its destruction took place. The destruction of the edifice was not the destruction of the material, and it may be of interest to the people of Orange, as they step into Gosline's feed-store, in Willow Hall, or walk over the unnoticed bridge in front of it, that separates their feet from the waters of Parrow's Brook, to know their personal proximity to some of the enduring relics of the old parsonage. As a "beam out of the timber" of the first meeting-house still remains to tell something of its substance, so more than one "stone out of the wall" of the good minister's home still endures, a not unfitting symbol of joys and affections which, like itself, have passed into other relations without ceasing to exist. The old parsonage having been purchased in 1854 by Albert Pierson, one hundred and five years after it was built, its "precious stones" (which, like the piety they once enshrined, were none "the worse for wear,") were set anew, some in improvements about Mr. Pierson's dwelling, some in the foundations of Willow Hall, and some in the bridge over Parrow's Brook, while others have found a still more sacred use in Rosedale Cemetery, where there are "sermons in stones," if anywhere. It is likely they will long remain there, associated henceforth with the solemn eloquence of the dead.

THE NEW PARSONAGE—Many years previous to the demolition of the old parsonage it had been occupied only as a tenement-house, thus bringing a small revenue to the society, but was of no benefit to the pastor-in-charge.

In 1836 measures were taken to provide a parsonage more suited to the wants of parochial necessities.

A lot on High Street was purchased of Abraham Harrison, "near his residence, at two dollars per foot, fronting on a new street soon to be opened." The lot purchased had a frontage of fifty feet, to which Mr. Harrison added an equal amount by way of donation. Upon this lot a parsonage was built, the contract price being eighteen hundred and seventy-five dollars, and the money raised by subscription. The house was finished in the spring of 1837, and occupied by Rev. William C. White. Upon the retirement of Mr. White from active service, in 1855, the church, in addition to salary paid, donated to him the parsonage and lot, which is still in possession of his heirs.

At present the church is without a parsonage, only as rented.

THE PARISH LANDS SOLD—BUILDING LOTS—THE COMMON.—The growth of Orange previous to 1802 had created quite a demand for building lots, and in that year the parish was seized with a speculative fever, and resolved to sell a portion of its lands along Main Street for building lots, the interest to be appropriated towards the support of the gospel. Five lots north and eight lots south of the street were accordingly sold, for the sum of three thousand five hundred and forty-six dollars, secured by bond and mortgage.

The strip of ground already used for a "common," lying opposite the parsonage (the parsonage then stood in what is now Grace Church grounds), was to be reserved for that purpose for ever. The eight lots lay along the southern border of this (from Willow Hall east), and contained six acres and fifty-eight hundredths of an acre. The common was for a special and patriotic use, as well as for the public convenience and for the adornment of the village. The martial parade drew hither annually its display of military and a crowd of citizens, old and young, who in those days looked forward upon the occasion as the carnival of the year. Generous dinners were furnished by mine host Munn, who for many years kept the old and popular hostelry, on the site now occupied by the Park House. Traveling hucksters and auctioneers also did a thriving business by the wayside.

ORANGE SLOOP—Among the other sources of revenue with which the old First Presbyterian Church drew funds from time to time to defray incidental expenses was a project formed in 1784, and called the Orange sloop. The plan was to buy or build a boat to be used for the benefit of the parish, and run it between Newark, N. J., and Albany, N. Y., stopping at intermediate ports. Subscriptions for this purpose were received, and at a parish meeting it was resolved to build a boat, for which purpose a committee of three managers was appointed. In due time the little craft was launched from near the dock the parish had purchased in Newark, and was under full sail on its useful mission, the parish to receive one-third of the profits from each trip. The income from this source was from forty to sixty pounds sterling each year.

In 1806 the parish trustees resolved to build a store-house, eighteen by thirty feet, on the Orange dock. The contract for building the store-house was awarded to Amos Harrison for $239.75, he being the lowest bidder.

In building the Orange dock and store-house a mortgage for seven hundred and fifty dollars was executed by Jacob Plum (no doubt for the trustees or parish), bearing date May 25, 1812.

Subsequent to this date we find that the Orange dock was sold, and we infer that the sloop owned by the parish was included in the sale. The proceeds of the sale were probably applied to the building fund, and absorbed in the erection of the present church edifice, which ended the shipping interests of the Mountain Society, as far as it was concerned as a parish.

THE OLD CHURCH BELL.—The old bell that hung in its modest quarters in the old steeple was taken down when the old church of 1754 was demolished, and suspended on a pole to perform its last offices in calling the workmen to their tasks. Some time previous to this the tongue had dropped out when its voice was needed on a funeral occasion, and was taken by the bell-ringer and struck upon the rim of the bell, by which a fracture was produced. The bell was taken to a blacksmith, who attempted to weld the fracture. Not being an expert in working metal of that kind, he melted a piece out of the bell, which proved, however, more of a success than failure, as, by this accident, the tone of the bell was in a good measure, restored. Having in this condition continued to do duty, it was now, as stated, put to a useful service in calling the workmen from labor to refreshment and vice versa. But the bell was destined to share the fate of the old church,—bequeathing its metal, while losing its individuality. As the new church drew near completion, one of the workmen, named William Halsey, to secure the parish against possibilities which excited uneasiness in some minds gave the old bell a finishing stroke with his hammer. A piercing knell, and the tongue which had so long discoursed solemnly of eternity and sweetly of heaven, which had called a generation to their nightly repose and to their weekly devotions, which had been the music of their lives and a mourner at their burial, was now forever silent.

EXTRACTS FROM TRUSTEES' RECORDS.—During the building of the second meeting-house, in 1754, the pastor, Rev. Caleb Smith, seems to have kept the accounts with the several contributors to the building, among whom was May 20, 1754, Samuel Jones, credited for six loads rough stone, 15s.; David Peck, four loads, 10s.; David Williams, by Dave Taylor, two loads, 3s.; Deacon Freeman, laying sleepers, two days, 7s. Justice Harrison, William Crane, Thomas Williams, Samuel Cundict, Isaac Cundict, John Cundict, Stephen Dod, David Williams, Capt. Williams (probably Matthew), Isaac Williams, Joseph Harrison and others, for "taking down the ceiling of the old meeting-house," and for other work, were duly and equally credited at the rate of three shillings, six pence per day.

In "Justice Harrison's" old account-book, may be found a series of charges to the parsonage account, in July, "when," says the record, "we raised the meeting-house galleries."

From the records kept by the trustees of the parish during the period of Mr. Chapman's pastorate we select the following:

At the annual meeting of parish, in January, 1785, "a move was made by Mr. Samuel Pierson, that there were not a sufficient number of musical clerks for the convenience of public worship;" and "it was agreed to by the major part, that Nathaniel Crane, John Dodd, Jr., Aaron Munn and Joseph Ward shall assist in that office." The custom still continued of reading the lines as the psalm was sung. Watts' Psalmody was then in use, but the time of its introduction is not known. As early as 1763 "Sundry members and congregations" within the bounds of the Synod had adopted it, and the Synod had "no objection to the use of said imitation by such ministers and congregations as incline to use it, until the matter of psalmody be further considered."

"Jan. 12, 1786.—Voted that Stephen Harrison, Esq., do provide a good box or chest, with a lock, to contain the books and public writings belonging to this parish."

"March 12, 1786.—Voted that Cornelius Jones be paid four shillings a load for six loads of stone used at the parsonage well. Also that any person getting stone on the parsonage lands allotted for this parish shall pay into the hands of Deacon Amos Baldwin, Treasurer, the sum of one shilling the load. Also that the old parsonage field may be plowed for a crop of buckwheat the ensuing summer, and that the parish receive every fifth bushel free from all expense, except some person will give more."

"Oct. 12, 1786.—Voted that the buckwheat for the rent of the parsonage land is to be converted to the use of the whole parish. Also that the price of the buckwheat shall be two shillings and sixpence per bushel."

"Jan. 15, 1787.—Voted that the widow of William Matthews have the care of opening the meeting-house and sweeping the same, and taking all care respecting it that those formerly appointed for that purpose had, for the sum of one pound two shillings and sixpence for three months."

During the next year (1788) John Tiehenor received the sum of fourteen shillings for pulling down the old oven and building a new one in the parsonage.

In 1789 the "old parsonage field" was put again to buckwheat, the parish to have "every fourth bushel, if nobody will give more."

In 1791 it was "Voted that Aaron Munn do go through the parish and settle with all delinquents respecting Mr. Chapman's rates, and make report to the Board of Trustees; for which service he shall have a reasonable compensation from the funds of the parish, agreeable to a vote of the same."

In June, 1791, Deacon Baldwin resigned the office of treasurer when twenty shillings were voted to his daughter Esther "for her services as Treasurer for a number of years."

In November of the same year Mr. Munn reported that he had spent six days in collecting rates, for which he was rewarded in the sum of as many shillings per day for "him and horse."

It appears that some of the then acting board of trustees put an easy construction upon their oath of office; for in January, 1792, we find the board adjourning to meet again on the 30th of said month, "at Samuel Munn's, at Sandown, on forfeiture of sixpence." This little addition to the weight of official responsibility appears to have wrought the needed reform, for at the hour specified all the trustees were present.

In 1792 the burying-ground was let out to Josiah Quinby at six shillings. The burying-ground was also enlarged this year by the purchase of about two acres of land from the executors of the estate of Samuel Ogden. Also the parsonage received repairs, and a new roof was put on the meeting-house.

In 1795, Josiah Quinby was engaged by the trustees to ring the church-bell through the year on Sabbath and lecture days, for three pounds and ten shillings; Bethuel Pierson to ring it at nine o'clock every evening, for four pounds; the Widow Martha Davison "to sweep the meeting-house and keep it clean all the year," for four pounds and ten shillings.

The teacher of the academy was allowed to ring the meeting-house bell for the use of the school.

In 1800, Josiah Frost was employed to ring the bell "on Sabbath and lecture days" for three pounds and fourteen shillings, the Widow Sarah Condit having charge of the sweeping at five pounds per annum. The sexton's duties were thus divided between the two until 1805, when the former assumed the whole business at $33.87. By the terms of the contract he was to take the whole and proper charge of the meeting-house, sweeping the same, finding the sand, ringing the bell, and lighting the candles, the last-named article to be found at the expense of the parish, and "the ends left to go to the person who lights the candles." This service Mr. Frost performed for several years.

Among the items recorded in 1838 by the trustees, was the appointment of James Matthews as sexton, with a salary of sixty dollars per year.

In January, 1839, "William Condit and Smith Williams were appointed a committee on the singing in the church;" and, "inasmuch as intimation had been given to the female part of the choir during the past year that some present should be made to them, it was 'resolved that a psalm and hymn book, with the select hymns, should be given to each of them.'"

MINISTERS SALARY, AND RETAIL PRICE-LIST, 1762.—In the years 1755 to 1765 the average salary of Rev. Caleb Smith, of the "Mountain Society," was not far from £65, or about one hundred and fifty dollars. An old account book of Mr. Smith's contains the names of about eighty persons, who are regularly charged for their annual rate, varying from a few shillings to two pounds and upwards. The rates were doubtless graduated by the civil tax list. From an entry made in his book in 1762 it appears that the dollar was then equal in value to 8s. 8d. Wheat was 6s. to 7s. per bushel; oats, 2s. 6d.; Indian corn, $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4s.; buckwheat, 2s. 6d. to 3s.; flax, 9d. per pound; tallow, 8d.; beef (by the quarter), 3d.; pork, 6d.; butter, 18d.; cider, 10s. per barrel; cider spirits, 3s. 6d. a gallon; a quart of rum, 15d. Jonathan Young received credit for weaving 114 yards of cloth, at 3d. per yard, and £1 for weaving two coverlets. James Wood, alias Gold, received credit at the rate of 3s. per day for cutting wood at the door, 3s. 6d. for cutting saw logs, 4s. for dressing flax. Isaac Williams had 4s. 6d. per day for working in the meadows. Jedediah Crane has a credit of 2s. 6d. for tobacco. Aaron Case has credit for a clock and case, £17.10s. (\$40); for cleaning watch, 3s. 6d.; for grinding five razors, 3s. 9d.

It may seem a little queer that in a minister's account there should appear a quart of rum. But, then, it was a long time ago, and no doubt the quality of piety and preaching of Mr. Smith would admit of a little dilution of that kind.

After a period of thirty-six years, or in October, 1798, we find that the trustees met "to inspect Mr. Chapman's rate (Jedediah Chapman was at this date pastor of the church), and to make a statement of the bad debts." Collectors were appointed to visit those who had unsettled accounts, and Mr. Chapman was applied to for a power of attorney to enforce their settlement. This he reminded them was unnecessary, the power being already theirs. To cover delinquencies, a paper for subscriptions was also circulated, agreeably to a vote taken at a parish-meeting, in order to make the salary equal to what it was at the time of his settlement. It appeared upon examination that the rate, as now received, "amounted to about £134. 6s. yearly." With this stipend, equal to $357, the pastor had a house, which was kept in repair by the parish, a parsonage lot of four acres, and the twenty acres on the opposite side of the road (where now stands the Mansion House, the Baptist Church, and many dwellings) purchased by the society at its organization.

In January, 1799, the parish agreed to raise the salary to £160, equal to $427. The plan was: That those who did not assent to this agreement should be rated as heretofore; "then deduct the amount of those who have agreed on the subscription to pay by way of rate." In December, 1799, the old debts continued to cause trouble, when the trustees appointed Jotham Harrison and Isaac Pierson a committee to wait upon Mr. Chapman, and make some arrangement of the old debts, previous to any suits being commenced.

In his final settlement with the parish, Mr. Chapman received £29 for a study and other buildings added by him to the parsonage, and £10 for money spent in repairs.

In 1809, during the pastorate of Rev. Asa Hillyer, an addition was made to the pastor's salary, raising the amount paid in money from $625 to $800. Mr. Hillyer occupied the old stone parsonage till 1815, when the failing health of Mrs. Hillyer caused him to move into a frame building yet standing on the corner of Main and Hillyer Streets, subsequently occupied by his son-in-law, Dr. William Pierson. The parish that year resolved to pay Mr. Hillyer $200, in lieu of the wood formerly provided for him.

In the spring of 1817 the trustees and committee appointed for that purpose, at a late parish-meeting, reported "That they had agreed with Mr. Hillyer to raise his salary to $1120 per year on condition that he would relinquish his claim to the old parsonage-house and one-half acre of land adjoining, a quarter of an acre adjoining Samuel W. Tichenor, a quarter of an acre adjoining Allen Dodd, and all the land owned by the parish on the south side of the road." They further reported that they had conferred with Mr. Hillyer upon the subject, and that he was satisfied with the arrangement. The meeting approved and confirmed the contract by a solemn vote, and authorized the trustees to use the above-mentioned pieces of land to enable them to fulfill the contract on their part.

After the death of Mr. Hillyer, April 4, 1828, and the partial failure of Mr. Hillyer's health, he was assigned an assistant pastor, and in May, 1829, he entered into an agreement, that he would accept for the next succeeding years an annual salary of $920. At the expiration of that term he was to receive $800 per annum during his natural life, but by a later agreement, made in 1834, he accepted $600 per annum and a donation of $1000. This was after the organization of the Second Presbyterian Church. Five-sevenths of the whole was to be paid by the old society, the arrangement to go into effect from the 1st of April, 1833.

Rev. William C. White was settled as pastor in February, 1833, and through the trustees and a committee appointed for that purpose, his salary was fixed at six hundred dollars per annum.

THE PIONEER SUNDAY-SCHOOL.—When the present church edifice was new there was a class of worshippers for whose accommodation special provision was made, i. e., the slave population. They were brought to notice in a resolution of the parish in 1815, requesting the trustees "to call on the slave-holders for the annuity on the pews set apart for their slaves." This was five years before the emancipation act in this State, and ten years before it began to take effect in the dissolution of the servile bond. It is gratifying to know that while the day of emancipation was dawning thus early, the light of the gospel was already shining on the colored portion of the population, and in 1816 a Sunday-school, the first in the parish, was established for the benefit of the children of colored people, both bond and free.

The second Sabbath-school in this parish, was established in 1817 for the benefit of the youth of the congregation generally. The two schools assembled in the upper and lower part of the academy. Among those who devoted their time and labor to the instruction of the colored children in religious matters was Miss Hillyer, a daughter of the pastor, Rev. Asa Hillyer.

INTERNAL CHURCH IMPROVEMENTS.—During the latter years of Mr. White's pastorate new elements were commingling with the old, and innovations and transformations were inevitable, and many who deplored the social changes found a large pecuniary solace for their dissatisfaction, and in 1851 another change was made in the interior arrangements of the church edifice.

The pulpit, built at the south or front end of the building, and the gallery opposite were made to change places. The front of the galleries was lowered, and the entire house reseated, the seats, together with the pulpit, being transferred from the Duane Street Presbyterian Church, in New York City. The walls were papered, furnaces were placed under the church, and an organ was purchased. These improvements, except organ, were made at a cost of five thousand, eight hundred and forty-five dollars. The organ, made by Henry Pilcher, of Newark, was purchased for eight hundred dollars. By these new furnishings the house was improved in appearance, and an impressive auxiliary supplied to one part of public devotion.

RULING ELDERS.—The church has no records from which the names of its elders can be known prior to 1801. The first three in the following list were obtained from the records of the Synod, the next eleven from the records of the Presbytery, some of them being found also in the oldest minutes of the Session. There must have been other elders before or contemporary with Joseph Peck, but their names are lost sight of. It is said by Ira Harrison that his ancestor, Lewis Crane, who died in 1777, aged fifty-nine, held the office of elder. The evidence is wholly traditional. Henry Osborn was one of the elders who signed the call to Mr. Hillyer in 1801, and from that time to the present the list is quite complete. David Munn was chosen to the office in 1809, but declined to serve.

DEACONS.—We insert the name of Samuel Pierson (written Pairson on his headstone). For reasons which have been given, there can be little doubt that he was one of the first officers of the church. The second pastor of the church, Rev. Caleb Smith, had an account with "Deacon Thompson," as his account-book shows. There is also extant a copy of the New York Pocket Almanac for the year 1757, which has been preserved in the parish, in which we find, among a number of business entries, that the owner of it, in 1759, paid "Deacon Smith £100."

Samuel Harrison's account with the parsonage in 1748 mentions Deacon Samuel Freeman.

PASTORS.—The pastors of this church have been Rev. Daniel Taylor, the first regular pastor from soon after the organization of the Mountain Society, till his decease. Much might be said in his praise, but space forbids more than the following, found upon his tombstone in the old burying-ground at Orange.

"Survivors, let's all imitat

The Virtues of our Pastor,
 And copy after him like as
 He did his Lord and Master
 To us most awful was the stroke,
 By which he was removed Unto the full fruition of
 The God he served and loved."

And below it,—

"Here lies the pious remains

Of the Revd. Mr. Daniel Taylor,
 Who was minister of this parish.
 Years, dec'd January 80, A. D., 1747-48,
 In the 57th year of his age."

In his will he devised his property to his wife Elizabeth, his daughters Jemima, Mary, Elizabeth, and his sons, Davie, Joseph, and Job, all of whom survived him.

The executors of his estate were Joseph Peck and David Williams.

Rev. Caleb Smith, installed in 1748, remained pastor of this church until his death, which occurred in October, 1762. Of him we can say no more nor give better expression to his real worth, than the following lines inscribed upon his tombstone in the old church-yard at Orange;

"Beneath this tomb the precious reliques lie
 Of one too great to live, but not to die
 Included by nature with superior parts
 To swim in science and to scan the arts,
 To soar aloft, inflamed with sacred love,
 To know, admire, and serve the God above;
 Gifted to sound the thundering law's alarm,
 The smiles of virtue, and the gospel's charm,
 A faithful watchman, studious to discharge
 The important duties of his weighty charge

¹ From Rev. J. Hoyt's history.

To say the whole, and sound the highest fame,
He lived a Christian, and he died the same
A man so useful, from his people rent,
His babes, the college, and the church lament."

REV. JEDEDIAH CHAPMAN was born in East Haddam, Conn., Sept. 27, 1741. He graduated at Yale in 1762, and two years afterward received a license to preach, and preached at Orange as a candidate in the spring of 1766, and was ordained and settled over this church July 22d of that year, being then in his twenty-fifth year.

About the second year of his settlement here he married Miss Blanche Smith, of a family that intermarried with the great Adams family of Massachusetts, and at once occupied the stone parsonage that had been vacant since the death of his predecessor, in 1762.

In the Revolutionary struggle he espoused very warmly the cause of the colonists, and his boldness in doing so made enemies of those who felt loyal to the king, and more than once were plans laid to capture and convey him to the British camp. British soldiers were sent to his house, but, fortunately, he was so surrounded by freedom's sentinels and under the shield of Providence that the enemy's plans were frustrated.
He was one of the ministerial figures that played a conspicuous part all through that terrible struggle for liberty, and when the strife was ended none rejoiced more on account of its happy termination than did Rev. Jedediah Chapman.

His pastoral relation with the Mountain Society was dissolved Aug. 13, 1800, after a service of thirty-four years, when the General Assembly assigned him to a missionary field in Western New York, where oldest churches in that region—those at Geneva, Romulus, Ovid, Rushville and Trumansburg—were organized by him.

After a service of fifty years in the ministry, he rested from his labors May 22, 1813, in the seventy-third year of his age, leaving to the Presbyterian Church a patriarchal name and works that do follow him.

REV. EDWARD DORR GRIFFIN was the successor of Mr. Chapman, and during his brief ministry in Orange he was a boarder in the family of Capt. Jonathan Harrison. From a statement drawn up by Mr.
Harrison, in June, 1801, and laid before a parish committee appointed the December previous, "for the purpose of securing suitable accommodations for Mr. Griffin," it appears that the boarding account was settled by the parish. What further compensation was given, if any, is not known. As he received no salary from his people in New Hartford during his absence, it is probable that he was paid something in addition to his board for his labors here.

His board for twenty-nine weeks and two days amounted to £144 3s. 7d., or three hundred and eighty-five dollars. It included, however, besides board at two pounds per week for Mr. and Mrs. Griffin, a charge for two rooms, entirely furnished (twenty pounds), the service of a hired woman at six shillings per week, and her board at ten shillings, the wages of a nurse for Mrs. Griffin at sixteen shillings a week and her board at twelve shillings a week, the keeping of a horse at twelve shillings a week, on "one peck of oats a day and the best hay;" harnessing horse for Mr. Griffin and his visitors, cutting wood, making fires, running errands, etc., £11 12s.; candles for the twenty-nine weeks, £2 10s.

Rev. Asa Hillyer was called to this pastorate Oct.
20, 1801, the call being signed by the then trustees of the church, viz.: Aaron Munn, Joseph Pierson, Jr., Thomas Williams, Daniel Williams, Samuel Condit,
Isaac Pierson; Elders, Joseph Pierson, Jr., Amos
Harrison, John Perry, Aaron Munn, Linus Dodd, Henry Osborn, and by Rev. Dr. Bethnel Dodd, moderator. Mr. Hillyer accepted the call, and was installed Dec. 16, 1801. Dr. MacWhorter presided and gave the charge to the minister; James Richards, of Morristown, preached; Aaron Condit "made the address to the people."

His pastoral relation with this church was dissolved
Feb. 12, 1833. Hillyer Street, in Orange, was named in his honor.

REV. GEORGE PIERSON.—Mr. Pierson was a native of Orange, and a member of the Mountain Society, and sat for many years under the teaching of Dr.
Hillyer, and when the weight of years was bearing the old patriarch down, and he needed assistance, the church began a canvass of the merits and demerits of different ones as an associate or assistant for Dr.
Hillyer, when the choice fell upon George Pierson, who had just finished his education at Princeton. He preached here with great acceptability as a licentiate, and finally ordained as co-pastor June 22, 1829, and remained till 1831, when he was dismissed to another field.

REV. EDWIN F. HATFIELD.—Upon the removal of Mr. Pierson, the late Rev. Edwin F. Hatfield, who, in 1832, was just entering upon the ministerial work, was assigned to this place, and soon the thoughts of the people turned to him as candidate for co-pastor, but he declined the offer, and was soon settled in St.
Louis, Mo. Mr. Hatfield was here from March 1st to September 1st, preaching four times weekly in Orange during the whole time and frequently in the towns round about, boarding during the time with the old pastor, Rev. Mr. Hillyer.

REV. WILLIAM C. WHITE, successor of Rev. Dr.
Hillyer, accepted a call to this church in October or late in the autumn of 1832, and was installed as pastor of this church Feb. 13, 1833. Rev. Dr. Weeks preached the sermon, Dr. Hillyer gave the charge to the pastor, and Dr. Fisher to the people. The text was 1
Timothy, iv. 16.

His relation to this church as pastor ceased on April 18, 1855, at his own request, on account of physical disability. He died in Orange, Feb. 7, 1856, aged fifty-three years.

REV. JAMES HOYT was the ninth pastor of this church and was installed as such Feb. 14, 1856, just a week after the death of his predecessor.

The following clergymen took part in the installation services: Rev. John Crowell, of the Second Church, Orange, presided and put the constitutional questions; Rev. James M. Sherwood (of Bloomfield), preached a sermon from Matt. xiii. 33; Rev. Daniel W. Poor and Rev. James P. Wilson, D.D. (of Newark), delivered the respective charges to the pastor and the people; Rev. Robert W. Landis (of Paterson), who was moderator of the Presbytery, offered prayer.

To Mr. Hoyt, more than to any other person, living or dead, does the church and the people of the Oranges owe a debt of gratitude that will probably never be repaid. Shortly after his settlement as pastor of this church he saw himself standing upon historic ground, whose virgin soil had never been turned to the genial rays of the sun, and whose mines of wealth had never been developed by the "crow, pick and spade" of historic research; and it is not surprising that a man of Mr. Hoyt's mental calibre and literary tastes should add to the labors of pastor of a large congregation those of preserving for all time the landmarks set up by the pioneer white settlers of this classic field, which he did so thoroughly and completely in the publication of his "History of the Mountain Society."

To those who knew him he needs no eulogy, and to those who knew him not we need only say he was a loving husband, a kind parent, a faithful servant of God, a beloved pastor, a model Christian. He died Dec. 16, 1866, leaving a widow and two sons.

Mr. Hoyt's successor was Rev. Eldridge Mix, who was settled as pastor of this church Oct. 2, 1867, and dismissed May 9, 1881.

REV. HENRY M. STORRS, the present very popular pastor, was settled over this church Nov. 1, 1882.

Central Presbyterian Church.—About thirty years ago the attractions of this beautiful region had begun rapidly to increase its population by the removal hither of New York and Brooklyn families. A few years later the immigration of Presbyterians had begun to tax the seating capacity of the then existing churches of that order in Orange. Among the more recent comers were a number of families, attending the First and Second Churches, who had been in connection with the Old School branch of the Presbyterian body, and who still retained a decided preference for the doctrine and polity of that section of the church. As both the First and Second Churches were in the New School connection, the forming of another organization offered the only way of meeting this preference. It was in this desire mainly, together with the fact already stated that the time had evidently come when something should be attempted in the way of church extension, that the Central Church had its origin. The result has demonstrated that the enlargement of church capacity was needed by the growing Presbyterian population, and that the new enterprise was begun at the right time.

On the 12th of November, 1866, twelve men met at St. Mark's school-house, on the borders of Llewellyn Park, to confer about a new church. This meeting, of which Mr. Francis H. Abbot was chairman, was followed by another, on the 20th of the same month, at the house of the Rev. David Irving, D.D.; and this meeting was continued by adjournment on the 27th of the same month, at the house of Mr. A. R. McCoy. On this occasion it was resolved to take the steps for the forming of a new congregation. Committees were appointed to wait upon the pastors of the First and Second Churches and duly inform them of the project. In pursuance of this appointment, Dr. J. C. Lowrie waited upon the pastor of the Brick Church, and Mr. L. P. Stone conferred with the pastor of the First Church. Messrs. L. P. Stone and J. H. Hazard were appointed a committee to select and secure a temporary place of worship, and Messrs. Edward H. Ensign and J. H. Hazard were appointed to raise funds.

Subsequent to this action a public hall, known as Central Hall, in the third story of a brick block of stores on the north side of Main Street, west of Centre, was leased for the exclusive use of the new church, and suitably fitted up for worship. Nearly two thousand dollars were at once contributed for church expenses.

Public worship was first held on Sunday, the 16th day of December, 1866, when the Rev. W. H. Green, D.D., of the Princeton Theological Seminary, officiated. On the Sabbath next following the services were conducted by the Rev. J. T. Duffield, D.D., of the College of New Jersey, and from this time public worship on the Lord's Day was regularly maintained by various clergymen.

At a meeting on Thursday, the 3d of January, 1867, held in Central Hall, with the Rev. W. H. Kirk in the chair, it was unanimously resolved, on motion of the Rev. Dr. Lowrie, "that, in reliance on the blessing of the Triune God, we will endeavor to establish a church of Christ, to be known as the Central Presbyterian Church, of Orange, N. J., and that a committee of two be appointed to make application to the Presbytery of Passaic for the organization of this church at as early a day as may be convenient." Messrs. L. P. Stone and David L. Wallace were appointed as said committee.

The church was finally organized, with thirty-three members, by a committee of the Presbytery of Passaic, on the 20th of January, 1867, the Rev. W. H. Hornblower, D.D., of Paterson, N. J., and the Rev. Dr. Irving constituting the committee.

The persons who thus formed the nucleus of the organization brought their letters of dismission from the following churches: From the First Church of Orange, N. J., 17; from the Reformed (Dutch) Church of Newark, N. J., 4; Presbyterian Church, Astoria, N. Y., 3; Fifth Avenue and Nineteenth Street Church, N. Y., 2; First Church, N. Y., 2; Rutgers Church, N. Y., 1; Morristown, N. J., 1; Petersburg, Va., 2; and from the Brainard Church, Easton, Pa. About eighteen families, besides some separate individuals, were embraced in the organization at the beginning. It will be seen that the draft upon the Orange churches was by no means heavy, and those who were interested in the movement studiously avoided urging any who were not of their own accord thus inclined to go with them in the new church.

The first elders were Francis H. Abbott, L. P. Stone, David L. Wallace, and George W. Thorp; Deacons, Edward H. Ensign and A. Ransay McCoy; Trustees, J. H. Hazard, S. W. Tichenor, and Austin M. Knight.

The congregation elected as their first pastor the Rev. Edward D. Yeomans, D.D., then minister of St. Peter's Church, Rochester, N. Y., who began his labors here on the first Sabbath of May, 1867, and was installed on the 2d of July following, the services being conducted by the Rev. D. M. James, moderator of the Presbytery, the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Irving, the charge to the pastor being delivered by the Rev. Dr. E. R. Craven, of Newark, and the charge to the people by the Rev. Dr. W. C. Roberts, of Elizabeth. Dr. Yeomans had been settled in his new charge but little more than a year, when he died suddenly of apoplexy August 26th, 1868, aged thirty-eight years.

Nothing decisive had thus far been done about the erection of a house of worship. The services were still held in Central Hall. A Sabbath-school was also begun at the same place, having been organized with forty scholars, and Mr. D. L. Wallace as superintendent. Delay in building was at first occasioned by some difference of opinion respecting the best location for the new church. As several of the original families resided in Llewellyn Park, a lot on the southwest corner of Park Avenue and High Street was favorably thought of, and was offered by the owner at a very low price, with the view of adding to the value of property adjoining. A lot just opposite the present location on Main Street, and another on Main Street, near Park, also had their advocates. The Baptist congregation, who had a few years before erected their lecture-room on its present site, and were waiting to gather strength for the building of their main edifice, had some thought of changing their location and removing farther West, and an offer was made of their property, but at so high a figure that the negotiation was not prosecuted.

Meantime, the present pastor, Rev. Alfred Yeomans, D.D., was called from the church in Bellefonte, Pa., and began his ministrations on the third Sabbath of January, 1869. Arrangements for building, which had been interrupted by the vacancy in the pulpit, were resumed in the early spring of the same year.

The location of the church on the corner of Main and Prince Streets was finally agreed upon, the park families not only generously yielding their preference for a site nearer the mountain, but contributing with a noble liberality towards the expense of building so far away from their own doors. The lot eventually purchased was bought at full price as real estate was then selling. It would now be called a very high figure. Two dwelling-houses occupied the ground, the one being the old Pierson homestead of Revolutionary age, which was torn down when the preparations for building were completed; the other being the present parsonage, which originally stood upon the corner now occupied by the church. The price paid for the whole property was twenty-one thousand five hundred dollars.

Ground was at once broken for the erection of the rear extension of this church as it now stands, a two-story building for lecture-room and Sunday-school room, at a cost of about seventeen thousand dollars. The Sabbath services were transferred from Central Hall to the lecture-room as soon as the latter was ready for use, Dec. 19, 1869, and continued to be held there for about two years and a half. An organ, the gift of Mr. Austin M. Knight, was placed in this room, and subsequently removed into the main building, where it is still used in the services of the church.

In the spring of 1871 the congregation, which had been steadily gaining strength, set about the work of rearing their main edifice. The sum of forty thousand dollars was subscribed, payable in three years, in semi-annual installments, and ground was broken in August of that year. A lot was purchased for the parsonage on the west side of Prince Street, at a cost of two thousand dollars, and the building was removed thither, and subsequently enlarged by the addition of a wing for the pastor's study, at an expense of twelve hundred dollars,—the work of the ladies of the congregation. The corner-stone of the church was laid September 11th, the address on that occasion being delivered by the Rev. J. H. McIlvaine, D.D., of Newark, N. J.; and the building was finished and dedicated July 14, 1872, the sermon at the dedication being preached by the Rev. W. C. Roberts, D.D., of Elizabeth, N. J. The plans for the building were furnished and the work was superintended by Mr. T. A. Roberts, architect, of Newark.

A large proportion of the cost of the church lot, and the whole of the parsonage lot, had been allowed to stand upon a mortgage; and as the cost of the church, with the furniture, overran the amount subscribed, the church was left with a mortgage debt of twenty-seven thousand dollars when the work of building was completed. For five years and a half the interest on this debt was provided for by a special subscription, and Jan. 19, 1878, the congregation rejoiced in deliverance from this debt. At a congregational meeting held on the third Sabbath of January, 1878, in connection with the usual morning service, with Elder

David L. Wallace in the chair, the whole amount of the debt was pledged on the spot, with interest upon the subscriptions until the amounts promised should be paid. Five years' time was allowed for the payments, in quarterly installments; but in less than one year the sum of fifteen thousand dollars had already been paid, instead of five thousand four hundred dollars, which the pledges called for. This made, in round numbers, about ninety thousand dollars which our people had given for building purposes alone within ten years after the organization of the church, or an average of nine thousand dollars a year, exclusive of the amounts contributed for congregational expenses and benevolence. The total amount raised by this church for congregational purposes for the first twelve years of its existence was, one hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars, or an average of thirteen thousand dollars a year.

During the time this congregation was under this heavy tax for building and current expenses they did not suspend their offerings for the benevolent work of the church. Thus far through the life of this church the columns of the General Assembly's minutes do not show, after the first year, a single blank space against its name, indicating a failure to give to each of the causes on its list, excepting only that of "sustentation," which may be considered so closely identified with home missions as not to call for a separate contribution. The total annual amount of contributions to benevolence started the first year with the sum of $1565, and has steadily increased until, in 1876, it reached the sum of $6329 for the year, from which, however, the total has declined somewhat for the past two years, the figures for 1878 being $4242. For some years the totals for benevolence ran along about evenly with those for current congregational expenses, and sometimes exceeded them.

The whole amount given to the various causes for the twelve years, estimating the current year to date by the figures of last year, is as follows: To domestic missions, $12,671; foreign missions, $15,725; education, $15,818; publication, $904; church erection, $1734; ministerial relief, $1405; freedmen's committee, $913; miscellaneous, $3518. These totals foot up $52,688, or an average of $4390 each year. Adding the totals for home expenses and benevolence, we have the sum of $208,688 as the whole amount contributed by this church in the first twelve years, or a yearly average of $17,390.

Passing now to the spiritual history of the church, we may see in this also enough of the loving-kindness of our God to call for gratitude. The church began with thirty-three members.

The growth of the communion-roll has not been rapid or phenomenal. The largest number added on profession of faith at any one time was at the communion in March, 1876. The whole number added that year on profession was fifty-two; and the total by letter and profession, sixty-eight. This was the nearest the church ever came to what might be called a revival. But the growth, if not rapid, has been regular. The whole number received into the church up to the present time is four hundred and twenty-six. Of these, one hundred and ninety were received on profession, and two hundred and thirty-six by letter. Baptism has been administered to twenty-four adults and one hundred and fourteen infants.

The losses number one hundred and four. Of these, twenty-one were removed by death, and eighty-three by letter of dismission. The names now upon the roll number three hundred and twenty-two. Of the original thirty-three members, twenty-seven retain connection, four having been removed by death and two by dismission.

Yet, if the loss in numbers has been light, it has been heavy, indeed, in other ways. The Session has lost by death two of its most valuable members, who were among the original founders of the church. These were George W. Thorp, who died on the 23d of May, 1872, aged forty-seven, and Francis H. Abbott, who died May 12, 1874, aged seventy-seven. To take their places in the eldership, A. R. McCoy and R. L. S. Paton were elected, and installed in their offices June 7, 1874. At the same time Charles H. Jones, George A. Newman and William V. Ruton were elected and installed as deacons.

The Sunday-school has been greatly prospered. There has been no change from the beginning in the office of superintendent. Every year a good proportion of those who have joined the communion have come from its classes. Beginning with forty scholars, it reported to the Presbytery last spring a roll of three hundred and fifty-two officers, teachers and scholars. A teachers' meeting has been maintained, without interruption, almost from the date of the organization of the church; and the school has never been better equipped for effective work, or more earnest in doing its work, than at the present time.

In the fall of 1873 a Young People's Association was formed for benevolent and missionary work and social improvement. This has been a most excellent training-school for such of our young members as have taken a hand in its labors. Experience in missionary work has thus been gained which will be invaluable in after-life, to say nothing of the direct results for good accomplished through the monthly visiting of the various committees, the distribution of religious reading, the Woman's Sewing Class, which meets every week throughout the winter in the Sunday-school room, and the cottage prayer-meetings, held each Monday evening in different quarters of the town. The small sums contributed weekly by the members of the society have in some years exceeded a thousand dollars, and the money has been expended for the material relief and spiritual benefit of the poor. The secret of the continued thrift of the association is to be found in the fact that its main object was not the mere pleasure of the members, but the promotion of the Gospel cause among the more neglected portions of the population.

The Ladies' Sewing Society and the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society—the one organized at the beginning of the church, and the other in about 1873—have carried on the work belonging to such associations with good success. The latter society is supporting in the foreign field Mrs. McGilvary, missionary among the Laos, in Siam. Its receipts are about five hundred dollars a year.

The church debt was completely extinguished in May, 1883. Total cost of property, in round numbers, one hundred thousand dollars. Membership of the church in January, 1884, was three hundred and fifty-seven.

Officers for 1884: Pastor, Rev. Alfred Yeomans, D.D.; Ruling Elders, Levi P. Stoue, A. Ramsay McCoy, David L. Wallace, Charles H. Jones; Deacons, George A. Newman, William V. Raton; Trustees, Thomas Miller (president), James K. Morgan (treasurer), Charles G. Alford, Newton E. Whiteside, Alexander Lang, John Dunn, Abiel Abbot.

The German Presbyterian Church¹ (whose church edifice is located on William Street, between Park and Hillyer Streets, in the city of Orange) is a member of the Presbytery of Morris and Orange.

The pioneer work in this particular branch of the Presbyterian Church was commenced in Orange in July, 1864, by Rev. Christian Wisner, of the German Presbyterian Church of Bloomfield, who visited the German people of Orange with the view of organizing a mission or church among them. He was well received by both Germans and Americans, the former answering his call to them, and the latter cordially assisting him in his labors of love. The First Presbyterian Church tendered the use of their session-room to their German-American brethren, which was accepted, while the pastor, Rev. James Hoyt, encouraged the work most energetically. With these aids, then, the Germans were encouraged, and their membership, which was then but twenty-five, soon began to increase; yet, for wise reasons, the organization of the church was deferred till 1866, when a desire for a church organization became more general, and some thirty or more individuals signed a petition for a church at this place, and presented it to the Presbytery of Newark, in whose bounds the Oranges were then located. The petition was duly considered and the request granted, and on March 18, 1866, the First German Presbyterian Church of Orange was duly organized, with Rev. Christian Wisner as pastor.

March 25th of the same year A. Bode and Z. Bodner were duly elected elders of the church, and on April 1st following they were, by the pastor, ordained to their sacred office, at which time the new flock celebrated the Eucharist. In July, 1867, Mr.

Wisner, to the great sorrow of his new congregation, was called to other fields of labor.

Oct. 13, 1867, Rev. Richard S. Rosenthal was unanimously elected and subsequently installed as pastor of the church, and during his pastorate the present church edifice was erected, the corner-stone being laid Aug. 28, 1869, and the church dedicated on the 28th of the following December with appropriate and impressive services.

Sept. 1, 1871, the resignation of Rev. Mr. Rosenthal was accepted, when Rev. Albert J. Winterick accepted the call of the church, entering at once upon his duties as pastor. He remained with the church till Sept. 13, 1874, when he resigned, and the little church was then left for some time without a pastor, being supplied, however, by students from the theological seminary at Bloomfield, N. J.

Nov. 26, 1874, Mr. Herman C. Grubnert, a licentiate, and student of the Bloomfield Seminary, was elected as stated supply, in which capacity he served till July 14, 1875, when, after having been regularly called, he was duly ordained and installed as pastor of this church by the Presbytery of Morris and Orange, and is still serving the church. During Mr. Grubnert's pastorate a debt of five thousand dollars on the church and two thousand dollars on the parsonage (located on a lot adjoining the church) has been liquidated, the former through the assistance of the board of church erection of the Presbytery, and the latter by individual effort of the membership of this church, so that their entire church property, valued at twelve thousand dollars, is free from debt, and the church has a membership of one hundred and fifty.

The Methodist Episcopal Church.²—The earliest Methodist services in the vicinity of Orange of which we have any record were held in the school-house at Tory Corners, in 1819 or '20, by the late Rev. Charles Pitman, who occasionally filled appointments at that place, though at that time there was no organized society in contemplation; yet, as near as can be learned, occasional services were continued there for several years.

Our next record tells us that in the autumn of 1828, Rev. Isaac Winner, of Belleville, held services semi-monthly in the house of a Mr. Bishop, near the site now occupied by the Orange National Bank, corner of Main and Cone Streets. These meetings however, were discontinued in the early part of 1829. In March, April and May of 1829, Rev. John Kennedy, of Newark, and Rev. Isaac Winner preached on three different occasions in the old white school-house, then standing on the site now occupied by the Brick Church, corner of Main and Prospect Streets, East Orange. These services were not continued after the visitation of Rev. Mr. Kennedy, in May, 1829.

On the last Sunday in August, 1829, the Masonic Hall, still standing on Main Street, was opened for preaching. Calvin Tompkins, William Murphy, and others connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Newark had generously hired the hall and furnished it for divine worship. At this time the first class of ten members was formed; Mr. James Collins was appointed the leader. About one month afterward the class was formally recognized as a part of the Belleville Circuit; the last Sunday of September, 1834, therefore, was properly chosen for the fifty-fifth anniversary of the organization of the church in Orange. The society grew in numbers, until, Sept. 20, 1830, the board of trustees purchased of Dr. Babbitt the lot upon which the present edifice now stands, and contracted for two thousand six hundred and twenty dollars with Amos A. Harrison to erect a church. In the autumn of that year the cornerstone was laid, and the first edifice was dedicated near the close of the following year, 1831.

In the spring of 1832, Rev. E. S. James, subsequently elected bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, became the first minister of the Orange Church. At the close of his first year the society numbered eighty-eight members; very few of these had been previously identified with any other denomination. It is proper to state that Rev. Mr. James won the confidence and esteem of all Christians in Orange by his sincere devotion, his personal attractiveness, his generous catholicity, and his acknowledged talents. He did very much towards the removal of misapprehensions then existing in respect to the doctrines, spirit and aims of his denomination.

The first building was removed in 1859, and the present brick structure was reared upon the same spot. The following ministers have served this Church during the half century:—Revs. David Bartine, J. L. Gilder, Edwin James, L. M. Prettyman, Enoch Reed, Edmund S. James, J. V. Potts, J. Cunningham, W. Burrows, J. S. Swaime, W. Robertson, A. Gilmore, B. Day, S. W. Decker, C. S. Downs, W. P. Corbit, M. E. Ellison, J. S. Corbit, J. T. Crane, T. H. Smith, J. K. Burr, A. M. Palmer, S. W. Hilliard, J. M. Freeman, L. R. Dunn, J. O. Rogers, R. Vanhorne, R. E. Dashiell, J. Haulon, William Day, J. J. Reed, J. H. Knowles; Rev. J. A. Owens, from 1881 to the spring of 1883, and Rev. J. R. Wright from the spring of 1883 to the present time.

Of this number there were present at the fiftieth anniversary Revs. Gilder, Ellison, Crane, Smith, Palmer, Freeman, Rogers, Vanhorne, Day, Reed and Knowles.

A noble band went out from the Orange Church in 1869 to form the Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church, East Orange. At present three missions are connected with the Orange Church,—at Williamsville, Doldtown, and in the valley. Rev. J. Scarlett and Rev. C. Clark and Mr. E. S. Ferry, of the Drew Theological Seminary, preach regularly at these places.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A PIONEER PREACHER.—In his sermon at the semi-centennial of Methodism in Orange, Rev. J. L. Gilder said,—

"My memory runs back to the spring of 1830, when I, a heedless youth, with my saddle-bags and my horse, entered Orange for the purpose of meeting an appointment for preaching.

"Orange at that time was an inconsiderable village, the houses being sparsely distributed along one main street. There was but one church edifice,—that a Presbyterians,—the pastor of which was a Rev. Mr. Hillier.

"It was related of him that by his courteous attention to ministers of other evangelized churches visiting the place he succeeded for many years in maintaining his position as the sole pastor. Instead of arraying himself in an attitude of hostility against Methodist preachers, as was more generally the case, he would invite them to occupy his pulpit, and share his hospitality. How far that may have been a strategic movement we are unprepared to say. It was certainly for a long time an efficient one.

"The place of worship for the Methodists was Masonic Hall. At my first appointment the attendance was large, many no doubt attracted by my youth, I being at that time but eighteen years of age. There is, I remember, was one of remarkable interest, by reason of the signal display of the Divine power during the preaching.

"A number presented themselves as subjects of prayer. This was the commencement of a gracious revival of religion. I can never forget the sensation that was produced the next day when engaged in visiting from house to house. Women and children would flee at my approach as though I were a venomous reptile, for as a Methodist preacher I was readily distinguishable. Nor will this surprise you when you learn that I wore the regulation attire, which consisted of a single-breasted round coat, vest well buttoned to the neck, neckerchief of large dimensions, minus shirt collar, collars were called the devil's ears, low-crowned, broad-brimmed white hat; so that a Methodist preacher, with his saddle-bags and horse, was always recognizable.

"In all this region there existed a deep-rooted prejudice against Methodism and its methods. The doctrines of Methodism were misunderstood and misrepresented. The itinerancy was held up to ridicule as a cross iron wheel, in its revolutions crushing out all manhood, and producing a fawning servility. The bishops were represented as arrogant and tyrannical. The manner of worship was caricatured and rendered ridiculous. The preachers were exhibited as illiterate and boorish, and settled pastors in many instances warned the people against these roving itinerants as wolves in sheep's clothing, and as abridging themselves into parishes which they claimed to possess by a Divine right.

The membership of the church in January, 1884, was four hundred and thirty-four, and twenty-five probationers. Value of church property, forty thousand dollars. The Sunday-school connected with this church had also at that time, a membership of four hundred and eight scholars, sixty-two teachers, with the Hon. George J. Ferry as superintendent. Local preachers, Rev. John Scarlett, Daniel Taylor; Stewards, W. H. Cooper, P. B. Fairchild, Frank Kynor, Wilbur C. Knowles, Benjamin F. Green, Daniel T. Smith, Charles W. Mandeville; Trustees, Samuel F. Jayne, Samuel Merwin, Henry Townley, Christopher Baker, Jacob Romaine, Edwin P. Woodward, Wilbur C. Knowles.

Grace Protestant Episcopal Church.—This parish was originally a part of St. Mark's from which it was carved out in March, 1854, and organized by the Rev. Joshua D. Berry, who at that time had charge of a school in Orange. It was at a time when, from the increasing interest manifested in religious matters, and especially by the Protestant Episcopal branch of the great Christian family, another place of worship more advantageously located than was St. Mark's was demanded by many of the Episcopalian families, and others leaning towards that doctrinal faith living in the immediate vicinity.

At a public meeting, held March 5, 1854, in what was then Bodwell Hall, corner of Park and William Streets, the organization of the parish was perfected by the election of Judge Jesse Williams and Philander J. Bodwell as wardens, and the following-named persons as vestrymen: Jesse Williams, Philander J. Bodwell, Chauncey Shepard, William Cleveland, Philip Ward, William M. Babbitt, Aaron Dodd, William H. Vermilye, Thomas French, Charles H. Campbell.

The lot upon which Grace Church stands was purchased from the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church at a cost of three thousand dollars, and had been occupied by the old stone parsonage for a period of one hundred and five years.¹

Ground was broken for the new church edifice in the summer of 1856, and August 12th of the same year the corner-stone was laid with appropriate ceremonies. The edifice was built of brown sandstone, taken from a quarry in Pleasant Valley, West Orange township, and was completed in the early summer of 1857, and consecrated on Thursday, July 16th, of that year, at a cost of eleven thousand dollars for edifice and furnishing. The request to consecrate was read by the rector-elect, the Rev. James S. Bush, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. James A. Williams, rector of St. Mark's Church. Morning prayer was read by Rev. Messrs. Shackelford and Merritt; Rev. Messrs. McCurdy and Cady reading the lessons. The sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Bishop George Washington Doane, who also administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Vermilye, of New York, the Rev. Mr. Stocking reading the Epistle. There were also present the Rev. Messrs. Reed, Moore, Mayers, and Rev. Drs. Diller and Cook, of New York. The beautiful altar window (symbolic of Faith, Hope and Charity) was a gift from the maker, Mr. Doremus, a parishioner of Grace Church. At the time of the consecration of the church edifice there were in the congregation one hundred and thirteen communicants.

We learn from the Orange Journal of July 18, 1857, that the text of Bishop Doane on the occasion of consecrating the church may be found in Eccl. v. 1,—“Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God,”—and that the subject was reverence for the house of God. The bishop declared that he felt ashamed of Christians when he learned from a devout heathen that his idols were always approached with bowed head, eyes downcast and robes wrapped closely about the body, and had to contrast all this with the lofty flaunting of people into our churches, thoughtlessly, gayly and irreverently, for the purpose of whiling away an idle hour, looking about and being looked at. The bishop's voice sounded out that day the freedom of the gospel and of the church in these words: “If it were not for the weather, I would have no doors to a church. It should stand open all the time.”

In 1868 a commodious rectory was built in rear of the church edifice, at a cost of nine thousand dollars.

In 1872 a brown-stone transept and chancel, additions to the church edifice, were built at a cost of twenty thousand dollars, including organ, carpets, etc., thereby increasing the seating capacity one-half. In 1877 another addition was made, consisting of a brown-stone chapel, connected with the transept, at a cost of six thousand dollars, and having a seating capacity of two hundred and fifty. The church lot is one of the most valuable in the city, running from Main to Williams Street, and is valued, with the buildings upon it, at sixty thousand dollars. The church offerings for 1883 amounted to eleven thousand six hundred and fifty-five dollars, and the communicants in January, 1884, numbered three hundred and thirty-two.

Rev. Mr. Berry and others had charge of the parish until its first rector, Rev. James S. Bush, was called, in July, 1856. He resigned in 1867, and was succeeded in 1868 by the present rector, Rev. Anthony Schuyler.

The wardens in 1884 were James S. Cox and Francis C. Cantine; Vestrymen, J. J. Browne, Henry Folsom, James O. Watson, Marshall Shepard, William M. Franklin, Dexter N. Force, Lewis B. Henry, Jay C. Young, Edward W. Ashley and Henry C. Pelder.

North Orange Baptist Church.—The first public meeting of resident Baptists, to take into consideration measures for organizing public worship in Orange was held May 11, 1857, in Waverly Hall, at which time Samuel Colgate was chosen chairman and Charles J. Martin, secretary.

At that meeting it was decided to engage Waverly Hall for one year, in which to hold meetings on the Sabbath, and in which to establish a Sabbath-school. The school was established May 31, 1857, with forty scholars, seven teachers, and Samuel Colgate as superintendent. Mr. Colgate has held the position of superintendent continuously to the present time, and has increased the numerical force of the school from forty to nearly five hundred scholars and over fifty teachers, with a library of thirteen hundred volumes.

At a meeting of the society held Aug. 3d, 1857, thirty-nine brethren and sisters signified their willingness to unite in the formation of a Baptist Church, and extended an invitation to Rev. G. W. Northrup to become their pastor, which call was declined. September 23d of the same year Rev. J. B. Morse was chosen pastor of the society and church when organ-

Jan. 29, 1867, Rev. Joseph F. Elder, of Rochester, N. Y., accepted a call to this church, and was ordained and installed May 1st of the same year.

Nov. 1, 1869, a lot on the corner of Main and Essex Streets was purchased by the church, on which it was intended to build a church edifice; but it, being found unsuited for church purposes, was sold in February, 1871.

Second Baptist Church (Colored).—At a meeting of a number of colored people, members of the Baptist Church, held in Central Hall, Oct. 22, 1871, for the purpose of organizing a Colored Baptist Church, the Rev. Ebenezer Bird was appointed chairman of the meeting, and Abram V. Middleswarth secretary.

By a vote of the meeting, Henry F. Ballard, Dana Hall, J. D. Ballard, Joshua Johnson, John Edwards and A. V. Middleswarth were appointed to act as officers until such time as this body shall be regularly organized as a church.

Meetings continued to be held regularly every Sabbath in Central Hall until June, 1872, when the services were transferred to Lindsley Hall, on Cone Street, where, on Jan. 2, 1873, the society was regularly organized as a church, with the following-named persons as the constituent members: J. The church was duly incorporated March 11, 1878, as the Second Baptist Church of Orange, and during the following summer the commodious church edifice, located on Oakwood Avenue, in which the society now worships, was built, and dedicated Aug. 15, 1878, with appropriate ceremonies, Rev. J. A. Broadus, D. D., preaching the sermon, from Revelation xxii. 9,—“Worship God.” The membership in April, 1884, was sixty-five. The pastors of the church have been Revs. S. B. Myler, B. Washington Street Baptist Church.—The causes which led to the erection of the chapel and organization of a society for holding Sunday-school and meetings, and the growth of the movement, first as a non-sectarian or union organization and afterwards as a Baptist chapel connected with the North Orange Baptist Church, will doubtless be of much interest. The chapel was built in the summer of 1873, and grew out of union neighborhood prayer-meetings, which were held at private houses on Thursday evening of each week. The meetings were attended by members of all religious organizations, and were strictly non-sectarian. They were conducted by Mr. Willard E. Howell, a Baptist, assisted by Mr. Zenas Williams, a Presbyterian. Mr. Howell and Mr. Williams were the leading spirits in the work afterward done in securing funds to be used in building the chapel. The attendance at these neighborhood prayer-meetings grew so rapidly, and the interest in them so increased, that it became necessary to have more commodious quarters. To meet this want, those interested set to work soliciting money to build a chapel. No church organization was asked to contribute, the money being contributed by individuals who felt an interest in the work; but the greater part of those who gave were members of the Presbyterian and Baptist denominations. A plot of ground on Washington Street, near the Watchung Railroad, was secured, and a small chapel, with a seating capacity of about one hundred and fifty, was erected, which, together with the lot, furniture, etc., cost about two thousand dollars. Dedicatory services were held in the chapel on Sept. 24, 1873. The property was held in the name of the trustees elected by the chapel society. When the building was first begun, both Baptists and Presbyterians mutually agreed that the chapel should be non-sectarian, but when the time came for it to be denominational the Baptists should be given the first opportunity to take it. In addition to the Thursday evening meetings, a service on Sunday evening was begun and a Sunday-school was organized. Mr. Howell, who had been licensed to preach in the Livingston Baptist Church, preached in the chapel Sunday evenings and conducted the prayer-meetings, and the Rev. H. Kirke White, a Presbyterian minister, and now a home missionary in the West, was elected superintendent of the Sunday-school. The chapel continued non-sectarian for several years, and the attendance at all the meetings was largely increased, until in 1877, when it became necessary to enlarge the chapel, which was done by adding two wings. The Rev. Mr. White held the position of superintendent of the Sunday-school for more than a year, and was succeeded by Mr. Howell, who held the position until the election of Mr. Zenas Williams, in the winter of 1875-76.

In 1879 the question of making the chapel denominational came up. According to agreement, the Baptists had the first opportunity to claim it, but they waived their claim to the Presbyterians, who, however, did not accept it. The Baptists then paid off the mortgage on the chapel and assumed control of it. They, however, did not make it denominational, but conducted it as before, Mr. Williams still being superintendent of the Sunday-school. The Rev. J. L. Davis, who had been supplying a Baptist Church at Croton, N. Y., for some time, in May of that year accepted a call from the North Orange Baptist Church to take charge of the chapel, in which he preached his first sermon on Sunday, June 15, 1879, Mr.

Howell having stopped preaching there some time previous. In the early part of 1881 the North Orange Baptist Church decided to conduct the chapel strictly as a Baptist Church. The Presbyterians, then meeting there, withdrew, and at the same time took their children from the Sunday-school. This weakened the attendance considerably, but it soon began to increase again, and in the summer of 1882 the chapel was once more enlarged, an addition being put on the rear. Mr. Williams was succeeded by Mr. Ira L. Beebe as superintendent of the Sunday-school. Mr. Beebe served one year, and was followed by Mr. George Cooke, who served until January, 1884, when Mr. John Berryman was elected.

The organization of the chapel as an independent church was formally completed at the services held there Sunday morning, Feb. 3, 1884, when a large congregation was present. After the usual devotional exercises were concluded six candidates for baptism related their experience, when the usual preamble and resolutions necessary to organization, together with the rules of order, etc., were read and adopted. The name of the Washington Street Baptist Church was adopted, and the Rev. J. L. Davis was chosen pastor, and Alpheus A. Williams and George Cooke were elected deacons. William H. Canfield was elected clerk, and Mr. George Cooke treasurer. The ordinance of baptism was administered after the usual exercises. The chapel thus began its life as an independent church with forty-nine members, forty-two of whom were from the mother-church, the other seven joining by letter from other churches. The six baptized in the evening increased the membership to fifty-five. The church building has a seating capacity of four hundred. The Sunday-school attached is attended by two hundred and twenty-five scholars, who are taught by sixteen teachers.

RECOGNITION OF THE CHURCH.—An Ecclesiastical Council called by the church was convened in the church on Thursday, Feb. 28, 1884, at 2.30 o'clock, P.M. It was organized by choosing Rev. W. H. Parnley, D.D., of Jersey City, as moderator, and Rev. E. Thompson, of Lakewood, as clerk. Prayer was offered by Rev. T. Vassar, D.D., of Newark. Twenty-three churches were represented.

The letter by which the Council was called, and the records of the church in reference thereto, were read, stating the object to be the recognition of a body of baptized believers as a regular Baptist Church. The articles of faith, church covenant, standing resolution and rules of order were referred to a committee consisting of Rev. E. D. Simour, T. E. Vassar and Deacon E. C. Bart.

The committee on articles of faith, reported favorably, and the following resolution was adopted after hearing them read:

"WHEREAS, We have heard with great pleasure the reading of the Church Covenant, Rules of Order and Standing Resolution, and esteem them most excellent and deserving of special notice and worthy of the consideration and adoption of the Churches; and do also feel in hearty accord with their Articles of Faith, and that their history and statements give promise of a successful evangelical work in this field; therefore be it

"Resolved, That we recognize this body of brethren as a regular independent Baptist Church."

A committee of arrangements for the recognition services to be held in the evening was appointed, consisting of Revs. J. N. Fulwell, Davis, Bourne, Hunt and Gibb. Rev. Addison Parker presided at the recognition services; reading of Scriptures by Rev. E. Thompson, of Lakewood; opening prayer, Addison Parker, of Morristown; recognition sermon, E. A. Woods, of Paterson; prayer of recognition, R. M. Martin, of Orange; hand of fellowship, W. F. Taylor, of East Orange; charge to the church, A. W. Bourne, of Newark; benediction by the pastor, Rev. J. L. David. The Council was dissolved after prayer by Rev. W. H. Parnley.

Orange Valley Congregational Church.—The first pastor of this church was Rev. George B. Bacon, D.D., who served from 1861 until his death, in 1876. His successor in the pastoral office was Rev. Joseph A. Ely, who served from 1876 till the autumn of 1883. The church edifice is a beautiful Gothic structure, built in 1868, of trap rock, with brown-stone trimmings, tall spire and chime of bells. The church is located on Highland Avenue, near Lincoln Avenue.

The deacons in 1881 were James Bell, A. Carter, Jr., Lowell Mason, A. T. Moore and R. H. Thayer; Standing Committee, Alexander Brownlee, Alfred Crommelin and Richard Russell; Clerk, C. B. Crommelin; Trustees, R. H. Thayer, I. R. Lane, C. D. Merrell, G. Spottiswood, A. T. Hamilton and W. B. Gould. The membership of the church in 1881 was three hundred and thirty-six. Value of church property, seventy thousand dollars.

St. John's Church (Roman Catholic).—This parish was organized in 1850, and has continued to flourish from the start, and in 1869 commenced the erection of one of the most beautiful and imposing church edifices in the State. It is built of red sandstone and trap rock, taken from Orange Mountain, and is located on the corner of Ridge and White Streets, the highest point of land in the city, rising to the height of two hundred and thirty-eight feet above the sea-level. The church is surmounted by a stone spire and cross, reaching an altitude of nearly or quite two hundred feet above the base of the edifice, and contains a chime of bells, the music of which greets the ears of the citizens of Orange both morning and evening, calling them from the cares of the world to the sanctuary of the Most High. The interior of the church is one of grandeur and beauty, finished in the most elaborate style of Gothic architecture, and has a seating capacity of one thousand, and a membership of four thousand. St. John's owns several adjoining lots upon which are buildings and residences suitable for the great work this parish seems to have in hand. The Rev. H. P. Fleming, the present beloved priest of the parish, was installed in 1874. The schools of the parish are well attended and are in a flourishing condition. The Roman Catholic missions and schools in the valley are out-missions of St. John's. Value of church property, one hundred thousand dollars.

One of the Pioneer Ministers of the Mountain Society was Rev. Daniel Taylor, who came here as early as 1721, and purchased property on the corner of what is now Main and Hilyer Streets. From the number of deeds witnessed and apparently drawn by Mr. Taylor, he appears to have been the scrivener, as well as the minister of the parish. His ready pen and knowledge of legal forms were in frequent demand, and no doubt saved to the pioneer planters and parishioners many a fee that would otherwise have gone to the lawyers. His residence (afterward the tavern where the Park House now stands) bordered on the twenty acres bought of Thomas Gardner by the parish.

Besides the homestead, he had a tract of land lying a quarter of a mile to the north, on the southwest side of what is now Washington Street, afterward owned by the Williams family. Fifteen acres of this land were described as the certain tract or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the bounds of Newark aforesaid, at the mountain plantations, so called, and by a brook commonly called and known by the name of Parrow's brook,—beginning at a Walnut tree marked on the western side of the highway; thence running northwest down to said brook; thence northwesterly, as the brook runs, to the land of said Matthew Williams; and thence by his land to an highway, and so round by highways to the place where it began; containing, and to contain, fifteen acres, he there more or less.

This tract lay between the upper end of what is now Park Street and the brook, and was deeded by Daniel Taylor to Matthew Williams, Jr., June 1, 1731. The rest of his tract lay on the other side of Park Street, including the lot on which — Williams now resides. Between this and the road were twenty-six acres owned by Nathaniel Williams, and sold by him, Feb. 10, 1735, to Matthew Williams, who sold four acres of the same to the parish, or Mountain Society in 1748.

CITY OF ORANGE.

Cemeteries—OLD, or PRESBYTERIAN BURYING-GROUND.—The "old cemetery," as it is known, is located on the corner of Main and Scotland Streets, in the city of Orange, and is no doubt the oldest burying-ground in the county, outside the city of Newark, and for many years the only one in this part of the county. It was deeded to the Mountain Society by Nathaniel Wheeler. In 1792 about two acres were added to it by purchase from the heirs of Samuel Ogden. BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ABRAHAM MANDEVILLE.

The subject of this biographical sketch is descended from Huguenot stock. Yellis (Giles) Mandeville, his great-grandfather, was born Jan. 25, 1708, and married Leah Brown, whose birth occurred June 18, 1709. They had five sons, of whom Abraham, born Oct. 25, 1750, married Ann Van Waggoner, whose birth took place Jan. 27, 1751. Their children were Catharine, Yellis, Cornelius, William, Helmah, Abraham, Catharine (2d) and Leah. Yellis, of this number, was born Nov. 29, 1777, at Pompton Plains, Morris Co., and in Newark learned the trade of a tailor, which he followed for many years. He settled in Orange in 1800, where he resided during the remainder of his life. Mr. Mandeville married Sally, daughter of Henry factory in Orange, and later formed a copartnership with Edwin B. Whiting, which was continued until 1860. Mr. Mandeville then embarked in the flour and feed business, and subsequently, in connection with A. F. Pierson (under the firm-name of A. F. Pierson & Co.), engaged in the sale of coal. This was continued until 1883, when he retired from commercial life, though still a resident of the homestead in Orange. He has been for many years active in the field of politics, first as a Whig and later as a Republican, having for fifteen years filled the office of justice of the peace, and acted as coroner and held other positions of importance in the township. He was one of the incorporators of the Orange Savings Bank, of which he is still on the board of management. He is a member of Union Lodge, No. 11, of Free and Accepted Masons of Orange, and doubtless the oldest living Mason in the city. His religious associations arc in connection with the First Presbyterian Church of Orange. Mr Mandeville was, on the 16th of November, 1826, married to Lydia, daughter of Daniel and Phebe Kilburn, of the same place. Their children are Lewis A. (deceased), Sarah E. (deceased), Giles P., Phebe A. (Mrs. Lewis D. Harrison), and Mary K. (Mrs. Joseph A. Minott.) Mrs. Mandeville's death occurred Dec. 23, 1873.

JESSE WILLIAMS.

Matthew Williams emigrated about the year 1625 from Wales, and on the vessel which bore him to American shores married his wife, who was of Scotch birth. They settled near Weathersfield, Conn. Matthew, one of his three sons, removed to Newark in 1680, but not being altogether satisfied with his surroundings, chose the present West Orange township as his permanent abode, where he acquired a considerable tract of land. His four sons were Amos, Matthew, Gershom, and Thomas. Matthew, the great-grandfather of Jesse, married Abigail Nutman, and settled on the site of his great-grandson's present home, where he was a farmer and master of the trade of a stone-mason. His youngest son, Thomas, was born in 1740 and died in 1830, having been a captain of militia during the Revolutionary war. His wife was Doreas Harrison, to whom were born four sons—Moses, Matthew, William, and Jesse—and five daughters. Matthew, of this number, was born in 1776 and died in 1830. He cultivated the land he inherited, and also learned the trade of a carpenter. He married Phebe Williams, and had children—Phebe, Philip and Sarah—all deceased. By a second union, with Elizabeth Leonard, were children—John, Jesse, Abigail and Amzi—all of whom are deceased, with the exception of Jesse, who was born April 29, 1810, on the homestead now occupied by him. Opportunities for a thorough scholastic training were in those early days exceedingly limited, and when a youth he was apprenticed to the hatter's trade, his period of service being concluded at the age of twenty-one. He then inherited a farm, and since that date has been devoted to the employments of a farmer, having purchased various other tracts of land, which he cultivated and improved. In addition, he for many years conducted a grist mill, but has recently abandoned this pursuit and confines his attention exclusively to farming. Mr. Williams was, on the 20th of November, 1832, married to Mary Williams, of West Orange, and has children—Julia, Mary, Jesse (deceased), Matthew (deceased), and two who died in infancy. In politics Mr. Williams formerly adhered to the platform of the Whig party and later became a pronounced Republican. He has been honored with various offices, having been for one term judge of the Court of Common Pleas, for fifteen years justice of the peace, and for two terms director of the Board of Freeholders of the county. He also held for many years a commission as major of militia, and was for several years a member of the Essex County Road Board. He was one of the incorporators and is a trustee of the Orange Savings-Bank. He is a member of Union Lodge, No. 11, of Free and Accepted Masons, of which he was for one year Master, and actively identified with the Protestant Episcopal Church as a member. Judge Williams has for sixty years been an outspoken temperance advocate, and given his influence and example to the cause of total abstinence.

CHAPTER LXIII.

SOUTH ORANGE TOWNSHIP.

SOUTH ORANGE, as a locality, had a history long anterior to the date of its organization as a separate township. Some of the original settlers of Newark took up lands within its present limits. They and their descendants remained inhabitants of the town of Newark until 1806-7, at which time a division of Newark was made, and Orange ward was constituted. The town meetings were held regularly; the place of meeting, however, does not appear upon record until "Oct. 3, 1763, Warned by the Constable, held at the Court House at Newark," and from the latter date the meetings appear to have been so held until the meeting held "the 14th day of April, 1809," at which time a provision was made for holding "the next Annual Election for Members of the State Legislature, etc., be opened at the House of Bethuel Pierson, at Orange, and continued there during the first day of the same, and that the said Election on the Second Day, be opened, held, and Closed at the Court House in Newark." This plan appeared to have been practiced until 1807, possibly still later. In the records of 1807, however, there is the following:

"Agreeable to the fifth Resolv. passed at the last annual Town meeting, a meeting of the Township Committee and Assessors was held at the house of Samuel Munn, in Orange, on the ninth day of May, 1806, when it was agreed that the following should be the division lines—Beginning at the Green Island in Passaic River; and running from thence to the Bolling Spring on lands of Phineas Baldwin, dec'd, and from thence to the Bridge at the Slough between the houses of Jonathan Baldwin and Elisha Pearson; and from thence to the Bridge near Silas Dadd's; and from thence to the Bridge near Martin Richards', and from thence to Turkey Eagle Rock on the top of the first Mountain, which we agree shall be the line between the Bloomfield Ward and the Ward of Newark and Orange. And also, that the line between Newark Ward and Orange Ward shall begin at the old Bolling Spring; and from thence running to Peck's Bridge on Great Meadow Brook; and from thence to the Bridge called Coleman's Bridge; and from thence following the River called Elizabeth or Elizabeth River to the line of the Township of Elizabeth. Witness our hands this ninth day of May, 1806. D. D. Crane, Thos. Baldwin, Stephen Hays, Stephen D. Day, Township Committee; Elias A. Baldwin, John Dadd, Nathan Squire, Assessors."

The time and circumstances under which the name South Orange originated will, probably, never be known and we are obliged to fall back on a tradition, that Mr. Nathan Squier first used the name in an advertisement offering wood for sale at vendue.

Pioneer Settlers and Lands in South Orange.¹—

RIGGS FAMILY.—On Sept. 27, 1680, the Town adopted the following: "Item, Nathaniel Wheeler, Edward Riggs and Joseph Riggs, have a Grant to take up Lands upon the upper Chesnut hill by Raway River, near the Stone House²; provided they exceed not above sixty Acres apiece."

The land thus taken up by Edward Riggs, was afterward surveyed to Thomas Luddington,³ in 1686, on Stone House Brook. Our road history, 1795, shows that Edward Riggs's plantation was somewhere near Millburn. It also locates a Joseph Riggs immediately in South Orange; this Joseph Riggs the writer conjectures to have been the elder son of Edward Riggs mentioned.⁴ His name, however, does not appear on the Town Records as an officer until 1721, from which time it frequently occurs, up to, and including, March 11, 1743-44. Tombstones in the Orange churchyard, bear the inscriptions: Joseph Riggs died Sept. 11, 1744, aged sixty-nine years; Sarah Riggs, wife of Joseph Riggs, died June 17, 1735, aged fifty-two years, and they are believed to have been the parents of Gideon Riggs, born 1713, who died at Morristown, aged seventy-three years. Zebulon Riggs, born 1718, who died at Mendham, aged sixty-two years. Joseph Riggs, born 1720, who died at Newark, aged seventy-nine years. Daniel Riggs, born May 29, 1724, who died at South Orange, aged sixty-four years; a daughter, wife of John Heiden, another, wife of Thomas Cushman, and Sarah, wife of Daniel Roberts.

These sons and daughters were probably born in the old stone house which Daniel Riggs added to and rebuilt in 1774, and is the one mentioned by Mr. Hoyt. The memorial stone over the entrance had a double heart, enclosing the letters:

"Sergeant Edward Riggs, an early settler at Derby, was at Milford in 1649;" his name as well as that of his son Joseph, appears among the original list of the settlers of Newark. The records also show that he was quite prominently engaged in the town affairs. His death occurred prior to 1670, for at that time a division of lands was made to the widow, Elizabeth Riggs.

A home lot was also recorded to her, it having one acre allowed in addition, in consideration of her remaining on the place the first summer. Mrs. Riggs, it is probable, afterward became the wife of Caleb Carwithie, of Elizabethtown; "sundry surveys having been recorded in his name;" the lands described being afterward divided among the heirs of Edward Riggs. The children of Edward Riggs were, Joseph, Edward and Mary, wife of George Day, another of the original settlers.

In 1671, "Joseph Riggs hath surrendered unto him from his Father-in-law (step Father?), Caleb Carwithie, with his mother's consent, one-half the Home Lot, next William's (originally recorded to the Widow Riggs), three acres and three rods, with Wm. Camp, south, Father Carwithie north and the highways east and west, as the bill of sale will more at large show." Four other tracts are mentioned, each by his mother's consent, and each containing one half of the original quantity recorded to the Widow Riggs and Caleb Carwithie. It is probable that Joseph Riggs resided with his mother, for in 1670-71, the record says: "Ths. Richards and Widow Riggs, Her son are chosen To Waune the Town meetings, each of them his Part as they did the Last Year."

In 1676, Joseph Riggs conveyed to his brother, Edward Riggs, a part of his home lot, but no wife is then mentioned.

He also filled various posts of duty, and is mentioned in the records of 1670 as agreeing to floor one-half the meeting-house.

The will of Joseph Riggs, proved Nov. 27, 1689, has the following items in brief: "My wife to enjoy the whole estate, excepting two guns and one sword." His son John, after his mother's decease, to have his whole accommodation, except as below. His wife marrying again—then John was to have possession when twenty years of age, together with any future division of lands, also "My hunting gun and my sword." His sons Samuel and Zophar were to have all his land at the mountain, and Samuel to have the other gun.

His daughter Elizabeth to be at her mother's dispose to bestow upon her according to ability, at her age of eighteen or at her marriage."

The will of Samuel Riggs was proven in 1710.

Letters of administration were issued in 1773 to Phebe, widow of Zophar Riggs, of Morris County.

In 1701-2, John Riggs, son of Joseph, and Paul Day, son of Mary, divided a tract of land, designated as formerly belonging to "our honored grandfather, Edward Riggs, deceased," they being jointly interested therein. Edward Riggs, second of the name, had a home lot situated on what is now Clinton Avenue, in Newark. In 1691 he conveyed the same to John Brown, Jr., wife Mary signing the deed. Tradition says they had children,—Joseph, James, Samuel, John, Anna Gage, Mary Lindsley, Martha Freeman, Elizabeth Lyon and Charity.

Gideon Riggs and Zebulon Riggs, sons of Joseph, probably removed to Morris County (at that time Hunterdon), and had numerous descendants.

Joseph Riggs, the third son of Joseph, married Abigail Brown. His services for the public began as collector in 1742, and continued with great regularity in different forms, and closed as moderator. This office he had filled in the years 1761 (following John Ogden, Esq., in 1759, and Joseph Camp, Esq., in 1760, the first two of record,) 1764, 1766, 1770, 1778, 1779 and 1781.

In 1766 he was in office as an elder in the Church of Orange, and in 1783 his name heads the list of trustees appointed by the Legislature of the State in the act of incorporation. He, however, removed from the parish within the year of his appointment. (Hoyt, 131 and 275.)

He was well known as Justice Riggs. His residence was situated on what is now Prospect Street, and on land now owned by Mr. R. Van Burskirk, and included all the land bounded by Irvington Avenue on the northeast, Hayes' land southeast, and Silas Ball southwest.¹

The farm of Justice Riggs, as appears by documents executed in 1765, was purchased, seventeen and a half acres of James Banks in 1750, and thirty-two acres of Joseph Tompkins in 1746-47. A part of the land had been surveyed in 1726 to Jacob Arents, and afterward sold by the sheriff, in 1744, to David Ogden, and by Ogden transferred to Mr. James Alexander.

The old house on the premises, and which was recently demolished, was occupied by him for many years. The writer has no data showing who built the house.

The premises were afterward owned by Mr. Aaron Tichenor, and a part thereof is still held by his descendants.²

The will of Joseph Riggs names children,—Cyrenus, Caleb Smith, Abigail Crane, Sarah Myer, Prudence Young, Hannah Ward, Jerusha Swan and Experience Smith. (Congar Rec.)

Daniel Riggs, the fourth son of Joseph, was apparently appointed to settle the estate after the death of his father, and although only twenty-years old, his book of accounts shows that his education had not been neglected, and that he possessed a method or capacity for transacting business.

The first entry in the book is as follows: "September ye 28th, 1744. Then, in consideration of eighteen pence per pound, I am to settle accounts with people and receive what is due." The record then shows the dates and various settlements in the following form: "Reckoned with Ezekiel Johnson and remaining due, 1, 13, 2." (Evidently pounds, shillings and pence.)

As the book contains the greatest number of names of the then residents known to the writer, we present them, as follows, viz.: Ezekiel Johnson, Aaron Ball, Samuel Crowell, Jeremiah Johnson, Bethuel Pierson, William Smith, Sr., James Tompkins, Daniel Baldwin, Sr., Isaac Ward, Ebenezer Hedden, Hannah Singleton, Elisha Lindsley, Timothy Osborn, Joseph Riggs, Daniel Roberts, Samuel Condit, Daniel Ward, Job Brown, Samuel Lamson, Nathaniel Campbell, Nathaniel Williams, Mary Johnson (widow), Thomas Day, Elisha Stansborough, Gilbert Hedden, Ebenezer Faren, Daniel Taylor, Capt. Williams, Timothy Ball, Joseph Jones, Swain Ogden, Benjamin Lindsley, Leonard Ward, William Smith, Jr., Hugh Robords, Sarah Riggs, Thomas Cushman, John Hedden, Matthew Williams, estate of Thomas Ball (paid by Timothy Ball), Amos Harrison, Samuel Ogden (by Joseph Pierson), Thomas Dean, Isaac Condit (for Thomas Day), Nathaniel Ogden, Benony Tomas (afterward written Thomas), Mary Walls, Ebenezer Lindsley, Josiah Linsly, James Wood, Samuel Nuttman, Sr., John Condit, Samuel Freeman.

Among the items are payments to Dr. Burnet, 16s. 6d., and to Isaac Condit for digging a grave, 2s.

The name Ichabod Burnet appears in a different

¹No. 38, township map.

²No. 41, township map.

handwriting, but for the same amount as that named above to Dr. Burnet.

The book also contains the record of his marriage to Sarah Lamson, "November ye 23, 1748." The date of the birth of their children, their names, and the date of the death of his wife and several of the children, five deaths occurring respectively, Sept. 9, 15 and 21, his wife on Sept. 24, 1776 and Jan. 25, 1777.

The farm of Daniel Riggs extended from Rahway River to the westerly side of the mountain, the dwelling-house standing upon the site now occupied by the rectory of the church of the Holy Communion.

By the will of Daniel Riggs, bearing date Oct. 1, 1780, his homestead was divided by marked points; the northerly side including the house and barns in fee to one of his sons, and the southerly portion to another married son, subject, however, to his having issue, in default of which the land so devised was to go to his surviving heirs. To another son he gave a farm known as Bower's Place,¹ excepting five acres on the southeasterly corner thereof, which he gave to his daughter, Phebe Terril.

"Bower's Place" is frequently named in the records. Mr. Riggs bought it of Joseph Gardner in 1767; it was bounded by Ward's Lane on the east, South Orange Avenue on the northeast, Irvington Avenue southwest, and Mary, widow of Josiah Hedden, northwest; a large portion of it is still owned by his descendants, some of whom bear the family name.² The original deed is in possession of Daniel T. Clark, Esq.

A large-sized Bible which belonged to Daniel Riggs is now in possession of a great-grandson, Daniel Riggs, of Philadelphia. It contains upon the leaves between the Old and New Testament a record made by Benjamin Riggs, as follows: date—"This day finished reading the Bible in course." This record is made one hundred and twenty-nine times.

THE BOWER'S PLANTATION is designated on the township map by several different references in connection with the various subsequent owners. It was sold by Joseph Gardner and Mary, his wife, to Daniel Riggs, by deed bearing date Nov. 25, 1767, and is described as follows:

"Beginning at a Corner, being a Corner of the widow Mary Hedden's Land, thence Southerly on sd. Mary Hedden's Line to the Road, thence South Easterly along sd. Road until it comes to the Road that goes to Elisha Ward's, thence North Easterly as the Road goes until it comes to the Road that comes from Newark, Abel Ward, thence Northwesterly as the Road goes until it Comes to the first mentioned corner or place." The witnesses to the deed were Bethuel Pierson and John Hedden, Jr.

The following is a survey of ten acres of the Bowers place that was to go to John Hedden, and four acres to Phebe Riggs:

"The 10 acres piece w^{ch} s^d John Headen is to have . . . BALL FAMILY.—"Edward Ball, from Branford, 1664, High Sheriff of Essex, 1693, Grand Juror, 1709, acknowledged agreement with Azariah Crane to prevent any difference hereafter, in 1724." He had Joseph, Moses, Thomas, Caleb, Lydia Peek, Abigail Harrison. (Congar Record.)

He was, in addition to the above, appointed and elected to fill various offices and upon committees to act in certain matters, the records show that he was messenger for the town court in 1675 and 1677; town attorney in 1679, 1680 and 1686; overseer of the poor in 1692; of the town's men in 1679, 1680, 1685 and 1691; constable in 1683, 1689; surveyor of highways in 1674, 1678; and grave-digger in 1679. The agreement above-mentioned is as follows:

"That, whereas deacon Azariah Crane and Edward Ball, both of Newark and County of Essex, in the Eastern division of East New Jersey, have for many years past settled upon a tract of land being in the bounds of said Newark, at a place called the Mountain, and commonly so called, and at our first settling, no dividing line between us, but upon consideration of ourselves and our posterity upon mature deliberation have concluded and settled a dividing line between us, and the then right lodging in us, and to prevent any difference that might hereafter arise thereon, we, the parties above named, have agreed that line between us shall be as the said fence now standeth, from the Mountain to the Highway, only to come straight toward the Mountain where it flows into the said deacon Crane's land; and it is agreed that where it comes to the Highway below the Spring, that the Highway shall run down upon the bar of land as near to the Swamp next Deacon Crane's as is most feasible for a cart and cattle to go till it comes over a small run and between a small chestnut tree and a Birch tree standing not above two rods or three number, and thence to run upon a direct line to the corner tree, it being a white oak, and to this present agreement we, the above named Azariah Crane and Edward Ball have set to our hands this 18th March, 1715.

"June the 24, 1724. There appeared before me John Cooper, one of his Majesty's Justices of the peace for the county of Essex, in New Jersey, the within named Azariah Crane and Edward Ball, and made oath that the within agreement was verbally made and concluded between them, the said Azariah Crane, Son, and Edward Ball, when they were the rightful owners and in actual possession of the said tracts of land, and sometime after committed it to writing, and did then unanimously set their hands for the fuller information thereof.

JAMES COOPER.

The writer had conjectured that the surveys made April 27th, 1694, to Edward Ball and Azariah Crane (as below), and to which the above agreement alludes, was located within the present limits of South Orange. The record of surveys of roads shows, however, that this conjecture was not well founded. This record is in words as follows:

Oct. 8, 1705. "Another Road running by line of marked Trees unto Anthony Oliff's House."

"Another road running from sd Anthony's House to first mentioned Road, by a line of marked Trees and path to the other Road running from sd Anthony's Road to Caleb Ball's House, by a path and marked Trees."

Anthony Oliff was located in what is now a part of Orange (or West Orange), near Montclair, and Caleb Ball had by purchase a part of the lands of his father. (See below.)

The surveys and deed above mentioned are in brief to Azariah Crane, at the Mountain, S. W. 25 chains in length, N. W. 25 chains in breadth, S. W. by John Gardner, N. W. Mountain, N. E. Edward Ball and Highway, S. E. by unsurveyed land, to Edward Ball, beginning at Azariah Crane's corner by the Mountain (1) E 25 chains, (2) N. 24 chains. Also where this ends 34 chains in length and 7 chains in breadth, another along the Mountain 24 chains in length and 20 chains in breadth, W. by Azariah Crane, S. Mountain, N. John Baldwin, Jr., E. Azariah Crane, and unsurveyed.

On May 1, 1704, Edward Ball (in exchange for a house, also homestead, now in his possession,) conveyed to his son, Caleb Ball, 50 acres at the foot of the Mountain, and next adjacent northward from Azariah Crane's farm, beginning at said Crane's line and extending northward the whole breadth of the said Ball's lot until it shall contain full fifty acres. Caleb Ball, in 1706, exchanged the above-named tract with John Canfield for sixty acres in the bend of the Third River.

If Edward Ball was not personally a settler in South Orange his descendants were, and still are residents therein, and the record above was introduced for the threefold purpose of showing the spirit and character of the man, the simplicity and honesty of purpose exhibited by the men of that day in their transactions with each other, and also that the descendants referred to may obtain a clue to the acts and doings of their ancestor.

"Thomas Ball, third son of Edward Ball, married Sarah Davis. He died 18th October, 1744, aged 57 years. "An aged man of four years old." His will names Timothy, Aaron, Nathaniel, David, Ezekiel, John, Thomas, Amos, Mary, Rachel and Apphia, wife of Simon Searing." (Congar Rec.)

Timothy Ball, eldest son of Thomas, married Esther

Bruen. He died 7th January, 1758. (Congar Rec.) His will, dated in 1752 (on parchment, and now in possession of Mrs. Selim Freeman), gives his lands to his sons, John and Uzal, subject to their mother's right to the entire use thereof during her widowhood, and legacies to his daughters Sarah, Charity and Rachel. The house built by Timothy (possibly by his father, Thomas) is still standing in moderately good repair, on Ridgewood road. A stone in the chimney has the initial letters "T. E. B. 1743," in another chimney the figures 1772; the latter being probably an addition built to the original house.¹

Is not this house the oldest now standing in the village?

A portion of the original farm is in the possession of Mr. Selim Freeman, who married Miss Ball, a lineal descendant of Timothy Ball.

PIERSON FAMILY.—Bethuel Pierson "heir-at-law," administered upon the estate of Samuel on Jan. 11, 1773. Bethuel Pierson gave a mortgage upon one hundred acres, whereon he now lives at the mountain plantation by a certain brook called Stone House Brook. (A. M.'s Essex Co., p. 250.)

Deacon Bethuel Pierson had a stone addition added to his dwelling-house, which he caused to be dedicated by religious ceremonies, especially requesting that the following words should be sung on the occasion:

Be not too proud by any means,
Build not your house too high,
But always have before your mind,
That you were born to die."

Deacon Bethuel Pierson died in 1791, aged 90 years. He had sons,—Cyrus, M. D., who inherited the homestead, and Deacon Joseph, who owned and resided in the "stone house" situated on the corner of Jefferson Avenue and road to Pierson's mills. (See "Pierson's Mills.")

Cyrus Pierson conveyed the lands to Nathaniel Condit on May 11, 1793; it consisted of one hundred and sixteen acres, the description "beginning at the road in the lands formerly of Bethuel Pierson and Abel Ward, both deceased." The deed to Condit was recorded in book A of deeds, which is lost.

Moses Lindsley subsequently owned and occupied the farm, which has, however, been divided; the dwelling and part of the land is now owned and occupied by William A. Brewer, president of the Washington Life Insurance Company of New York.²

BROWN FAMILY.—John Brown came from Milford with the first settlers in 1606. His will (proved in 1690) names as his children, John (eldest), Joseph, Thomas, Daniel, Esther, Mary Pierson, Hannah Riggs, Phebe Dod, and Elizabeth Freeman, and also appoints my son "Daniel Brown, Executor, my loving brother, Ephraim Burwell, and my loving son, John Brown, to be my overseers." The inventory, dated Nov. 6, 1690, "appraised Dec. 4, 1690, by us, John Curtis and Ephraim Burwell," amounted to the sum of seventy pounds and sixteen shillings.

Among the devises was the following: "To my two sons, Joseph Brown and Thomas Brown, their heirs, etc., forty acres beyond Elizabeth River as bounded in my Patent to be equally divided between them." The town had, however, in 1686, adopted the following: "Item, Joseph Brown and Thomas Brown have Liberty granted to exchange their Father's Third Division of Land lying beyond Elizabeth River and to take up the Quantity thereof on this side Raway River, below the Mouth of Stone House Brook." They also "had liberty to take up sixty acres of land between them."

The survey for Joseph Brown was made by the town surveyor in 1686, in brief: "a piece of upland granted by the Town vote, 30 acres on the mountain side down to Rahway River, bounded by the River East, John Treat South, Top of the Hill West, and Thomas Brown North;" and the following memorandum was added: "note this Land hath a House on it, built by Joseph Brown and Thomas Brown, either of them having an equal share of it."¹

The survey to Thomas Brown was made at the same time and had Samuel Tichenor north; and the same proviso in regard to the ownership of the house.

The land so given to Joseph Brown (it is understood) has never passed out of the possession of his family and descendants, and is now owned and occupied by Mr. A. F. Tillou, who married a daughter of Samuel Brown, a lineal descendant.

The land of Thomas Brown was sold in A. D. 1800 by Moses Osborn to Amos Freeman, and is described as "the farm formerly of Timothy Osborn, and was left by him to his son, Moses Osborn, said premises being those conveyed to said Timothy Osborn by Thomas Brown and David Brown (sons of Thomas; Congar Record) by Deed, May 19th, 1720, . . . binding north on Henry Squier, south on Samuel Brown, west on Top of the Mountain, east on Rahway River." The property is now owned by — Martin, who purchased it of the heirs of Ira T. Freeman in 1880.

A survey, made by John Curtis, deputy surveyor, for John Treat, bears date April 27, 1694, for "a tract of upland by Rahway River on the east side, beginning at Stone House Brook, thence down the River 26 chains, . . . 12 chains at the south end, and 20 chains at the north end," and "bounded north by the Brook, west by the River, south and east by unsurveyed Land."

The writer has no record showing who succeeded Mr. Treat as owner. A reference is made to the property, in a deed made by William Chetwood, Esq., high sheriff, to David Ogden, dated Aug. 1, 1744, the sale being made by order of court, the following being part of the description, viz.:

"Also a tract of land in the bounds of Newark on the eastward side of Rahway River, and beginning at the southwesterly corner of Samuel Tompkins' land, which was patented to John Treat, late of said Newark, Esquire, deceased, in August, 1696, on the east bank of said River; thence east 12 chains and S. 63, 40 E., 20 chains along said patented lands to a Highway; thence along said highway 25 chains to a line of John Walls; thence along John Walls line N. 48, W. 29 chains; thence S. 2, W. 20 chains; thence S. 35, E. 34 chains, to the first corner of John Walls in the line of Robert Campbell, late of Newark, deceased; thence along the line of Campbell 47 chains to said Rahway River, thence on a direct line to where it began."

This tract contained fifty-three acres, and was purchased by Dr. Jacob Arents, defendant in the suit of Peter Sonman, May 17, 1726. . . . The tract was subsequently conveyed by Mr. Ogden to James Alexander.

In 1751, Samuel Tompkins conveyed to Jonathan Tompkins² (possibly son or brother) for five shillings, one hundred acres, bounded west by the Rahway River, north by Stone House Brook, east by a highway (now Prospect Street, MSS in possession of Mr. Aaron Brown).

The following copy of an original document is in the possession of the writer hereof, and is presented as an illustration of the manner in which business was transacted at an early date.

"Know all men by these presents that I, John Lyon, of Newark, Do promise & Engage to Keep Ebenezer Tompkins In Demolished in & about the certain piece of land being in the possession of Samuel Tompkins. It being a small piece About half an acre, lying between the highway & Stone house brook, itly between samuell house & raway river; further I, the sd John Lyon, do by these presents promise to fall fill the above Engagemant, as witness I have set herunto my hand this nineteenth Day of No : In the tenth year of his Reign, 1723.

"STEP BROWNE.

"JONATHAN BOLDWIN."

"JOHN LYON.

In 1802 the heirs of Job Tompkins quit-claimed to each other their rights to the above property, Mr. Job Brown and Mr. Nathan Squier father of Mr. Daniel Squier, being among the number.³

A part of the tract mentioned as being conveyed by Mr. Ogden to Mr. Alexander afterward came into possession of James Banks, who sold it to Joseph Riggs, Jr., Nov. 16, 1750. Upon this was located the house (recently demolished) which Mr. Riggs occupied for many years. The land was bounded by the highway to Newark N. Ely, Hayes land S. Ely, Sila, Ball, S'ly, and the next-mentioned tract W'ly.

In 1747, Joseph Tompkins conveyed to Joseph Riggs, Jr., "32 acres, bounded S'ly by land late of Samuel Tompkins, and partly by a cross road, leading to Bethuel Pierson's Mill, E'ly by the highway leading to Newark, and S'ly by the above mentioned."

Mr. Riggs remained the owner for many years and in 1771 executed a mortgage thereon, . . . "being the farm whereon he lately lived."

It was owned by Mr. Aaron Tichenor for many years, and was divided among heirs, some of whom still hold possession.⁴

Henry Squier in 1774 resided in the stone house—now the farm-house—on the Reimond estate.¹ His son, Nathan Squier, was sheriff of Essex County.

WARD FAMILY.—By the will of Abel Ward, 1792, he devised a portion of the land to his son Aaron, and the remainder, including the buildings, to his son Jonathan.

On the 29th of March, 1796, Jonathan Ward and wife, Rachel, conveyed to Jabez Pierson and Isaac Pierson, "in consideration of the sum of seven hundred and fifty pounds, good and lawful money of the State of New Jersey." As this deed was not recorded, we quote the description, and thereby locate the lands beyond reasonable doubt.

"Beginning on the north corner of Gershom Kilborn's land on the South corner of the Road, leading from South Orange to Newark, and from thence, running along said Road, North seventy-eight degrees and twenty minutes, West 700 chains and ninety-two links thence north fifty-seven degrees and fifty minutes West, crossing said Road and running along the line of Benjamin Baldwin's land, nineteen chains and sixty-two links, to Nathaniel Good's land, thence along his line; South thirty-eight degrees and forty-five minutes, West nineteen chains and eighty-three links, to said Road, thence along same South eighty-six degrees and twenty minutes, East two chains and twenty-two links, thence South forty degrees and six minutes west, crossing said Road and running along the Road leading to the Farms, six chains and ninety-seven links, to Van N. Ward's corner, thence along his line, South fifty-one degrees and thirty-five minutes, East about twenty-five chains and forty links to Tichenor's land, thence along his line and the line of said Kilborn, to a Ditch, thence along said Ditch to a splice at the end of said Ditch, thence along the line of said Kilborn, north thirty-one degrees and forty-five minutes East, to the said Road leading to Newark, or the beginning corner, containing about sixty-nine acres."²

"JONATHAN WARD, L. S."

"Signed in presence of Amos Terril, Nehemiah Hobden."

Since the date last above given the land has been owned by Nathaniel Linsley, — Harrison, — Amos Freeman, Thomas Lowndes, and is now Seton Hall College grounds and farm.

John Walls, designated "Carpenter," had several tracts of land surveyed and laid out to him in South Orange. One of these was in right of Gunton Laurie by Isabella Davis, his grand-daughter, dated May 20, 1721, and described as "Beginning at a white oak tree marked on four sides, standing by a swamp; thence running N.W., 5 W, 28 chains, to stake by a Highway (2) S.W. 20 S. 21 chains, (3) S.E. 8 E. 22 chains into swamp, (4) 19 chains, to beginning, containing 48 acres and 1, bounded S.W. by Edward Riggs, S. Easterly by unsurveyed land."

On June 23, 1837, one John Ward conveyed by deed to Abner Ward and Nathaniel Ward, in consideration of seventy pounds, "Forty-eight and three-quarter acres, at the mountain plantation, so-called, at a place commonly called and known by the name of Chestnut Hill. Beginning at tree by Swamp, and thence running (1) N.W. 5 degrees, W. 28 chains to stake by a Highway, (2) S.W. twenty degrees S. twenty-one chains, (3) S. eight degrees, E. twenty-two chains into the swamp, (4) thence nineteen chains to the beginning. Having Joseph Pierson S., Highway W., David Smith N., Elisha Stansborough, E. . . ." The two descriptions being so nearly identical, we are disposed to believe that they refer to the same premises, but as they do not designate the locality definitely, other conveyances must be relied upon for the purpose, and we find that in 1767 a conveyance of a well-known tract was made to Daniel Riggs, in which the road passing the house of Elihu Ward (now known as Ward's Lane) and the road from Newark passing by Abel Ward's House, are given as boundaries. As the writer has no knowledge of any other lands owned by the family of Ward in South Orange, he takes it for granted that the original survey covered a part of the lands owned by the brothers Abel and Elihu Ward.

The land of Elihu Ward was bounded by Ward's Lane N. W'ly, Irvington avenue S. W'ly, Lands now owned and occupied by Mr. William Bradbury, S. E'ly and N. E'ly, extending into "Dismal Swamp." His dwelling stood facing the south, near the line of the road (Ward's Lane), and was owned and occupied, within a recent period, by Mr. Aaron Ward.³

That portion of the lands of Elihu Ward on the southeast became the property, by devise, of his brother-in-law, Mr. Aaron Crowell, and is now owned and occupied by his grandson, Mr. Calvin Crowell.

Other portions are owned by Mr. Philander Ball, Joseph W. Taylor, J. W. Hughes and others.

The land of Abel Ward adjoined his brother Elihu on the N.E., and extended S.E. into "Dismal Swamp," N.E. to land of Benjamin Baldwin (crossing South Orange Avenue), and binding in part on the road (Ward's Lane).

BALDWIN FAMILY.—Benjamin Baldwin, in his will dated Sept. 1, 1801, proved April 9, 1804, among other devises, gives "to eldest son Josias, in addition to the farm he now lives on, all that ten-acre lot I bought of Benjamin Coe adjoining on Gershom Kilborn . . . To son Uzal all that farm he now lives on¹ To son Jephtha all the farm I now live on, including the land I bought of Jabez Pier-son."

The farm of Josias Baldwin was afterwards owned and occupied by his son, Josiah Ogden Baldwin, now the property of Albert Smith.²

The Uzal Baldwin farm is now the East Orange Poor Farm.

The Jephtha Baldwin farm is owned by his son Benjamin.

Aaron Baldwin, understood to be a brother of Benjamin above named, owned and died in the stone house in the northwest corner of South Orange Avenue and Munn Avenue. By his will, dated Sept. 7, 1797, he devised to his son Elias "forty acres of my land on the westerly end by Elizabeth River.

. To son Aaron my house and all my land which I have not given to Elias, etc."³

Aaron, however, died intestate, before his father, 1805, and the father, Aaron Sr., made a codicil to his will in which he devises to gaudous Ncheniah, Joel and Cyrus, and further provides that their mother—the widow of his son, Aaron—should be entitled to the same right of dower in the estate as she would have been had the property been vested in her husband and had he died intestate.

Aaron Baldwin's land was bounded on the west by Uzal Baldwin.³

Clark Hedden in 1815 resided in a house, now standing, on the northerly side of South Orange Avenue.⁴ At that time, 1815, there were but five or six dwellings between it and High Street, in Newark.

In 1764 the lands of Moses Baldwin are named as being on the westerly border of the lands of Joseph and Thomas Hayes.

On April 14, 1796, Moses Baldwin quit-claimed 37 acres, $\frac{1}{4}$ and 31 rods to Jabez B. Baldwin. Beginning at the west bounds of Dennison's patent.

Thomas Baldwin died in 1821, aged 75. He owned a stone dwelling-house and store on the westerly side of what is now Boyden Avenue,—had sons, Joseph T. and David C. The land is now owned and occupied by Mr. William Hawkins.⁵

Daniel Hayes does not appear as having any interest in the lands near Elizabeth River. The following records locate him on the lands formerly of Amos Terrill. His death must have occurred before Aug. 15, 1774.

TICHENOR FAMILY.—Martin Tichenor, one of the original settlers of Newark, was father-in-law of Mr. John Treat.

John Tichenor, a lineal descendant of Martin, owned the farm and stone house now owned by John Smith Brown, on Irvington Avenue.

In 1764, John Tichenor is named as the owner of land on the westerly boundary of the Hayes property on "Denison's gutter."

The will of John Tichenor, dated in 1784, names children,—Nathan, Joseph, Isaac, Nathaniel, Lydia and Hannah.

The four sons appear to have had the farm of their father divided between them. Nathaniel resided on the corner of Irvington and Boyden Avenues. Nathaniel resided on the property now owned by Mr. Joseph Bradbury. Isaac remained on the old home-stead, and Joseph resided in the house now occupied by Mr. Mahlon W. Vail.

The stone house on the Tichenor farm was erected about one hundred and thirty years ago.⁶

Pioneer Surveys and Lot-Owners.—We find among our early records of surveys that the following are recorded, viz.: one to William Camp, dated April 27, 1694, for land on the east side of Rahway River, at Lightning Brook, beginning at the brook and running westerly 72 chains to the river; thence up the river 14 chains; thence east 66 chains; thence south and east 21 chains to beginning.

To Robert Campbell, on Feb. 13, 1714, in right of George Willocks, beginning at tree by Lightning Brook, thence westerly 57 chains to tree by a small brook; thence northwest-westerly 33 chains to Rahway River; thence down the river 25 chains; thence east-southeasterly 71 chains to Lightning Brook; thence by said brook to beginning, containing one hundred and fifty acres.

To John Barwell, beginning at a tree by Lightning Brook, thence up the brook 4 chains; thence north-west-westerly 71 chains to Rahway River; thence down the river 27 chains; thence to beginning, containing one hundred acres, with the brook easterly, Robert Campbell, West River, westerly, John Barwell and William Camp, southerly; "now in possession of Robert Campbell."⁷

In July, 1713, Allen Wilkinson conveyed to Robert Campbell by deed, in consideration of sixteen pounds, nine and one-half acres on east side of Rahway River, with river west, Robert Campbell west, Edward Riggs, east and other lots south.

The families Barwell and Campbell are not now residents of South Orange, and the above record is the only one made in the name of Campbell, so far as is known to the writer.

Surveys of lands were made to the Burwells.

The land above described as being conveyed to Robert Campbell is supposed to have descended to his sons, one of whom conveyed as follows:

On Jan. 21, 1740-41, Samuel Campbell (weaver) conveyed by deed to Aaron Ball,⁸ for one hundred and fifty pounds, seventy acres: "beginning at a tree standing by Lightning Brook and running northwest-westerly 57 chains to another tree. . . . southerly 19 chains. . . . Thence to beginning; bounded northeast by Hayes' land, northwest by Tompkins' land, southwest by Crowell's land, west by Edin Lindle." The deed above mentioned was not recorded; the folds in the paper have obliterated the courses run, except as above. This paper (with others referred to below) is now in possession of Mr. K. H. Ball.

On April 1, 1752, Nathaniel Campbell conveyed to Aaron Ball, by deed, one and one-quarter acres of land on the east side of the highway and southwest side of Lightning Brook.

The will of Aaron Ball, dated and admitted to probate in 1752, devises to sons, Silas and Joseph, all his land and meadow; to son Aaron one hundred pounds, to be paid by Silas and Joseph, when he (Aaron) reaches the age of twenty-one years; to daughters Keziah, Margaret, Deborah and Hannah, each twenty pounds; the use of the land and meadow to wife, Hannah, during widowhood, or (she marrying) until the eldest son comes to the age of twenty-one years; together with the dower right afterward, and all moveables, excepting as above. Brothers Timothy and Moses Baldwin, executors.

On Sept. 15, 1767, Silas Ball (blacksmith) conveyed to Joseph Ball (cordwinder), for five shillings, thirty-one and one-half acres, beginning at Lightning Brook, near the bark-house of Joseph Ball. This probably was the first separation of the lands devised by their father, and is the home lot of Mr. R. H. Ball, who is of the fifth generation descending from Aaron Ball.

On Nov. 8 and 9, 1766, David Campbell and Nathaniel Campbell executed mortgages to Joseph Ball for lands "on the south side of road from Newark to Pierson's grist-mill." This land is now owned by Mr. Philander Ball. The stone dwelling-house of Mr. R. H. Ball has been rebuilt and enlarged upon the site of the old one and a memorial in iron letters, —1787,—shows date of rebuilding.

The writer has no record of the land conveyed to Silas Ball, but on May 14, 1772, conveyed to Aaron Ball (shoemaker), for one hundred pounds, thirteen acres, described, which is now in possession of Mr. Aaron B. Brown, a lineal descendant of Aaron Ball. Query. Was this conveyance made in lieu of the legacy mentioned in the will of their father? The several descriptions given, when compared with record of roads, clearly indicate the locality.

A letter written by Mr. John R. Burnet is herewith presented,—

"A family tradition says that Edward Ball came from Wales. Another tradition says that he had a brother or kinsman who settled in Virginia, and was the ancestor of Washington's mother.

"Edward Ball married Abigail Blatchley at Branford. He is supposed to have had one child when he removed to Newark. Caleb was probably the oldest of his children, and Abigail, who married Daniel Harrison, the next oldest. The oldest daughter of Abigail, named Lydia, married John Baldwin, Jr. One of her sons, Rev. Moses Baldwin, was fifty years pastor of a church in Palmer, Mass.

Thomas of Caleb, Caleb, Jr. and John, both settled at Hanover, and left numerous descendants.

"Joseph Ball left many descendants; so do this sister Lydia, wife of Joseph Peck. They were ancestors of the Pecks of East Orange.

"Moses Ball, third son of Edward, left no children. His will is the only record we have of the names of the children of Edward Ball, who left no wife.

"Thomas Ball, the youngest son of Edward, married Sarah Davis. She survived him more than thirty years, dying Feb. 1, 1771, in her 80th year. Her grave-stone is, or was a few years since, still standing at Cambridge Farm, bearing the quaint inscription—

"The Dame that lies beneath that Tomb
Had Rachel's Beauty, Leah's fruitful Womb, Abigail's Wisdom, Lydia's faithful Heart,
Martha's just Trust, and Mary's softer Part."

The homestead of Thomas Ball was where his son Ezekiel afterward built "Towan Hall." He left about 100 acres of land to be divided among his five sons, most of it having since passed away from his descendants. His eighth son, also named Thomas, married Mary Crane. Their eldest son, Deacon Abner Ball, was his grandfather. Aaron Ball, second son of the first Thomas, was the ancestor of Philander Ball, Esq.

"J. R. 10/8817

A part of the homestead of Thomas Ball afterward became the property of Stephen Bruen.¹ This farm was subsequently bought by Abel Atwood. It is now owned by Mr. Courter.

Jonas Ball, m. Hannah Bruen; Timothy Ball, m. Esther Bruen, daughter of John Bruen.

John Bruen, m. Mary Ball.

Samuel Ball built and resided in a house which formerly stood upon the site of the present residence of Mr. Samuel P. Brown. Mr. Brown has a tradition that the Samuel Ball killed in battle at Springfield was a former owner.

Another tradition says that a dam and mill-pond were on the same premises.

The road by Crooked Brook passed along the westerly border of the farm.

A record of a survey bearing date April 21, 1686, is made for Thomas Luddington for forty-five acres (by Town Surveyor, formerly laid out to Edward Riggs). The land was bounded with Nathaniel Wheeler south, one hundred and twenty rods, common north, one hundred and twenty rods, common west, seventy-two rods, common east, fifty-two rods.

Also

Seventeen acres adjoining the above one hundred and thirty-six by twenty rods. Nathaniel Wheeler and his own land east, common north, on the back-side of the hill towards Rahway River, west common south, on Upper Chestnut hill.

The location above described is probably near Montrose Station. The writer has no record showing who succeeded Luddington as owner. Luddington's Brook is named in the following deed, made Dec. 12, 1728, by Josiah Ogden and wife, Cattorn, to Samuel Freeman, Jr., the consideration being sixty-nine pounds and the quantity forty acres.

"In brief, beginning at John Freeman's south corner by Rahway River, thence to Luddington's Brook and up said Brook to the head thereof, and thence to the mountain; thence along the mountain to the line marked out between Joseph Hedde and said land, thence S. E. to Rahway River, thence up the River to the beginning. Luddington's Brook north, mountain west, Joseph Hedde south, Rahway River east; also one-quarter of an acre over the Brook; Brook south, Highway east, west and north by formerly Samuel Lyon, in length six rods, in breadth four rods.

On Dec. 25, 1732, John Hedden and Joseph Hedden conveyed to Samuel Freeman, Jr., twenty acres for thirty-six pounds.

"Beginning at the West side of the Highway at the East corner of John Hedden's Orchard, thence to the Top of the Mountain, thence along the mountain to Samuel's own land which he had of Josiah Ogden, thence down said line to the Highway, thence to beginning, and had John Hedden's south."

Stephen Freeman, from Milford, was one of the signers of the "original agreement." A home lot had been made to him, but his death occurred soon afterward. His will, dated in 1667, named wife, Hannah, and children,—Samuel, Hannah, Mary, Martha and Sarah. The widow Hannah Freeman had forty acres near the mountain, with Serjeant Richard Harrison, north, mountain west, Common south and east.

A survey is also recorded to Samuel Freeman, Jr., bearing date April 27, 1694. Beginning at the southeast corner of his own land, thence south fifteen chains to a small brook, thence west forty-seven chains in length. West, by mountain; north, his own; east, Rahway river; south, common.

The facts above written appear to be sufficiently strong to warrant the opinion that the family of Freemans were among the first settlers of South Orange.

Nathaniel Wheeler, another of the "neighbors from Milford," had a survey "at Upper Chestnut Hill, by the Stone House Brook," running East twenty-seven chains, and south twenty-five chains, and by Brook twenty-six chains; South, by Brook; west, Samuel Freeman, north, Thomas Luddington; and East, common. It is not known that Wheeler resided upon the land, above described; on the contrary, it seems probable that he did not; for the same record shows that he had land and bogs at the mountain by Amos Williams. John Johnson north, widow Ogden east, and high-way south and west. On Feb. 23, 1690, he bought of Henry Lyon sixty acres near the head of Rahway River, fifty by twelve chains. John Ward, Sr., north, Richard Harrison partly east, Mountain West, John Baldwin, Sr., south."

In 1767, Ezekiel Johnson was in possession of twenty-two acres of land on the north side of Stone House Brook,

" . . . beginning at a stone by the highway, . . . (1) N. 26, E. 16.68 along the highway, (2) S. 79, W. 14 to River, (3) down the River to the brook, (4) up the brook to the place of beginning, being land bought of Thomas Pierson, another tract of 15 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres . . . beginning at corner of said land on the east side of the River (1) S. 49, E. 15.39 to the Road, (2) N. 34.30, E. 6.97 to land sold by Daniel Riggs to Jedediah Freeman, (3) S. 43, W. 26.33 to River, (4) down the River to beginning, being land bought of Daniel Riggs. . . . another tract . . . beginning at a corner of Freeman, (1) S. 33.15, E. 19.17, (2) S. 34.30, W. 6.97 to the tract bought of Riggs, (3) N. 43, W. 20.20 to River (4) up the River to the beginning."

On May 13, 1776, Samuel Tompkins and wife, Ruth, conveyed to Caleb Johnson . . . four tracts of land "estimated at ten acres, more or less." Lying on Stone House Brook . . . the first tract . . . bounded northerly on the said brook, easterly by land formerly belonging to John Bowers, southerly by the highway and westerly by lands formerly belonging to Samuel Tompkins.

The second tract, adjoining the above, . . . bounded northerly by brook, southerly by highway, easterly by Bethuel Pierson . . .

Caleb Johnson resided on the property, had a brewery and distilled essences and extracts of various kinds.² A. L. Smith, the heirs of Frederick Newton and others now own and reside on the land.

Nathaniel Taylor, by trade a tanner. In 1767 he resided on Ridgewood road, near the lands now of Ezekiel Johnson, and died in 1823, aged eighty-four years. Moses, son of Nathaniel, born 1767, had a store on South Orange Avenue; his sons Edwin, Ira and Joseph W. inherited his estate.

De. (Deacon?) Micha Tompkins had . . . fifty-four acres adjacent to the lands he purchased of Mr. Treat,

"Beginning at the southeast corner of his land, and running as the river runs, nineteen chains to a tree, thence westerly thirty-nine chains to Zachariah Burwell's corner, thence northerly thirty-four chains to William Muer's (Moore?) corner, thence along his line thirteen chains to his other corner easterly, thence southerly fifteen chains so that his land forms an L."

. . . Elizabeth River east, John Denison's gutter south, Common west, William Muer and his own east. Sept. 19, 1724, Josiah Ogden conveyed to Hugh Roberts one hundred acres, . . .

"Beginning at the west bank of Elizabeth River at a small brook called 'Denison's Gutter' . . . (1) up the river 20.34, to Micha Tompkins', (2) N. 60 W. 28, (3) N. 35.30 E. 15.10, (4) S. 60 W. 11.50, (5) S. 33.30 W. 16.40, (6) S. 16.15 W. 20.80, (7) S. 64 E. 5 to Denison's Gutter, (8) to beginning."

On March 25, 1712, William Moore had a tract of land 82 $\frac{1}{2}$ x28 chains, by Dismal Brook, . . . bounded north-west by Common, north by Ebenezer Lindsley & Common, east by John Treat, south and west by Common.

In 1716, James Tompkins (possibly a son of Mich.) conveyed to Elisha Stansborough 32 acres of land on Brushy plain, . . . beginning at the southerly corner of John Lyon, on Chestnut Hill, . . . bounded southerly by Joseph Lindsley, easterly by Ebenezer Lindsley, northerly by next-mentioned tract, also thirty-four acres adjoining the above-described tract, . . . beginning at the N. E. cor., . . . (1) N. E. 20, (2) N. 62 W. 18, (3) Str. 20, (4) to beginning, . . . bounded southeast by Lindsley, northeast formerly Jabez Wakeman, northwest and southwest by above-mentioned tract.

Feb. 12, 1717-18. Elisha Lindsley conveyed to Elisha Stansborough 30 acres of land at a place called "Dog's Misery," 20 ch. in length, 13 in breadth at the north end, 17 ch. in breadth at the south end, . . . bounded east and north by Ebenezer Lindsley, west by Elisha Stansborough, south by Highway, . . . proved June 19, 1732.

Oct. 24, 1727, Josiah Ogden conveyed to Elisha Stansborough $17\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land, . . . beginning at a place known as the corner of the land of John Bowers. . . . (1) S. E. 15, (2) S. 35, W. 9, (3) N. 61.40, W. 16.78, (4) to beginning. Proved April 11th, 1739. (See Bower's place in Riggs).

Jan. 16, 1744-45, Elisha Stansborough conveyed to his son Samuel 564 acres of land, . . . at the Mountain plantation next joining northerly to Jonathan Ward and John Bowers, "as ye deed of conveyance of the premises may more fully appear reference being thereunto had, . . . after the decease of myself and wife, his mother."

Feb. 3, 1753, John Cundit, of Newark, conveyed to Joseph "Camp" one-third of the lands I lately bought of Samuel Stansborough, only ten acres excepted out of the whole which is now surveyed off to Moses Clark and the southern end or side of said tract, . . . lying on the west side of the road that leads southward from the Mountain meeting-house to the place called Dog's misery, . . . refers to deed said Stansborough gave to John Cundit, Jan. 10, 1753, and bounded eastwardly by Highway (Munn Avenue), northerly Josiah Lindsley, land that he bought in the tract aforesaid, and upon the west end upon Nathaniel Ward and Abner Ward's land, southerly upon the tract surveyed to Moses Clark. Gershom Kilburn, whose will was proved May 20, 1813, names sons Jabez D., Daniel and Gershom, grandsons Gershom, son of Daniel, and Samuel.

Jabez D. Kilburn and his son Thomas both lived and died at their home on South Orange Avenue, next east of the lands of Mr. Eugene Kelly.¹

June 30, 1679, Survey was made for Samuel Potter for 24 acres of land, . . . S. W. W. & E. 26x10 chains, bounded N. by Highway, E. by Francis Lindsley, W. and S. by Common.

Also 80 acres at the head of a branch of Elizabeth River 40x25 ch., bounded by Francis Lindsley W. E., S. E. S. W., and N. W. unsurveyed.

Feb. 26, 1697, Francis Lindsley made an exchange of land with George Ducker, cordwainer, . . . Eighty acres at the head of a branch of Elizabeth River, as expressed in a patent from Samuel Potter bearing date 1679, to me made over and assigned, . . . 40x25 chains, . . . bounded as in the survey to Potter.

A portion of the lands above mentioned is still retained in the Lindsley family. One portion was conveyed by J. Morris Lindsley to A. Bishop Baldwin, who now resides thereon. Another portion is owned and occupied by the St. Mary's Orphan Asylum.² On this property Judge John Lindsley lived and died.³

In 1798, Isaac Ogden conveyed 12 acres and 13 rods of land on Scotland Road, . . . being formerly the place of Jephth Baldwin, deceased, . . . to Ezra Gildersleeve, . . . beginning at the south corner of Ezra Gildersleeve, Sr.'s (born 1740, died 1810) homestead place in the road. (1) N. 62, W. 23.60, (2) S. 30 $\frac{1}{2}$, W. 5.18, (3) S. 62, E. 24.24, (4) W. 32, E. 5.08 to beg. . . . N. E. Ezra Gildersleeve, Sr., N. W. Thomas Freeman and the river, S. W. Abel Freeman, S. E. road.

In the "Genealogical Notices" of the settlers of Newark, by Mr. Samuel H. Congar, the following appears, viz.: "Baldwin, Joseph, son of Iona, of Milford, d. 20th Sept., 1776, a. 92; trad. says m. a Bruen. They had Eleazer, Amos, Moses, Joshua, Caleb, Phineas, Rebecca Campbell, Sarah Wolcott and Hannah Johnson.

Moses Smith: Tradition and records show that one James Smith, an orphan, who resided with an aunt in Scotland, becoming offended by his said aunt, absconded, and was a passenger in the vessel in which Philip Cartaret made his second voyage to New Jersey. Upon his arrival, James Smith was placed as an apprentice to a Mr. Crane, of Newark, with whom he remained, marrying one of Crane's daughters. James Smith became the owner of a large tract of land, which he devised in 1720-23 to his sons. A portion of the land is still in possession of Mr. James Smith, a lineal descendant.

David Smith, another descendant, was the father of Moses Smith, above alluded to. Moses Smith resided on a tract of land which was originally surveyed to Robert Campbell. (See John Campbell.)

Nov. 19, 1796, Stephen Smith and his mother, Esther (daughter of John Campbell), conveyed to Abner and Moses Crowell forty-three and a half acres; it extended from Tichenor Lane to Rahway River.

Jotham Quinby married Lilly, a sister of Jonas Smith, father of James, above mentioned. Quinby resided in a stone house, built in 1774, on the Smith property, on Scotland Street, South Orange. He demolished the old house about fifty years ago, using the stone from it in the basement of the new house which he occupied many years. It is now occupied by Mr. — Meredith.²

Jotham Quinby had sons.—Jonas S. (Smith?), James M., late mayor of the city of Newark, Hiram and Orlando.

Ephraim Hedden resided on Scotland Road, near the present property of Mr. Stewart. The date is unknown.

SURVEYS IN THE VICINITY OF CROOKED BROOK.

"Be it known to all whom it may concern: that at the request of Jonathan Crane and Nathaniel Wheeler, of Newark, Gentlemen: I have surveyed for them a tract of land lying between Rahway River and Crooked Brook, within the bounds of Newark aforesaid. . . . Sept. 2, 1718, a survey for four hundred and twenty-eight acres was made to John Johnston, one of the "proprietors."

"Beginning at Rahway River, it chains up from the division line between Newark and Elizabethtown. . . . (1) S. March 19, 1711, a survey for twenty-four acres was made to Joseph Thompson, in right of John Johnson on the west side of Rahway River.

"Beginning at tree on a small island. (1) N. 42, W. 8.70, (2) 29.30 E. 32, (3) S. 52.30, E. 7 to river, (4) down the river to beginning."

Joseph Thompson's land is mentioned in our road record, 1728.

The name of Thomas Wood also appears in the same record.

Dec. 16, 1729, Thomas Wood quit-claimed to Eleazer Tompkins twenty-one and a half acres. "A tract I lately bought of Jacob Arents, and which is understood to formerly belong to Eleazer Tompkins, deceased, by the Mountain." It was bounded northerly, formerly Eleazer Tompkins, deceased, easterly by Highway, southerly Joseph Wilson, formerly William Wilson, westerly Mountain.

TOMPKINS' TRACTS.—June 17, 1735, Eleazer Tompkins, "cordwainer," made a deed—a gift—to his brother, David Tompkins, when twenty-one years of age.

Three-fourth parts of a tract of land on the west-side of Rahway River, and "upon the side of the Mountain. . . . Forty acres." Joseph Riggs north, Ebenezer Hedden south, River east, Top of Mountain, west. "I say Three-Quarters of the said Lott of Land lying there and on the North side next unto Joseph Riggs."

David Tompkins' will, 1771, names children—David, Elias and Abigail.

March 7, 1804, Elias Tompkins and wife, Nancy, conveyed to Nathan Squier a tract of land, presumably a part of the preceding transfer. It is described as:

"Beginning in the middle of the road leading from Orange to Springfield. . . . (1) North 50.30, E. 14.30 to lands of Parmenas Riggs deceased, (2) W. 33.40, W. 44.57 to the top of the mountain, (3) S. 40.30, W. 12.07 to David Ball, (4) along Ball's line S. 52, E. 41.63 to beginning, containing 63 ½ acres."

NORRIS AND BAKER TRACTS.—May, 1756, Nathaniel Wheeler, yeoman, conveyed to Obadiah

Norris, weaver, four acres one-half and seventeen rods

"near the South end of the mountain, it being part of a large tract which I took up upon a Town right, and then bought of Joseph Wheeler, beginning at the road that leads up the mountain at the west corner of Samuel Duran's land. (1) W. 39.45, E. 7.5 to Obadiah Hedden's improvement, (2) S. 30.2, W. 12, to the top of the mountain, (3) S. 39.45 W., with the mountain to said road, (4) to beginning."

Capt. Nathaniel Wheeler died 13th March, 1761, aged 84 years, buried in Newark.

S. H. Congar record on the back of the deed, viz.: Obadiah Norris quit-claims to Norris Baker. "All right . . . to all the within-mentioned premises which I bought of Nathaniel Wheeler, dated 26 April, 1791."

April 23, 1791, Obadiah Norris, of Newark, and wife, Mary, conveyed to Norris Baker . . . on the side of Newark Mountain, being one of those small tracts of land that was conveyed by James Parker, Esq., on the 21st day of January, 1788, to said Obadiah Norris, being the second tract mentioned in said deed.

"Beginning at the most northerly corner of six acres and $\frac{1}{2}$ sold to John Warren in David DeL's line. (1) S. 38.51, W. 1.76 to the third line or corner of the whole tract, (2) S. 49.30, W. 7.19, (3) S. 47, E. 2.60, along Warren to his corner, (4) S. 33.15, E. 7.25 to beginning, one acre $\frac{1}{2}$."

Nov. 4, 1785, David Ball and wife, Mary, conveyed twenty acres to Norris Baker, near the house of Isaac Smith, Jr.

May 27, 1793, Uzal Ball and wife, Abigail, conveyed "35 rods" to Norris Baker.

Norris Baker, born 1751 was traditionally a teacher; formerly resided near Philadelphia, Pa.

Thomas C. Baker, a grandson of Norris, owns and resides on a portion of the original farm.

HEDDEN TRACTS.—March 27, 1776, Ebenezer Hedden conveyed to Obadiah Hedden twenty-four and one-half acres.

"Beginning at the Southeast corner of land formerly belonging to the heirs of Samuel Mills of Newark, deceased. . . (1) S. 10, W. 6.70, (2) S. 51, 43.50, (3) S. 49, E. 19.25 proved and recorded in 1802."

Ebenezer Hedden's will, 1783, names sons,—Obadiah and Jedediah, deceased.

April 19, 1804, Obadiah Hedden conveyed to William Ross sixty and one-half acres, "near the mountain, and below the road leading from John Durand to Orange:

"Beginning in the middle of the road at the north corner of Doctor W. Bunnell's lot of land that he bought of the said Obadiah Hedden, near the house of said Bunnell at a stone drove in the ground. . . (1) S. 31.2, E. 10.24, down Bunnell's line, (2) N. 43.2, E. 10.8, (3) W. 7.54, W. 1.96, (4) W. 30, E. 2.36, (5) W. 21.2, E. 1.80, (6) N. 30.2, E. 4, into the middle of the road by the bridge near Joseph Gilberdsche (Jefferson Ave.), (7) N. 55, W. 12.70, to said Ross' garden, (8) W. 50.2, W. 35.12, to the top of the mountain, (9) S. 44.60, W. 10.00, to Norris Baker, (10) S. 55, E. 14.80, to John Warren's east corner, (11) S. 30.2, W. 7.96, along Warren to mountain road, (12) S. 30, E. 12.11, to said Ross, (13) N. 30.20, E. 4.80, (14) S. 62, E. 9.80, (15) S. 33.2, W. 27 to beginning."

Samuel Duran (Durand?) is mentioned in 1756 as a land-owner. (See Nathaniel Wheeler).

The location of this land indicates the property now occupied by Mr. Asher B. Durand, the well-known artist.²

William Smith, traditionally from Holland, had descendants on Long Island and at Horsehead, N. Y.; had sons,—Isaac and William. Isaac has sons,—Isaac and Walter; Walter, b. 1754, settled at the "Short Hills." The house of Isaac Smith, Jr., is named in a conveyance of land Nov. 4, 1785. (David Ball and wife to Norris Baker.)

The lands of Isaac Smith, Jr., are now owned by Mr. C. V. S. Roosevelt.

Benjamin W. Smith, b. 1782, a son of Walter, owned and occupied a small farm on the northerly side of Maplewood Avenue, adjoining Crooked Brook.

ARENDS' TRACTS.—Jacob Arends, known as a "Practitioner of Physic," had surveys of lands in South Orange and its immediate vicinity. Arends probably resided in Orange, where he also held lands. He bought and sold various parcels of lands in South Orange, between the years 1718 and 1744.

The saw mill of Dr. Arends and Daniel Dod is frequently referred to in the records.³

A tract surveyed by Daniel Dod for Jacob Arends, on the eastward side of Rahway River, beginning at the southwesterly corner of Samuel Tompkins' land, patented to Mr. John Treat in August, 1696, and thence, first, E. 12 chains N. 63.40 east, 20 chains along said patent-line to a highway along said highway 25 chains to a line of John Walls, along Walls No. 48 W. 20; S. 2 W. 20 chains, S. 35 E. 24 (or 34) to the first corner of Walls in the line of Robert Campbell, along Campbell 47 chains to Rahway River to beginning,—containing 53 acres. (16th May, 1726; Liber S. 63.)

CROWELL TRACTS.—Samuel Crowell's land is mentioned in a road record in 1728.⁴

March 16, 1767, Joseph Crowell conveyed thirty-seven and three-tenths acres of land to Aaron Tichenor, being part of the plantation of Samuel Crowell, deceased.

"Beginning at a stake by the road from Newark to Bethuel Poston's Mill and the Mountain, being the North corner of land sold by Joseph to Daniel Crowell. . . (1) S. 46 W. 23.71 to Thomas Ball, (2) along Ball N. 58, W. 13.70, (3) S. 46 E. 24 to road, (4) up road, S. (1) 34 E.; 13.30, to beg'g."

Newton Crowell, a lineal descendant of Samuel, owns and resides on part of the original farm. The road passing the house now bears the name "Crowell Road."

In 1820, Sarah Crowell, widow of Juniah Crowell, gave a power of attorney to Joseph W. Camp to sell her property in North Farms, on which Juniah Crowell lived and died, adjoining Timothy Ball, Cyrus Baldwin and Joseph Parker, formerly occupied as a tavern by Timothy Ball, John Merz, Henry Squier, Jr., and Obadiah Crane.

The well on this property is probably the one alluded to in the survey and record of Burnet Street.

Jan. 19, 1739-40, Thomas Ball and Aaron Ball, sons of Thomas, bought of Joseph Pierson the equal one-half part of a grist mill and a saw mill on the east branch of Rahway River, near the dwelling-house of Samuel Crowell.¹

In 1761, Nathaniel Ball and wife, Esther, conveyed thirty-one acres of land to Samuel Pierson, bounded by Nathaniel Ball S.W., Rahway River N.W., Thomas Ball and road N.E., Jonas Ball and John Earl S.E., excepting therefrom seven-eighth parts of a saw mill.

In 1762, William Hand conveyed to Samuel Pierson thirty-one acres next north of Stephen Brown, deceased, on east branch of Rahway River, bounded by Stephen Brown, deceased, S.W., Samuel Pierson S.E. and N.E., Rahway River N.W.

In 1762, Joel Brown and wife, Molly, conveyed to Samuel Pierson nine and one-half acres, bounded by Samuel Pierson N.W., Stephen Brown S.W., Joel Brown S.E., William Hand N.E.

The will of Samuel Pierson is dated in 1765. He left a legacy to his wife, Phebe, of one hundred pounds. If she bore him a child it was to have the remainder of the estate. In due time a son was born and named Samuel. The will also named brothers, Abraham, David, William, sisters Zeruah Miller and Sarah Meeker, and father-in-law Caleb Brown. Samuel, the posthumous son of Samuel, was the father of Lewis, who is now the owner of Pierson's mills.²

In 1747, Elishu Lindsley and wife, Kezia, conveyed to Samuel Beach,—

"Beginning at a tree by the highway (Crowell road?) leading to the mill (Joseph Pierson's mill?); (1) by highway to river; (2) up the river 14 chains, (3) along the land of Samuel Tompkins so called 25½ ch. to stake near Highway (Prospect Street, formerly Tichenor Lane?), (4) direct to beginning. . . S'y, by Highway; W'y, Rahway River; S'y, Samuel Tompkins; E'y, Samuel Campbell, now Aaron Ball, excepting a highway running through it."

J. Wicliffe Beach, a lineal descendant, owns and resides on a portion of the tract.³

May 20, 1761, Elishu Ward (planter) deeded to Daniel Hayes two acres of land on the north side of the road that leads from the south end of said town (Newark) to the mountain adjoining the lands of John Tichenor, Jr., and said road: Beginning two chains from the road on said Tichenor's line, thence to the road, thence along the road 9.32; thence northerly two chains to a stake, thence a straight line to beginning, containing in the last-mentioned line, 8.79

The witnesses to deed were Moses Baldwin and Silas Ball.

John Williams, M.D., resided on the property since owned by Mr. Seth Boyden, who made this place famous by his success in the culture of strawberries.⁴

John Clark kept a tavern at North Farms, where he died about the year 1800.⁵

Aaron Allen, an old resident, resided on the land now owned by John Becker.

Caleb B. Van Ness resided on the southwesterly side of what is now Boyden Avenue, near Lightning Brook, the property formerly owned by Caleb Brown.⁶

Eleazer B. Porter, carpenter, resided on what is now Boyden Avenue.

Obadiah Crane adjoined Lightning Brook and Boyden Avenue. Crane had a store near his residence; it was robbed in 1811.

Pioneer and Later Highways.—The first record in reference to roads in this vicinity appears as follows:

"Town Meeting, December 12, 1801. It is voted that there shall be surveyors chosen to lay out highways as far as the mountain, if need be. . . . Item—William Camp, John Treat, Thomas Ludington, Jasper Crane, Mr. John Catlin, Richard Harrison, and Stephen Davis are chosen for that purpose, and any three of them at each end of the town have power to act." Of these Messrs. Camp, Treat, Ludington, Crane and Harrison owned lands near the mountain. If the surveyors took any official action under the authority named above, they made no record of the fact. The records as given below show, however, that the "paths" had been used for so long a time as to justify the surveyors or commissioners to make references to them in their official record.

Oct. 8, 1705. "A road from town to the foot of the Mountain or Wheeler's, as the path now runs, as straight as the ground will allow." (Nathaniel Wheeler owned land and resided near where St. Mark's Church now stands, in West Orange. He deeded the land where the old graveyard is located, corner Main and Scotland Streets, to a committee of the Second Presbyterian Church of Newark (now First Presbyterian Church of Orange). It is safe to presume that Main Street, Orange, stands for survey number one.)

Oct. 8, 1705. "Another road from said road, south by a line of marked trees, to Joseph Riggs' house." If our supposition in regard to number one is correct, we may safely designate number two as being the Valley or Freemanstown road, now the Ridgewood road.⁷

Oct. 8, 1705. Another road from said Riggs to town, to run by a path as straight as may be, and by a line of marked trees from first-mentioned road north at the foot of said mountain." (This clearly is South Orange avenue.)

Aug. 1, 1705. "One public, general and common highway beginning at the north-east corner of Richard Baker's Home lot . . . running north over Crane's brook, as the old road runs to Mr. Willork's lands, thence along between the lands of Mr. Willork and Jacob Mitchell, taking four rods in breadth out of the south end of Mr. Willork's orchard, thence along the north side of Benjamin Wade's dwelling-house, thence along by a line of marked trees over Rahway River, then along by a line of marked trees till it comes to Minnesink path, at the rear of Edward Riggs' plantation."⁸

1709. "Another road beginning at the saw-mill path, thence running as the path runneth to Brown's line, thence as the Brown's line and the path runneth to Edward Riggs' line, and by Riggs' and Abraham Wilkine' line to Captain Johnson's land to Rahway River."⁹

March 18, 1718. "A public and general road of four rods in breadth, beginning at the road by Israel Antfield's Bark House, and running up between Robert Hayes' and Captain Johnson's land, as the way now runs to the top of the hill, then turning the corner along Captain Johnson's ence, as the way now runs at the top of said hill to the two-mile brook to Thomas Brown's land, and so along as the way now runs to Elizabeth River, and from thence between Brown's and Hayes' land by a line of marked trees to Baldwin's land, and so over a brook to Baldwin's land, thence turning north-easterly on said Baldwin's land to Zachariah Burwell's land, thence by said Baldwin's and Burwell's land, and so along Robert Hayes' and John Burwell's land, and thence running as the road now runs over Rahway River, thence in a line between Joseph Riggs' and Joseph Brown's land till it comes to the road under the mountain, and that the road thence be laid out between Nathaniel Wheeler and David Brown be closed up." (The description of number six unambiguously indicates Clinton Avenue to Irvington, the old road over Day's Hill, and Irvington Avenue, through to Ridgewood road, that part lying west of the river having been vacated when the Newark and Morristown turnpike was laid out.)

N. v. 19, 1798. — Beginning at the road near the house of John Campbell, between the lands of John Campbell and Samuel Campbell, thence along the line that divides John and Samuel till it comes to Samuel Crowell's land, thence between Crowell and Nathaniel Campbell to the house of Crowell, thence on a straight line to the east branch of Rahway River, where there is a bridge, partly built over the same, thence down said branch to lands of Joseph Thompson, thence between Thompson and James Campbell to lands of Thomas Wood, thence between Wood and Thomas Lyon, thence through Wood's land to Crooked Brook, thence across the south-east corner of lands of Samuel Gibbs deceased, thence between the lands of Mills and Thomas Wood till it comes to the path that leads to Joseph Riggs, thence along said path, as the same goes, till it comes to the public road that runs by the house of said Joseph Riggs. (This road is the one passing the houses of Philander Ball, Aaron B. Brown, and others to Maplewood, returning by the Jefferson Village and Ridgewood roads to South Orange venue.)

Nos. 4 and 5 may possibly be located together.

April 18, 1796. — A road four rods in width, beginning at the Mount, turn road in Brushy Plain, at the south-west corner of Israel Canfield, northerly on the westerly side of his line, to the end of his line, straight to Elizabeth River on the south-east corner of Melba Tompkins' land over the river, westerly between Tompkins and Hugh Roberts' 20 rods, northerly across Tompkins on the easterly side of his orchard and house to Henckiah Johnson's land; northerly through Johnson's land on a brow of a hill, to the Mountain Road by Ebenezer Land's.

Burnet Street, laid 30 April, 1796, to be two and one-half rods in width, from the main road leading from Tusson Hill to Newark and Elizabeth Town, into the road near the house of John Towley, to on a south seven west course from the north corner of Towley's barn, (1) N. 55.40, 1' 19.26 to brook, (2) S. 62, E. 23, (3) S. 44½, P. 12 3/4; the middle of the road first above mentioned, 3.94 to the south-eastward of Timothy Ball's well. (Essex Road Rec. p. 487.)

Early Mills.—Surveys were made in 1718 to Dr. Jacob Arents, near Rahway River, and the line dividing Newark and Elizabethtown.

NOTE.—On survey to Dr. Arents begins at the boundary line between Newark and Elizabethtown and runs (1) S. E. by E. along the line 1/2 chains (2) W. S. W. 1/4 sly 20½ chains (3) N. W. by W. 2/3 chains to river, 5½ chains below the saw-mill (4) up the river to beginning.

To John Johnston, (Proprietor) Beginning at Rahway River 11 chains up from the line before mentioned To Daniel Dod in right of Johnston and adjoining him. To Adam Blackman, in Elizabethtown bounds, the description being as follows in brief: Beginning at a tree on E. bank of Rahway River, thence N. 65 E. 17.80; thence N. 31 E. 3 chains; thence N. 46 W. 6.50 to a turn in the river near the saw-mill of Dr. Arents and Daniel Dod; thence down the river to the beginning, including mill and part of pond. The mill here alluded to has long since been destroyed, leaving the ruins of the wheel-pit, (called by the boys of the neighborhood "the tumbling-place,") to designate its locality.²

The older inhabitants may have traditions or even records, showing when the mill was built.

Joseph Pierson's two mills, a grist and saw-mill, on the same stream (Rahway River) were well-known³ institutions in 1740, when he sold the equal one-half of them to Thomas Ball and Aaron Ball.

The older inhabitants of South Orange speak of a saw-mill upon Rahway River, situated near the Montrose station.

Educational.—For history of the educational interest of old Newark Township, prior to 1787, see Chapter XLIX. (Education in Newark.) The earliest known record referring to a school-house in South Orange is found in the account book of Joseph Brown, under date of June 20, 1787. It is as follows:

"Memorandum of work done at the school-house—

1788.
To boarding one of the masons seven days	0	7	0
To one quart of rum	0	1	0
May To carting stones one day	0	7	0
To one quart of spirits	0	1	0
To two rods three days	0	12	0
June 7 To boarding the mason six days	0	9	0
To two days and a half work	0	13	0
To two days work	0	8	0
June 20 To boarding the mason nine days	0	9	0
July 11 To one bushel of rice to Joseph Cr. well	0	9	0

The items in this bill indicate that one mason only was employed, and that twenty-five days were occupied in the work. It therefore seems probable that the work was done in making repairs.

The building, of stone, was probably built long anterior to the above date. Mrs. Rhoda Baldwin, who was born in South Orange in the year 1784, informed the writer hereof that both she and an elder sister attended school in the old stone school-house; and also gave it as her belief that her mother (born in South Orange in 1757) attended school in the same place.

The building stood in front of the present school-house, on a point of land near the intersection of the roads to Newark, now known as South Orange and Irvington Avenues; the building was one story in height, about twenty by thirty feet, facing the east, having a vestibule which was surmounted by an open belfry, in which the bell was hung.

In 1811 the Newark and Morristown Turnpike Road Company was chartered. This company, in the construction of their road, found the school-house standing in the way of their improvement. The necessity of removing the building may have been the cause which led to the project of building a new school-house.

We now quote from the "Records of the Columbian School in South Orange,"—

"At a special meeting of the proprietors and associates of the school in South Orange held on Wednesday evening, July 22, 1814, it was agreed that the said associates should exercise the privileges allowed them by law and use the means to become an incorporated body."

It follows the form of an advertisement as required by law, passed Nov. 24, 1794.

On August 3d another meeting was held, at which time the trustees were elected and the name "Columbian School of South Orange" was adopted.

The names given above were of heads of families, and probably comprised all who had children or grandchildren to be sent to the school.

The residences were scattered widely. Clark Hedden resided nearly opposite to the Scheutzen Park. Nehemiah and Joel Baldwin resided in the stone house on the corner of South Orange Avenue and Munn Avenue, some two miles from the school-house. The district extended about one and one-half miles on the road to Irvington (two roads), to Orange (two roads), to Millburn (two roads).

The trustees formed their organization on the 5th of August, examined the scholars, inquired into the rules of the school, approved thereof and prepared a certificate as required by law. The certificate is recorded in a book of miscellanies for Essex County, page 103. We again quote from the record,—

"At a meeting of the trustees and proprietors of the Columbian School in South Orange, at the school-house, on Saturday evening, Dec. 31, 1811, for the purpose of consulting on the propriety of building a new school-house, it was unanimously Resolved:

"1st. That the trustees of said school do proceed in arrangements for building.

"2nd. That the said building be built on what is commonly called the school-house common.

"3rd. That the proposed building be built of wood, two stories high, forty-five feet in length by thirty feet in breadth."

A subscription was started and the whole matter was referred to the trustees. The work thus entrusted to the trustees was completed in 1815.

The next record is of a meeting of the trustees held on "Thursday, Oct. 26, 1815," at which time the following was adopted:

"1st. That it be expedient to lay a title procured of Mr. Aaron Brown for the lot on which the school-house is built; that a statement of the cost of the said house be made as soon as convenient."

A second resolution provided for the appointment of a committee for the purpose above indicated.

"3rd. That the price of tuition in the school be fixed at $1.75 per quarter for spelling, reading and writing; for arithmetic in addition to the above branches, the sum of $0.25, and for grammar or geography the further sum of $0.25.

"4th. That the firewood be purchased and at the end of each quarter the cost to be divided equally between the scholars, except such as the trustees shall deem expedient to exempt on account of their inability to pay."

March 5, 1816, the trustees met, when it was agreed that Aaron B. Brown should receive the money subscribed by Joseph B. Ball for the purpose of erecting a new school-house, amounting to thirty-two dollars, and Nathaniel Tichenor's note to the trustees five dollars in payment for the lot on which the school-house stands and collect them for himself, which he accepted, and delivered a deed for said lot to the president. The deed recites that in consideration of thirty-one dollars to them paid, Aaron Brown and wife conveyed the property in fee "to the trustees of the Columbian School of South Orange;" in brief beginning at the northeast corner of a lot belonging to Nathan Squier . . . on the south side of the school-house common . . . running (1) south 37 degrees 30 minutes west 2 chains 63 links, (2) south 57 degrees east 1 chain 14 links, (3) north 38 degrees east 2 chains 60 links to the line of said common, (4) north 55 degrees 30 minutes west 1 chain 14 links to beginning; bounded northerly to the school-house common, easterly and southerly by said Brown and westerly by Nathan Squier, containing seventy-six one-hundredths of an acre more or less.

The deed did not contain any reservations or stipulations; it was dated Jan. 1, 1816, acknowledged on the 15th day of February, 1826, and recorded in X2, page 532 of deeds for Essex County, on May 12, 1828.

In the same month, March, the trustees "proceeded to business and examined the accounts and vouchers to make an estimate of the cost of their school-house, and found the cost of the school-house and lot to amount to seventeen hundred sixteen dollars and eighteen cents to the present time."

They also "proceeded to settle with Moses N. Combs, and found a balance due him of nine hundred twenty-five dollars and seventeen cents.

The final settlement with Mr. Combs was effected in May, 1817, when "he, the said Moses N. Combs, agreed to receive of the trustees the amount of a certain subscription dated the 6th of February, 1817, in separate notes of hand, which are as follows:

John Ball, note to the trustees	$25
Julez Pierson, "	25
Louis Ball, "	10

	$700

At the same time the board of trustees authorized the president to indorse the said notes.

PAY OF TEACHERS.—The records show that the prices paid to the teachers were specified by the trustees, but were collected by, and at the risk of the teacher.

The price per scholar ranged between one dollar and twenty-five cents and two dollars and twenty-five cents per term; the cost of firewood was also apportioned. In the Columbian School the rate was first recorded on Oct. 26, 1815, with the following proviso: "That the firewood be purchased, and at the end of each quarter the cost be divided equally between the scholars except such as the Trustees shall see expedient to exempt on account of their inability to pay."

This practice continued in force until 1860.

Exceptions to the uniformity in the prices above noted occurred, and special arrangements were made as follows:

On March 9, 1818, the teacher was guaranteed forty-five scholars for the first six months; the other six months at his own risk.

On March 16, 1819, Aaron McConnell was employed for seventy-five dollars per quarter.

On April 2, 1827, the Association voted to pay Henry D. Hedden ninety-six dollars for six months, and forty-eight dollars to the trustees to employ a woman for six months.

In 1852 a salary of eighty-eight dollars per quarter was paid.

In 1853 Miss Taylor, assistant, was paid twenty-four dollars per quarter.

FREE EDUCATION FOR ALL.—The first step toward making common-school education free to all was taken by the proprietors on Jan. 27, 1818, when they resolved, "That as there may be some that send to school not able to pay for firewood, the Trustees be instructed to examine the roll of the Teacher, and if in their opinion there be any such, they exempt them from paying and the amount for wood be equally divided among the rest of the scholars."

On June 16, 1828, the trustees proceeded to make a distribution of the money to be raised by tax assigned to this school by the town committee.

In 1852 an agreement was made with James H. Denison for $85 per quarter.

In 1857, teachers were engaged for $100 per quarter, $112 do., female teachers $96 do.

In 1859 it was agreed to pay Mr. Manning $500 per year.

The salaries were gradually increased, and in 1870 the principal received $850, the assistants—females—$450 and $250 respectively.

The sum of $9.50 was thus divided, being the first record of money received from taxation for educational purposes.

Various sums were thus divided until on April 19, 1870, when it was decided to vote a tax to maintain a free public school during the coming year, and the sum of five hundred dollars was so levied.

A slight variation only appears in the prices charged for tuition in all the schools, which all became free at about the same time.

Amount of public money expended for educational purposes and other expenses connected therewith in 1883, Districts Nos. 27, 28, and 30:

Salaries of teachers	$5,000 00
Fuel	200 42
Repairs	270 48
Incidentals	740 88

From Lewis Tichenor's account-book it appears that he taught a school in South Orange in the years 1791, '92, '93, '94, '95, '97 and '98.

TENANTS OF THE SCHOOL-HOUSE.—At various times the upper floor of the building was rented for singing-schools, shows of different kinds, between 1816 and 1827. On April 17, 1827 the association met to consider the propriety of seating the upper room for religious meetings and other proper uses. Subsequently a committee reported the work completed, . . . that $127.36 had been collected by subscription, and $122.08 had been expended for the purpose. On April 19, 1843, the trustees of the Presbyterian Church made an application for a lease of the upper room in the school-house for a number of years. Whereupon

"It was resolved to lease the room to the trustees (as above) for fifteen years, for the sum of ten dollars per year, or such sum as shall be necessary for the keeping of said room in repair."

THE PRESENT SCHOOL-HOUSE.—In 1879 the legal voters in the school district met and adopted a resolution authorizing the trustees to expend seven thousand five hundred dollars, exclusive of heating, in the erection of a brick school-house in South Orange; . . . that the said building be finished on the first only in four rooms, . . . providing for from two hundred and twenty to two hundred and forty scholars, . . . leaving the second story unfinished except flooring.

In accordance with the above, the trustees advertised for plans¹ and approximate estimates of the cost of erection. The plans were laid before a meeting of the voters, duly called for that purpose, who decided to adopt a plan which was presented by Mr. Dunham.

The estimates, however, were largely in excess of the amount originally provided for, and hence the necessity for an additional appropriation on March 5, 1880. The contracts were awarded, viz.: Mason's work to F. W. Morris, six thousand eight hundred and seventy-three dollars; carpenters' work to Rodman Coon, six thousand six hundred and seventy-two dollars.

The increase in the number of scholars, as well as their being properly graded, has necessitated the finishing of the upper story.

The school was removed, first, with the building, about one-eighth of a mile eastward; second, to the south side of the avenue, and on the easterly side of Elizabeth River.

A new school-house was erected in 1882. The site and building costing four thousand five hundred dollars, Mr. — Dunham being the architect, John J. Weaver mason, and Rodman Coon carpenter.²

SCHOOL DISTRICT No. 27 is a culmination of two separate schools, whose history, not recorded, extends back to an old building which stood on the now southeasterly corner of Ridgewood road and Baker Street, near the Maple Wood Station of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad. Of the date of its erection we have neither record or tradition. Mr. Lewis Pierson, aged eighty-three years, was a pupil, Samuel Pierson, an older brother, being the teacher. Mr. Merwin, Andrew Van Ness and Morris Baker are also named as teachers.

July 16, 1868, the county superintendent of schools for Essex County consolidated the two districts, Jefferson Village and Vauxhall.

August 1st the superintendent of schools appointed Charles R. Crowell, Thomas A. Reeve and Daniel Morrison trustees of said district, and appointed said D. Morrison clerk.

¹No. 12, township map.

²No. 15, township map.

Sept. 7, 1868, a committee was appointed to look up a site for a new school-house.

April 20, 1869, the school district was numbered.

Nov. 10, 1869, paid D. Morrison sixty cents for registering the contract for building the new school-house.

Vauxhall School.—The records of this school have been lost. It was opened, however, about 1830, in a frame building on what is now Valley Street. The building had previously been used by Mr. Lewis Pierson as a "Store."

About 1838 a brick building was erected for the school, on the Tuscan road, near Valley Street.

Among the teachers were,—

- Charles Alden, about 1830.
- Mary Gardner, about 1832-33 and 1837.
- William D. Reeve, about 1836.
- Edwin O. Brown, about 1840.
- Lily Hogan, about 1844.
- Andrew Van Ness, about 1856.
- David Mack, about 1845.
- William D. Shipman, about 1840-42.

Mr. Shipman removed to Springfield, N. J., married a Miss Richards, was a hard student and an excellent teacher. He is widely known as Judge W. D. Shipman.

NEW BUILDINGS AND TENANTS.—May 13, 1833,—

"Resolved, That the trustees should sell the school-house lot to Calvin H. Gardner for what he has offered—that is, sixty dollars for the lot and ten dollars for the new house."¹

Sept. 23, 1833,—

"The inhabitants of the village met at their school-house agreeable to previous notice, to take into consideration the building of a new school-house and where it shall stand. A motion was made, seconded and carried that it should stand on the hill, and likewise that we should sell the old lot to Calvin H. THE NORTH FARMS SCHOOL also had an existence anterior to our present records.

The old school-house becoming dilapidated, in 1838 a project for a new school-house was negatived by a vote of forty-two against thirty-five in favor of same.

In 1847 it was decided to sell the old building, purchase another lot and erect a school-house thereon.

The building was completed, and the trustees reported that they had received on subscription for school-house $152.50; for lot, $25.00; for old school-house, $50.00; good will of old lot, $10.50, for stone, $1.65; posts and rails, $4.46.

SETON HALL COLLEGE.—This institution is located on what was formerly known as Chestnut Ridge, and occupies a commanding and magnificent site opposite to and east of the mountain, near South Orange Avenue, formerly the turnpike road, but now one of the six or eight boulevards under charge of the Essex Public Road Board.

The college was founded in 1856, at Madison, N. J., by the Most Rev. J. Roosevelt Bayley, D.D., the first bishop of Newark. During the summer vacation of 1860 it was removed to its present location at South Orange. The Legislature of the State, during the session of 1861, passed an act of incorporation, granting it all the rights and privileges enjoyed by other colleges in the State.

The college buildings are of stone and of architectural beauty, large and commodious, thoroughly ventilated, heated by steam and lighted by gas.

The aim of the faculty is to impart a good education in the highest sense of the word, to train the moral, intellectual and physical being. The health, manners and morals of the students, all of whom are required to live in the college are objects of constant care. The system of government combines strict discipline with kind and gentle treatment. The students are instructed thoroughly in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church and trained in its practices.

This college was appropriately named in honor of the late Archbishop Bayley's aunt, the saintly Mother Seton, who introduced the Sisters of Charity into the United States, and to whose prayers he attributed the grace of his conversion to the faith.

The selection of the healthful and attractive site of the college, so justly admired by visitors to South Orange as the most beautiful within many miles of New York, is due to the cultivated taste and sound judgment of the late archbishop, who had the consolation of seeing his work firmly established and the seeds he planted bearing abundant fruit.

Churches.—Reference has been made to the original connection of the residents in South Orange with the mother settlement in Newark.

The Second Church of Newark (now the First Presbyterian Church of Orange) was organized about 1720, and one portion of the people of South Orange became connected therewith. The people of North Farms (now Hilton) were connected with, and a part of, the churches at Elizabethtown and Connecticut Farms, while the residents of Vauxhall and Jefferson Village naturally gravitated to the church at Springfield. The local centres thus alluded to were situated about two miles apart, and comparatively the same distance from the respective places for public religious worship.

BAPTIST CHURCHES.—The earlier churches of the Baptist denomination were at Lyons Farms and at Northfield. The congregations were small in number, but full of zeal and determination, and to them belong the credit of organizing the first church, and erecting the first house for worship in the township.

The records of the congregation are probably lost.

On the 6th day of October, 1811, Caleb Durand conveyed to himself, William Brown and Enoch Ball, trustees of the Baptist Church of Jefferson Village, and to their successors in office, a tract of land, which is described, in brief, as follows:

"On the northwesterly side of the road that leads from Orange to Springfield, beginning at the centre of the well of said Caleb Durand, and from thence south 20° W four chains from the well to the place of beginning. . . . (1) N. 48° W. 3.72 up the middle of the road called 'Bare' Lane. . . . (2) N. 34° E. 1.28. . . . (3) S. 58° E. 3.60 into the road aforesaid. . . . (4) along said road S. 23° W. 1.28 to the beginning. . . . containing $\frac{3}{8}$ of an acre; . . . Bounded southwesterly by the middle of the road to Springfield, S. by the middle of 'Bare' Lane . . . N. W. and S. E. by said Caleb Durand". . . .

Upon this lot they erected their church edifice. The lot was also used as a burying-place.¹

The congregation, however, failed of being self-supporting, and the building was unoccupied for several years, and about 1823, it was conveyed to the Methodist Episcopal congregation.

UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.—The next church in order of time was erected at North Farms (now Hilton) in 1828 by the Universalists. This congregation also shared the fate of their Baptist brethren, became disbanded, and the building remained unoccupied as a regular place for worship for several years. It is now owned and occupied as a Methodist Church.

A small number of interments have been made on the lot.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—At a meeting of the Columbian School Association, held at the house of B. Harrison, on the evening of Jan. 23, 1828, Moses Lindsley was chosen chairman, and J. T. Squier secretary, when the following resolutions were passed:

"1st. That David Brown be paid six cents each evening he may furnish wood to warm the room with for the purpose of religious worship from the first of January last to the first of April next ensuing.

"2d. That Samuel McGowan be paid one shilling for each evening he cleans the bell, lights and warms the house for the purpose of religious worship, and likewise for performing all other duties as sexton until the first of April next ensuing.

"3d. That for the purpose of raising a fund to pay these expenses, Resolves, That a collection be taken on each and every evening the house may be opened for religious worship, and that Job Brown be appointed to relieve the collections."

The room was used for purposes of religious worship until 1842. The Presbyterian Church of South Orange was organized June 13, 1831, the congregation meeting in the school-house until their church was erected, in 1842.¹

April 19, 1843, application was made by the trustees of the Presbyterian Church in this place for a lease of the upper room in the school-house for a number of years. The room was accordingly rented to the trustees of the church for fifteen years, for the sum of ten dollars a year, or such sum as shall be necessary for the keeping of said room in good repair.

March 8, 1859, the use of the room was granted to the Episcopal clergyman of Millburn for services on Saturday evenings.

Oct. 4, 1858, the room was leased to the Church of the Holy Communion.²

March 8, 1859, permission was granted to Rev. Mr. Reed, Episcopal clergyman, of Millburn, to use the upper room on Saturday evenings.

In 1859 the room was leased to the Church of the Holy Communion; the terms agreed upon were "that the Church should put the room in good condition and pay a rent of $50.00 for the second year. No other charge to be made for two years' rent."

In 1861 the room was leased to the Columbian Guards for one year, at a rental of three hundred dollars per annum.

Societies.—CENTURY LODGE, No. 100, F. AND A. M., was constituted January, 1870, the following-named being the first officers thereof: Daniel T. Clark, W. M.; Joseph W. Wildey, S. W.; Anson A. Ransom, J. W.; Charles E. Lam, Treas.; Benjamin L. Chandler, Sec. Regular communications are held on the first and third Tuesday evenings in each month.

HOPKINS LODGE, No. 179, I. O. O. F., instituted April, 1874, the officers being Aaron G. Smith, N. G.; Joseph W. Wilde, V. G.; Moses P. Smith, Sec.; A. Bishop Baldwin, Treas. The lodge meets every Wednesday evening.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

PHILANDER BALL.

The ancestors of Mr. Ball were of Welsh descent, his great-grandfather, Aaron Ball, having resided in what is now South Orange, Essex Co., where he pursued the mason's craft. The eldest of his six children was Joseph, whose children were three sons—Eleazar T., Israel, Joseph B.—and three daughters—Hannah (Mrs. Porter), Mary (Mrs. Robert Caldwell), and Mary (2d). The birth of Joseph B. occurred in 1778 in South Orange, on ancestral land still in possession of the family. Though acquiring a trade, as was the custom in those early days, Mr. Ball devoted his energies to the cultivation of a farm, now in possession of his son. He married Eunice daughter of Richard Harrison, of Orange township, whose children are Amzi, Eleazar T., Mary, Philander, Hannah (Mrs. Joseph Vance) and Richard H. Philander was born on the 8th of January, 1814, in South Orange, and received such educational advantages as the neighboring school afforded, after which he chose the healthful employment of a farmer, and has during his active lifetime been regarded as one of the intelligent and enterprising agriculturists of the county. He was married, in 1819, to Sarah A., daughter of Aram Guerin, of Morris County, and has children,—Edward P. (deceased), John G., Anna H., Lizzie M. (Mrs. Augustus L. Whitehead), and Warren P. Mr. Ball was in his political preferences formerly a Democrat, with strong Abolition tendencies, which later influenced him to join the Republican ranks. He has held various offices of a local character, such as chosen freeholder, commissioner of deeds, member of the township committee, etc. His known integrity, coupled with much executive ability, has caused his services to be frequently employed as executor and trustee where important interests are involved. His religious creed is that of the Presbyterian Church, his membership being in connection with the church in South Orange, of which he has for years been a trustee.

RICHARD H. BALL.

Edward Ball, the progenitor of the Ball family in New Jersey, removed at an early date from Connecticut and settled in Newark. His descendant, Aaron Ball, the great-grandfather of the subject of this biography, located in South Orange during the year 1741. Among his sons was Joseph Ball, who served in the English army and assisted in the capture of Martinique. He was afterward a soldier in the war of the Revolution, and assisted in the capture of Stony Point under Gen. Anthony Wayne. He inherited the paternal estate, and married Rachael Tompkins, whose children were Eleazar T., born in from labor. At twenty-two he came into possession of his patrimony,—fifty-six acres of the homestead farm,—which he has since cultivated. He was married, on the 10th of September, 1862, to Miss Mary Francis, daughter of Frazee Harris, of Union County, N. J. Their children are Frederick H. (deceased), Joseph F., George H., Fannie May, Laura M., Amzi and Edward (twins, the latter of whom is deceased), Jennie E. and Alice H. Mr. Ball is a Republican, and strong in his political convictions, though not an aspirant for office. He is a supporter of the Presbyterian Church at Connecticut Farms, of which Mrs. Ball is a member.

1767; Hannah, in 1768; Israel, in 1770; Mary, in 1772; Mary (2d) in 1773; and Joseph B., whose birth occurred March 15, 1778. He was a farmer on the homestead, which came to him by inheritance, and also learned the trade of a shoemaker. He married Eunice, daughter of Richard Harrison, of Orange township, and had six children, of whom Richard H. was born Nov. 13, 1820, on the land which has passed in direct succession to him, and where his life has been spent in the occupations of a farmer. When a lad he was accustomed to habits of industry, and found little time for attendance at school other than the winter months afforded, when the farmer enjoys a respite

SAMUEL P. BROWN.

Phineas Brown, the grandfather of Samuel P., who resided in South Orange, married Easter Gillam, and had children,—Charles, Stephen, Nathaniel, Isaac, William, Anna and Sarah. Stephen Brown, also a native of South Orange, was by trade a cooper, and, besides, conducted the business of a butcher. He married Sarah Gillam, whose children were Phineas, Samuel P., Nancy and Jabez B. By a second marriage, to Prudence Hand, were children,—Amelia, Mary, David, Henry Phebe and William. The birth of Samuel P. occurred Oct. 15, 1805 in South Orange (then known as Orange township) where his whole life has been spent. He had no educational advantages in early youth, and was obliged to become self-supporting at the age of eight years, his father having enlisted as a soldier in the war of 1812. He in youth developed a business tact which, combined with great industry, has made his life a successful one. Mr. Brown learned the trade of measure-making, and for many years found it profitable. Butchering at a later date proved more lucrative, as also the purchase and sale of cattle. He invested his earnings from time to time in land, adding, as opportunity offered, until the productive farm on which he resides was secured. He has for many years devoted his time to the cultivation of this farm.

had children,—Aaron, Zadoc, Job, David, Jonathan, Hannah, Eleanor and Abigail,—all of whom grew to mature years. Aaron, the eldest, was born July 22, 1779, in South Orange, where he was an industrious farmer, and identified officially with the township as justice of the peace. He married Doreas Ball, whose birth occurred June 4, 1785, her father having been Aaron Ball, of the same township. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Brown were Betsey, born in 1805; Sarah, in 1808; John S., in 1811; Aaron B.; Eleanor, in 1817; Joseph, in 1819; Abigail, in 1826. The subject of this sketch, Aaron B., was born on the 15th of February, 1814, in South Orange. The public school enabled him to acquire an elementary edu-

A B Brown

Mr. Brown was married, in 1844, to Eliza, daughter of William Smith, of Jefferson village, in South Orange township. Their only son, Isaac, is deceased. In politics Mr. Brown is a Democrat, and has held various township offices, being now commissioner of appeals. Though advanced in years, he still superintends the work upon his farm.

AARON B. BROWN.

Mr. Brown is descended from English stock. His grandfather, who resided in South Orange, where he was a farmer, married Jane Tompkins, and education, when his attention was directed to farming which has since been his life-work. On the death of his father he inherited the homestead farm, where he now resides. He was married, in 1841, to Miss Catherine M., daughter of Job Crowell, of South Orange, and has children,—Ashbel G., Abby Caroline (Mrs. Theodore F. Taylor), David (deceased), Jay C., Henry M., Mary Olive (deceased), and Charles N. Mr. Brown has never departed from his legitimate calling to engage in doubtful business schemes, nor found time to devote to public enterprises. He has, however, as a Republican, held minor township offices, which have been filled with fidelity and acceptance. He is a zealous Presbyterian in his religious belief, and is now an elder in the church of that denomination in South Orange, where his membership has extended over a period of more than fifty years.

ABIJAH F. TILLOU.

Mr. Tillou is of Huguenot descent. His grandfather, Peter Tillou, resided in New York, where he conducted the business of a chairmaker. He married Mary Brown, whose children were Joseph, William, Walter, Phoebe and Nancy, there having strict school in winter at a later date, after which the work of the farm demanded his time and energies. When twenty-one years of age he left the paternal roof, but continued to labor as a farmer in other parts of the township.

At the age of thirty Mr. Tillou was married to Miss Pamela, daughter of Samuel Brown. Their children are Samuel B., Daniel W. and Mary Ellen, both sons being married and reared to the healthful occupation of the farmer. Mr. Tillou, on his marriage, removed to property owned by his wife, which he has since cultivated, and where he at present been by a previous marriage children,—Peter, James, John and a daughter, Hester. Joseph Tillou was born Dec. 18, 1773, in New York City, and removed to South Orange, where he became a farmer. His wife was Mary, daughter of Amos Freeman, of South Orange, to whom were born children,—Joseph M., Mary, Abijah F., Charles, Job B., Daniel B. and Lucetta (twins), and Rodney W. Abijah F., whose birth occurred Oct. 3, 1810, in South Orange, has been a life-long resident of that township. His chief advantages of education were gained before ten years of age, with occasional sessions at the disresides. His political sentiments were formerly those of a Whig, the Republican party now claiming his allegiance. He manifests much interest in the development of his township; has been trustee of the village of South Orange, a member of the township committee and member of the board of assessments. He is also a director of the Orange National Bank. He has been frequently called to fill the position of executor, and on many occasions acted as the guardian of important trusts. Mr. Tillou is a Presbyterian in his religious faith and member of the First Presbyterian Church of South Orange.

CHAPTER LXIV.

WEST ORANGE TOWNSHIP¹

THIS is one of the interior townships of Essex County, and is bounded on the east by Montclair township and the city of Orange, on the south by South Orange and Millburn, on the west by Livingston and Caldwell, and on the north by Caldwell and Montclair townships, and contained in 1880 a population of three thousand three hundred and eighty-five. The township embraces within its boundaries four thousand six hundred and twenty-one acres of land, through which are some of the most beautiful and picturesque drives and avenues to be found anywhere in the county, and along which are some of the most elegant and costly villas and cottages in Essex County. There is not, however, a post-office in the township.

Natural Features.—The surface of the township is mountainous, containing but very little, if any, first-class farming lands. Two mountain ranges cross the township, running nearly parallel with each other, from northeast to southwest, forming what is commonly known as First and Second Mountains. The former, however, also bears the Indian name of "Watchung," and after it is named the Watchung Branch of the New York and Greenwood Lake Railroad, this branch having its western terminus on Main Street, Orange, at the foot of the mountain. The eastern slope of First Mountain is covered from base to summit by Llewellyn Park, containing the beautiful villas and summer residences of a large number of people, among whom those of Gen. George B. McClellan, Gen. Randolph B. Marcy, George V. Hecker, J. O. Gimbernet, Miss Mary G. R. Binney, Dr. Dwinelle, Douglas Robinson, Mrs. Dr. W. Adams, John Crosby Brown, A. P. Pillot, Mrs. P. Sanford, F. M. Hoag, Mrs. Georgiana Heckshore, S. O. Rollinson, J. W. Field, E. W. Timpson, T. K. Gibbs, John M. Hare, T. A. Fowler, Mrs. James M. Ward, H. B. Auchincloss, Dr. Stockton, E. Burnet, I. C. Babcock, H. C. Pedder, Egbert Starr, L. P. Stone, Mrs. J. H. Green, A. C. Force, John Burke, James W. Judd, Wendell P. Garrison, J. W. Little, George Lethbridge, Mrs. Agnes J. Vincent, Frederick Worth, William P. Woodhull, William A. Gallaty, Dr. Fowler Ormsby, Cornelius Bramhall, Charles J. Martin, James Lancy, David E. Green, Daniel A. Huald, William Barr, J. Caddington, R. C. Browning, O. S. Carter, Davis Callanore, Dr. A. F. Bissell, W. C. Lee, H. A. Page, A. D. Williams, C. A. Haight, Lowell Mason, Mrs. Dr. Lowell Mason, and many others of equal value and beauty.

The summit of the Second Mountain forms the boundary line between West Orange and Livingston townships. Between the two mountains is quite a pleasant valley, thickly settled, but unproductive as an agricultural district.

The principal stream of the township is the west branch of the Rahway River. It rises in the northeastern part of the township and flows southwesterly between the two mountains into Millburn township. The east branch of the Rahway River rises in the city of Orange, and forms a portion of the boundary line between the city and the township of West Orange, flowing southwesterly into South Orange. Wigwam Brook also crosses the northeast corner of the township, flowing southerly into Orange City.

Points of Interest.—Any person loving the beauties of nature, and traveling eastwardly on the range of hills known as the Orange Mountains, who should come unexpectedly upon the Eagle Rock Bluff, and take in with bird's eye-view the broad sweep of territory extending to and beyond the Hudson River, would receive an impression of cultivated and natural beauty in landscape, that would linger in his mind, as long as memory should last, as one of the most charming scenes that had ever filled his soul with delight. From either point of view the lover of nature beholds a sweet and peaceful picture of pastoral loveliness, and in either direction that one might wend his way he finds that not only is the vision of the whole not dispelled, but rather enhanced by the nearer view of any one of the many attractive localities. It is one of the distinctive features of the Oranges that in all parts is its beauty maintained, and that a different phase of natural beauty meets one with every turn. Pervading the whole is an atmosphere of culture and refinement seldom met with in the same proportionate degree in any part of the world. From the mountain ridge, where Gen. McClellan, the Marcys, the Heckers and other equally prominent families reside, to the southern, eastern, or northern limit one will meet a succession of tasteful villas, some of them palatial in point of costliness, while nearly every one shows some distinctive feature of attractiveness. There is, too, a sufficient sprinkling of the staid old homes of the original settlers, together with some built half a century ago, to give the place freedom from the faintest suspicion of newness, while among them can be found costly villas constructed and furnished in the very latest and approved style.

Some of the older places are occupied by families who are the direct descendants of the original owners, who laid out and built upon them over two hundred years ago.

LLEWELLYN PARK.—It may be said with simple truthfulness that the fame of Llewellyn Park is world-wide. Its praises have been spoken in foreign lands by travelers who have visited the famous places in the Old World and the New, and it is universally conceded to be a most remarkable example of cultivated natural beauty. Here the natural elements of the picturesque have been wrought by an artistic hand into a scene of loveliness more truly satisfying to the poet soul than many far-famed products of foreign taste and skill. About fifteen miles of carriage-drives lead through shaded glen and over terraced knoll. The elastic clay roadways, which are always kept in perfect condition, reëffer the sound of hoofs and wheels so noiseless that the babbling brooklet's quiet ripple or the thrush's joyful song can be heard as the beholder glides along, now between an archway of tall old chestnuts or again between dense rows of pine or arbor vite. The park residences are, for the most part, quite in keeping with the beauty of their situation, and their fortunate owners have made by gradual improvement such charming grounds of their villa plots that when rambling through the wood-paths which skirt their borders, and listening to the melodious notes that pour from the throats of hundreds of feathered songsters in the tree-tops near, one involuntarily exclaims, "Am I, too, in Arcadia?" The project of these grounds originated in the fertile brain of Llewellyn S. Haskell, who came to Orange in the spring of 1855, and saw with an artist's eye in the forests and glades of the mountain-side the foundation of a beautiful park. He purchased from the various owners their wooded tracts and farms, amounting in all to over five hundred acres, which he proceeded to lay out in winding roads, villa sites, rustic rambles, cascades, lakes, etc., the whole forming one grand garden of rare poetic beauty. To the original tract about three hundred acres have been added and similarly laid out.

Mr. Haskell died in 1872, loved and respected by all who knew him. A life-size bust of Mr. Haskell, resting upon a granite pedestal, stands at the left side of the main entrance to the park on valley road. Mr. Finlay, the park gate-keeper, with long flowing beard, silvered o'er with the frosts of many winters, is the faithful guardian and dignified gentleman that has held the position from the first to the present time. His dignified and severe bearing inspires with wholesome fear the lawless tramp and wayward youth, while to the well-disposed he is kind and gentle.

THE MOUNTAIN COLONNADES.¹—We are indebted to the construction of the fine roads and highways of the Oranges for a better knowledge of the interior structure of the trap formation of the Orange Mountain. In 1869 the city of Orange resolved to improve Main Street by laying a portion of it with the Telford pavement. In June of that year Daniel Brennan, Jr., who had contracted for the work, purchased eight acres on the Northfield road, near to and upon the summit of the mountain, for quarrying the trap rock for road purposes. The highway, which had been in use from the earliest history of this region, and which, until the Mount Pleasant turnpike was built (1807), was the stage road to Morristown and beyond, was, until 1869, not much better than a wide cart-path. It was cut into deep ruts and rough with stones. The steep face of the trap wall overhung the road on the west, and a rail fence bounded its eastern side and separated it from the dense forest of lofty trees. The narrow pass down to Blue Bird Corner, thus shut in and overshadowed, can never be forgotten by the traveler at night for its blackness of darkness. Its only source of light was the phosphorescence of the decaying wood and fungi of the ancient fence which marked out the path of the benighted wayfarer.

The first rock which was quarried was taken from the summit, and on the south side of the highway as it now runs. It opened an imperfect basaltic formation, which appears in prismatic fragments, and is still seen over a considerable portion of its surface. The present working, which has now been continued for about fourteen years, presents a face of rock in places imperfectly columnar, mostly laminated, having near its summit irregular patches of basalt small in size, varying from five to twelve inches in diameter, some of them being quite perfect in all their angles.

About two years after this Brennan quarry was opened work was begun in the O'Rourke quarry. It is two-thirds of a mile north of the first, and near Mount Pleasant turnpike. The face of the mountain cliff in this locality had been noticed by the writer from the time when he became a resident of Orange as basaltic. It appeared in the places made bare by erosion, and its opening by quarrying has been watched with much interest. The work was begun east of what is now the centre of the dike. Its present face is nearly one hundred feet from the first place of working. In this part of the mountain, and for a space of one hundred and fifty feet, there were no basaltic columns. These became apparent on the north and south sides of the dike as the quarry was worked. They were short at first, according to the slope of the eastern face of the mountain, and became higher and more perfect as the work progressed. There has been no time when the face of the quarry has been so striking and so remarkable as it is at the present time. Its appearance eight years ago is manifested in a photograph taken in 1876 and published for private distribution by the New England Society of Orange.

It is not a causeway nor cavernous. To call it so is a misnomer. It does not admit of comparison or of contrast with the grandeur of the gigantic formation on the coast of Ireland nor with the beautiful angles of basalt on the Isle of Staffa. This formation is unique and sui generis, and in some of its features most satisfactory to the geologist and more instructive in the science of the trap formation than the Giant's Causeway or Fingal's Cave. We look upon a façade seven hundred feet wide; in the centre a dike, one hundred and fifty feet at the base, rising to an apex nearly one hundred feet high, flanked on each side by colonnades of basalt; on the south one hundred and ninety feet wide and from twenty-five to thirty-five feet high; and on the north three hundred feet wide and from twenty to twenty-five feet high. (See page 16 of this work.) The columns on the south are at the full height of the formation which is covered on the top by about three feet of drift. If quarried any farther the probability is that their perfection would be diminished. Those on the north of the dike, we infer, will become higher, as the mountain rises abruptly and a thin soil only covers the rock.

The dike, the interior of which is now so remarkably displayed, is not an extinct volcano. It is an eruption of the metamorphic rocks in a state of fusion, through fissures in the earth's crust, caused by the irresistible forces beneath. Hayden, in his description of the basaltic peaks in Colorado, says that the basaltic eruptions produce forms resembling craters; but not one occurrence has been observed that could be directly compared to the cone and crater of a volcano. (Report, p. 251.) There is certainly no crater in this dike on Orange Mountain. The waters within the earth at vast depths subjected to a temperature which held the granite rocks in fusion furnished an expansive power sufficient to force through existing fissures these liquefied masses. The apex is the vent or chimney through which the steam escaped.

The sedimentary rocks with their earliest fossils through the gradations of teeming life, excite in their study the wondering admiration and enthusiasm of the paleontologist, but in the study of the igneous rocks he finds his profoundest interest. The vast forces which the Creator set in operation when He laid the foundations of the earth are here illustrated in the sublimity of their energy. The Orange Mountain is but a hillock in contrast with the basaltic peaks of Colorado, described by Hayden as from four thousand to five thousand feet above their surrounding regions.

The inquiry has arisen in the minds of not a few, in what cosmogonic period were the red sandstone and trap rocks made? It was on the "fifth (creative) day." (Gen. i. 22.) The sandstone and trap rock appeared the earliest. These were followed by the Jurassic and Cretaceous deposits (the Reptilian age), and these by the tertiary and post-tertiary, when the earth was made ready for a higher order of animal life, created on the "sixth day," when, as the last creation, man was made to have dominion.

The reservoir of the Orange City Water-Works is located on the Rahway River, between the two mountains, on the firm of John Le Clare, south side of the Northfield road, and was built in 1883.

Civil Government.—As will be seen by the following act of the State Legislature, this township, when set off from the town of Orange and the townships of Caldwell and Livingston, was named Fairmount, no doubt in recognition of the beautiful mountain that crosses the territory embraced in the boundaries:

"AN ACT to create two parts of the town of Orange, and the township of Caldwell and Livingston, in the county of Essex, to be called the township of Fairmount.

1. BE IT ENACTED by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That all that part of the town of Orange and the townships of Caldwell and Livingston contained within the following bounds, to wit: Beginning at the corner of Orange and Caldwell townships at the southeast corner of Caldwell township, thence along the Bloomfield and Caldwell line in a northerly direction to the city charter, thence in a direct line in a westerly direction to the county bridge, near the residence of Mrs. S. E. Underhill, thence farther in a westerly direction, to the southeast corner of the lot of land known as the park lot in the second mountain, now owned by Alexander S. Ford, thence along the southern boundary of said park lot twenty chains, thence in a straight line in a southerly direction to the new county bridge over Garco brook, on the Swinfield road, near the residence of Jacob Willhous, thence farther in a southerly direction in a straight course to the township of Millburn, at a point sixty chains west from the mill known as the new mill, said mill being the corner of Orange, South Orange, Millburn and Livingston townships, thence in an easterly course along the line of the township of Millburn to the road mill, thence farther in an easterly direction along the line of the township of South Orange, to the southeast corner of James E. Smith's land, on the top of the Orange mountain, thence in a northerly direction in a straight line to the west side of the mouth of the road known as Perry lane, near Columbus Merker's house, thence along the westerly side of said Perry lane to its intersection with the Swinfield road, thence in a straight line to the place of beginning, to and the same to be set out as if a new township, to be called the township of Fairmount.

2. And be it enacted, That the inhabitants of the township of Fairmount are hereby constituted a body politic and corporate in law, and shall be styled and known by the name of the inhabitants of the township of Fairmount, in the county of Essex, and shall be entitled to all the rights, powers, authorities and privileges, and subject to the same laws, regulations, governments and liabilities, as the inhabitants of the other townships in the said county of Essex are or may be entitled or subject to by the existing laws of this State.

3. And be it enacted, That the inhabitants of the township of Fairmount shall hold their first town meeting at the West Orange school-house in the said township, of Fairmount, on the second Monday in April ensuing.

4. * * * * * The Town Committee of Fairmount, and an equal number of the Common Council of the town of Orange shall meet on the third Monday in April at Reeves' hotel, in Orange, for the purpose of settling the accounts, and dividing of all property in which both are interested."—Chapter LXXXVIII. Laws of New Jersey.

Section 5 authorizes the people of Fairmount to vote by ballot.

Section 6 appoints John Grannis judge, and Edmund Condit clerk of election, and authorizes them to hold the first election.

Section 7 directs that school money due the districts in Fairmount be paid to the superintendent-elect of public schools.

Section 8 assigns the township of Fairmount to the Second Assembly District of Essex County. Act approved March 11, 1862.

Township Lines Changed.—By an act of the State Legislature, approved March 14, 1863, the boundary lines of the township were changed as follows, and the name of the township changed:

"1. BE IT ENACTED by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That all that part of the town of Orange, in the said county of Essex, contained within the following bounds, to wit: Beginning at a point twelve chains westerly from the northwest corner of the bridge near the late residence of Alexander Saxe, deceased, on the dividing line between Orange and Bloomfield, thence running in a straight line to Francis Durand's well, thence south in a straight line to the southeast corner of the same works on White street, thence on the westerly side of said White street to the bridge, thence south in a straight line to the corner of the lands belonging to the heirs of Charles Lightbitt, deceased, and the heirs of Jacob A. Sharp, deceased, on the south side of Main street, thence south to a straight line to the easterly line of Amos Stagg's lot; thence south in a straight line to a brook in Joyce street; thence along the line of said brook south to the north side of Freeman-town road; thence southwesterly along the line of said road to the county bridge near the school-house; thence south down the brook to the South Orange line; thence west along the South Orange line to the southeast-corner of Fairmount, thence north along the line of the township of Fairmount in its several courses to the Bloomfield line, thence along the Bloomfield line in its several courses to the place of beginning, be and the same is hereby set off from the town of Orange and annexed to and made a part of the township of Fairmount, in said county, to all intents and purposes as if said territory had originally been a part of said township; and that the act entitled 'An act to create for parts of the town of Orange and the townships of Caldwell and Livingston, in the said county of Essex, a new township, to be called the township of Fairmount,' approved March eleventh, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-two, shall have the same force and effect, within the territory hereby annexed, as they have heretofore held, and now rightfully have within the original limits of said township."

"And be it enacted, That the name of said township of Fairmount be and the same is hereby changed to West Orange."

Since the passage and approval of the foregoing acts there have been several laws enacted by the State Legislature relative to the duties, powers and emoluments of the different township officers, also in relation to laying out and macadamizing different roads and avenues, also in relation to savage dogs, swine, cattle, tramps and various other matters, that would occupy several pages of this work, and that would be of no use to the present or future generations.

Township Officials.—From 1862 to the present time the following-named persons have filled the offices to which their names are attached, and for the years given, the first year for the township of Fairmount, and since that time for West Orange.

Township Committees' Meetings. The first meeting of the township committee of the township of Fairmount was held July 15, 1862, in the West Orange School-house, and organized by the election of Ambrose Condit as chairman, and by resolution adopted by the committee the township was divided into four districts.

During the year several meetings were held, and at the last meeting of the Fairmount township committee, held in April, 1863, the following appears from the records to have been the financial condition of this new municipality, destined to lose so soon its fair name:

Amount of duplicate, $151.45; received on settlement with Orange, from which the township was taken, $19,000; interest on same, $808.60; total, $157.33; credit, by paid for books, stationery, etc., $5.00; State and county tax, $491.41; superintendent of schools, $153.00; roads, $300.00; poor fund, $124.31; assessors' services, $25.33; cattle tax' fees, $24.74; commissioner of appeals, $5.00; overseer of poor, $80.00; town clerk $21.94; township committee, $29.00; L. D. Tompkins, surveying, $1.00; J. S. Williams, Esq., for services, $0.75; W. H. Williams, expenses to Trenton, $13.25; uncollected tax, $15.55; bal. on hand, $22.11; total, $947.41.

—EUGENE COCHRAN, Town Clerk.

The first meeting of the township committee for the township of West Orange was held in the early part of April, 1863, and on the 25th of the same month the committee met and appointed overseers of roads for the four road districts, as follows: First District, Jephth B. Lindsley; Second District, Ira Harrison; Third District, John Gramies; Fourth District, Laurence Koehler. The township was divided into districts, as follows: By Mount Pleasant turnpike and Main Street, running east and west; by the former lines between Orange and Fairmount, running north and south. The township was also divided into four pound districts, each road district comprising a pound district, with the following pound-keepers: First, Amos L. Stagg; Second, Alfred Harrison; Third, William Maynard; Fourth, Alpheus Leclere.

At a meeting of the township committee, held April 18, 1864, it was ordered that the Poor Farm, owned in conjunction with Orange, or so much of it as was owned by West Orange, be sold for three hundred dollars per acre.

Streets.—In the early fall of 1871 the present most excellent system of telfordizing the public roads in the township was inaugurated, and the job of grading and telfordizing South Valley Road was let to J. G. Wright; the grading at fifty cents per cubic yard, and the macadamizing at one dollar and thirty-seven and a half cents per cubic yard. From that time to the present this commendable enterprise has steadily progressed until West Orange stands in the front rank for excellency in beautiful and pleasant boulevards.

Religious Interests of West Orange.—ST. MARK'S CHURCH, ORANGE,¹ may be considered as a daughter of Trinity Church, Newark. In the year

1808 the Rev. Joseph Willard, rector of Trinity, reported: "That he had performed divine service and preached twice at Benjamin Williams', Orange, where he had large and attentive congregations, that there were several families who appear to be attached to the Episcopal Church, for whom he had baptized seven or eight children, and who regularly attend at Newark."

The families thus alluded to who formed the nucleus of the congregation were those of Benjamin Williams, Sr., of his nephew, James Williams, and of his sons, Benjamin Williams, Jr., Josiah Williams, Samuel Williams and Amos Williams.

These families continued under the pastor a charge of the rector of Trinity Church, and were favored with occasional services from the successive rectors, Messrs. Willard, Bayard and Powers, until measures were taken for a separate organization. It appears that Benjamin Williams, Sr., was confirmed in Newark, Sept. 16, 1813; Benjamin Williams, Jr., May 1, 1817; James Williams and Samuel Williams, May 21, 1819; and Amos Williams, Oct. 17, 1822.

In the year 1819 these families were brought to the notice of the bishop of the diocese, John Croes, D.D., who visited them and continued from this time until his death to include their neighborhood in his episcopal visitations. In 1825 their neighborhood was made a missionary station and placed under the charge of the Rev. Benjamin Holmes. Mr. Holmes resided at Morristown, and having several other stations under his care, at first gave his services on but one Sunday a month to Orange. About the time of his appointment the hearts of the little band of churchmen were cheered by the accession of Caleb Harrison to their number, with his family and several of his relatives. They then felt encouraged to take measures for the formation of a parish, and on April 7, 1827, St. Mark's Church was incorporated according to the laws of the State. The corner-stone of a church edifice was laid May 12, 1828, by the missionary, Mr. Holmes. A building of brown stone, forty feet by sixty, was erected during the year at a cost of seven thousand to eight thousand dollars, some portion of which hung over the parish as a debt for some three or four years. The building was completed so far as to admit of consecration by Bishop Croes, on Feb. 20, 1829. Before this glad event took place, however, death had made sad inroads upon the few church families. The first churchman of the place, the venerable Benjamin Williams, was called away Sept. 4, 1826, James Williams in 1826, and Josiah Williams, July 20, 1828. Soon after the consecration of the church fifty-four pews were sold, the most of them on very easy terms and all free of rent. The faithful and acceptable missionary was consequently enabled, in his annual report, May 27, 1829, to include fifty-four families and pew-holders as the number constituting the parish. It must be observed, however, that the greater portion of these families, as yet, were but nominally attached to the doctrines of the church. Residing in the neighborhood and having contributed somewhat to the erection of the edifice, several families were induced to take pews, especially as they were subject to no rent for the support of the ministrations. The great burden, both in building the church and in supporting its services, fell upon a few individuals, among whom are especially to be named Messrs. Caleb and John Harrison, and Messrs. Samuel, Amos and Benjamin Williams. Having thus organized the parish, erected a church and gathered a flock, Mr. Holmes relinquished the charge of the congregation, and confined his services to St. Peter's Church, Morristown, in the spring of 1829. The parish then ceased to be a missionary station and was enabled to secure the entire services of the Rev. William Relifuson Whittingham, who took charge about June 1, 1829, and immediately began regular morning and evening services on each Lord's Day. Mr. Whittingham was in deacon's orders, but was ordained priest on Dec. 17, and installed rector on Dec. 18, 1829. At the time when he took charge the communicants were thirteen in number. He was called on a salary of four hundred dollars, and was to continue to perform the duties of editor to the General Sunday-School Union. These united offices of rector and editor were filled by Mr. Whittingham to the entire satisfaction of the parish until Nov. 1, 1830, when, to the extreme regret of the congregation, he felt it to be his duty to resign for the purpose of giving his whole attention to the concerns of the Sunday-School Union, to the editorship of the "Standard Works of Church Divines" and to the charge of the Protestant Episcopal press. The zealous labors of Mr. Whittingham were greatly blessed. During his brief connection with the parish the number of communicants was more than doubled, and much was done in dispelling prejudices and in confirming the attachment of some who had hitherto been but nominal members of the parish. Although retiring from the pastoral charge, Mr. Whittingham did not cease to take interest in its welfare. While retaining his connection with the Protestant Episcopal press, and while a professor in the General Theological Seminary, he frequently visited it and officiated. During the year 1832 he resided in the parish, and until his election to the episcopate of Maryland, and his removal thither in 1840, the congregation very often enjoyed and profited from his ministerial services.

Immediately after the resignation of Mr. Whittingham the vestry took measures for the appointment of a successor, and on Nov. 10, 1830, elected their former pastor, the Rev. Benjamin Holmes, to the vacant rectorship, and pledged him a salary of five hundred dollars per annum. Mr. Holmes accepted the appointment on Feb. 20, 1831, and took charge of the congregation early in the spring, but circumstances prevented his institution until July 4, 1831, when in due form he was put in possession of the rectorship. During the vacancy service was partially sustained in the church by occasional supplies. One of the first acts of the vestry, after Mr. Holmes' institution, was to build a tower on the church, and procure a bell weighing four hundred and seventy pounds. In September, 1833, an organ was purchased, at an expense of three hundred dollars.

In promising Mr. Holmes a salary of five hundred dollars the vestry had depended on the uncertain plan of pledges and subscriptions. The consequence was that the modest, retiring and faithful rector received but an irregular supply for his wants, and was forced to endure much privation. Finding that the plan of subscriptions did not succeed, a few members of the parish determined to raise a permanent fund of five thousand dollars, the interest of which should be devoted to the support of the rector. This object was partially accomplished on Jan. 27, 1834. On this day ten individuals (among whom the most prominent were Samuel Williams, Caleb Harrison, John Harrison, Amos Williams and Benjamin Williams) put their names to an instrument pledging themselves and their heirs, respectively, for moneys to the amount of five thousand dollars, and gave their personal notes for the amounts which they subscribed, with the understanding that these notes could remain so long as the interest was paid. As the subscribers passed away, and in some cases before death, their pledges were redeemed, so that, deducting losses, about four thousand five hundred dollars was eventually secured to the church in real estate and bank stock. In this same year, 1834, a house and lot were purchased for a parsonage, at a cost of one thousand dollars, with moneys included in the above-mentioned fund. This parsonage and lot, however, being incommmodious and at a distance from the church, was subsequently sold in 1836.

Mr. Holmes continued to discharge the duties of his office to the edification of his increasing flock, and to their entire satisfaction, until his death, which sad event took place, after a short illness, on Aug. 4, 1836. He expired universally beloved, and was buried under the chancel of the church as a fitting resting-place for its founder. As a proof of their attachment, the congregation doubled his salary for the year in which he died, and paid the sum over to his widow and infant daughter. Mr. Holmes' ministrations were very acceptable unto his people. "His evenness of temper, unaffected modesty and amiable simplicity of manners made him dear to all, while his unshaken integrity, sound judgment and firmness in the discharge of his duty constrained all to respect no less than they loved him." He was sincerely attached to the peculiar doctrines of the church, declared them with honest sincerity, and preached the truths of the Gospel generally with faithfulness and devotion, while by a consistent private walk he gave energy and value to his public teaching. Under God his labors were blessed to the edification and the spiritual conversion of many. By his prudence, his zeal and his self-sacrifice he accomplished much in laying the foundation and in building up the church, and to him the congregation of St. Mark's owes a lasting debt of gratitude. During his ministry as rector for five years and four months ninety-six baptisms took place, forty-one persons were confirmed, and fifty-five were added to the number of communicants.

The writer of the foregoing historical sketch, James A. Williams, then a lay member of the parish, was ordained deacon by Bishop Doane, July 10, 1836. After the death of the rector, Benjamin Holmes, the eyes of the congregation were turned to him for a supply of the pulpit and the vacancy in the rectorship. Having been brought up in the parish, and being without experience in the duties of the ministerial office, the proposed invitation to the vacancy was limited, at his own suggestion, to a period of six months, dating from Aug. 13, 1836. On the expiration of this period he was unanimously chosen to the rectorship Jan. 25, 1837, on a salary of four hundred dollars and the use of the parsonage, speedily to be built. On Sept. 9, 1837, he was formally installed by Bishop Doane. The parish, however, was considered to be under his ministerial charge from Aug. 13, 1836.

In 1884 the Rev. Bishop Faulkner was in charge of St. Mark's. The assistant rectorship was vacant. The wardens were Charles Williams and William Cleveland; Vestrymen, Hon. John L. Blake, George Bayles, M.D., J. M. Hare, S. O. Rollinson, Edward Williams, James W. Field, Esq., Col. George Gray, Charles A. Lighthipe, S. M. Van Rensselaer, Harrison Whittingham. The parish owns, besides the large stone church, a mission chapel and rectory, the whole valued at one hundred thousand dollars. Communicants in December, 1884, three hundred and fifty. The Sunday-school comprises over four hundred pupils, with Stephen W. Williams superintendent.

The Ladies' Benevolent Society and St. Mark's Guild are active and aggressive in all charitable work. The rector is president of the "House of the Good Shepherd," a home for old persons, sustained by Episcopal Churches in the vicinity. The church maintains a boy choir noted for its excellence in music, and is in charge of Messrs. Rollinson, Van Rensselaer and Whittingham.

PLEASANT VALLEY GERMAN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—This church, located on the west face of First Mountain, overlooking Pleasant Valley, between the two mountains, was organized May 26, 1878, with the following-named persons, who constituted the pioneer membership: F. Sippel, Christian Fentzlaff, W. Fentzlaff, E. Ilgin, J. Wolf, G. Werner, F. Wolf, K. Sippel, Mrs. M. Reiman and Mrs. E. Merklin.

The church edifice is a frame building, the cornerstone of which was laid March 6, 1878, and the edifice dedicated that year by Revs. Dr. Seiberl, E. Mix, H. Gruhnert and W. Whitaker. The pioneer officers of this society were: Elders, I. Sippel, W. Fentzlaff and E. Ilgin; Trustees, Ch. Fentzlaff, F. Wolf, K. Sippel, G. Werner and J. Yost.

This society has been quite fortunate in its pastoral oversight, having had but the present pastor, Rev. Franz Hartig, a student from the Bloomfield Theological Seminary, who began his labors with this people June 1, 1877, in the Pleasant Valley School-house, and on July 10, 1879, was ordained and installed as pastor of this church. To his untiring energy is due the building up of this church and congregation. A neat and commodious parsonage was completed May 18, 1881. The value of church property in September, 1884, was six thousand dollars, with a church membership of eighty. The elders were F. Sippel, W. Fentzlaff, G. Rausch; Trustees, Ch. Fentzlaff, F. Wolf, F. Klinebach, J. Müller, E. Ilgin, L. Weimer and H. Hofmann.

SECOND VALLEY CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, located a short distance above the new reservoir, between the First and Second Mountains. The house of worship was moved to Ridgway Avenue. For a number of years this was a flourishing church and congregation. It finally became weak, numerically and financially, and became a mission of Valley Congregational Church, and is now under its control.

Pioneer Settlers.—Among the pioneers of what is now West Orange township were the Williams, Harrison, Nutman, Crane, Ball and Walls families. The most numerous, however, was the Williams family, who located at or near what was known as Tory Corner, and subsequently known as Williamsville, yet the old, old name, though of rather an unsavory smell, politically, still clings to the locality.

For the following copies of deeds, venduees, sales, letters, etc., we are indebted to Mr. Ezra S. Williams, a direct descendant of the old original Williams family, and now one of the prominent citizens of West Orange:

“SCHUYLER COLFAX.”

This Schuyler Colfax, as will be seen by the following extract from a private letter, was the grandfather

Justice Bond, Ind. July 22. '84.

I know of my grandfather's connection with slavery for he told me, in my boyhood days, when I went there for W. M. latly to spend my vacations, that he had tried to give his slaves their freedom before the Emancipation act & they indignantly refused, saying they knew when they had a good master & a good home I had heard too that my father had one of these slaves for his own, but what I don't see is the only proof I have had of it of the Hon. Schuyler Colfax, late Vice-President of the United States. The original letter is in possession of Ezra C. Williams, of West Orange.

Very truly Yrs Schuyler Colfax

Reminiscences of Tory Corner.—We are indebted to John C. Williams for the following sketch of Tory Corner School-house, also for the old time prayer meeting:

In the centre of the triangle formed by the junction of Washington Street, Valley and Eagle Rock roads, stood the Tory Corner School house, an one-story box without porch, lobby or closet, about twenty by thirty feet on the ground, with eight feet posts, weather-boarded and ceiled with poplar (whitewood) boards, a hole cut overhead in one corner to shove a boy through in case it took fire between ceiling and roof, a brick chimney in the centre resting on the ceiling beams, a cast-iron box stove with straight pipe directly underneath, a door in the southern gable, no suspicion of paint outside or in, a few loads of tan bark, banked around the base to keep out the wistry winds, never ceasing school-boy prayers ascending that it might take fire and make a holiday. (Maybe you don't believe it; then you don't understand human nature.)

About the year 1820 or 1821, Shaler Justin Hillyer, a nephew of Rev. Asa Hillyer, took charge of the school.

Well qualified to teach, he was supreme in school, and parents listened to no appeal from their children. "Punish them; they deserve it" was the word.

May we not hope that the temporal punishment he inflicted induced the sin-recording angel to drop the obliterating tear on the record and happily transfer something to the credit side of the account? "Fiat justitia ruat cælum."

I have before my memory an appalling array of apple-tree sprouts, broken rules, and unfinching, fearless culprits, guilty of life, youth, health and action. The hand that pens these lines has tingling memories, and, surviving schoolmates, do you not remember how we promised to get even with him when we got big enough? Let this recital suffice; it is god-like to forgive.

Mr. Hillyer gave up the school in 1826 or 1827. In 1831, while living in Newark, I saw a notice posted on a tree on the town common that Rev. S. J. Hillyer would preach there that Sunday afternoon. At the appointed hour a little crowd assembled under the tree. He gave out a hymn (no singing), offered up prayer, and preached a sermon, of which I can recall nothing. Our ways had separated for all time.

Shaler Justin Hillyer (born Dec. 12, 1799, died Sept. 26, 1865), was the son of Horace and Anna Holcomb Hillyer. He came to Orange from Granby, Conn., about the year 1818-20, and taught school in the Corner. He married Catherine Tichenor (born Aug. 19, 1805, died Jan. 19, 1878), daughter of Moses and Dorcas Harrison Tichenor, May 10, 1823, and went to house-keeping in the house owned by Moses Gardner, latterly by Ira Condit, where his first child, Anna M., was born July 1, 1824. He afterwards built the house where Anthony Thompson now lives, and where his second daughter, Mary, was born July 22, 1827. He went to Newark and kept school for some time, then to New York, and then to Brooklyn. From an obituary notice I find that he moved to North Salem, Westchester Co., N. Y., in 1845, when he became pastor of the Universalist Church, in connection with the society at Long Ridge, preaching alternately. The last few years of his life he preached at Salem. The obituary says that during all these thirty-one years he walked with them in purity and preached to them in godly sincerity, abiding with them in peace, unity and love, without thought of separation. On his monument in North Salem, is inscribed: "He was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith."—Acts. ii. 24.

Old-Time Prayer-Meeting—THE FIRST SUNDAY-SCHOOL.—

"Hark! 'tis the breeze of twilight calling
Earth's weary children to repose;
While round the couch of nature falling,
Gently the night's soft curtains close."

A little assemblage of parents and children were gathered in the old school-house. A candle burns dimly on the teacher's long-legged, rickety desk, a murmuring sound of conversation arises as neighbors interchange kind inquiries and answers. Presently Deacon Amos Harrison's portly form arises, and gives out a hymn,—

"God is our refuge in distress,
A present help when dangers press.
In him undaunted we'll confide,
Though earth were from her centre tost,
And mountains in the ocean lost,
Torn piecemeal by the roaring tide."

Meanwhile a few more candles are lighted and hymn-books reconnoitered. Uncle John (Williams), candle in hand, starts the tune; young Governor Ben (Williams) sings a full, smooth, harmonious bass; the deacon's daughter, Rhoda (now Mrs. Peck), in the luxuriant fullness of life's sweet morning, pours out her soul in melodious treble; others join the swelling tide of sound, and all is glorions. Do you ask what tunes they sung? Did you ever hear an old folks' concert? Well, them's 'um.

Now comes the voice of prayer. Another hymn,—

"False are the men of high degree,
The baser sort are vanity,
Weighed in a balance both appear Light as a puff of empty air."

"Abraham (Williams), will you read the sermon?" Ahem! Acts xiv. 15, etc. Soothed by the tedious monotony of the sermon, the little ones, with their heads on mothers' laps, have gone (where Cain found comfort aforetime) to the land of Nod. A spirit of sweet resignation pervades the congregation as the dry old sermon drags on. What a good time for worldly thoughts! Young men and maidens, did bright visions of life beckon you out into the world? Fathers and mothers, did the pressing necessities of present existence demand your attention? "What went ye out for to see?" Nil desperandum. The sermon ends. Another hymn,—

"Sweet is the work, my God and King,
To praise thy name, give thanks and sing.
To show thy work by morning light,
And talk of all thy truth at night."

Meeting is out. The angels, "ascending and descending," disappear and draw up their ladder. Each and all to their home and pillow. Silence reigns.

"Grant that beneath thine eye securely,
Our souls awhile from life withdrawn,
May in the darkness, stilly, purely,
Like sealed fountains, rest till dawn."

In after-time, Master Abraham Harrison, a Presbyterian licentiate, conducted the services and preached his own sermons. About 1824, in the summer, the first Sunday-school was commenced in this place. My memory recalls Ira Harrison, Jephtha Harrison, Miss Alice Gaston (afterwards Mrs. Lindsley, mother of Thomas G. Lindsley Esq.) and Abraham Williams as teachers connected with it. There may have been other teachers; I do not remember.

Williams Family.—It is a family tradition, that Matthew Williams, progenitor of the Williams family, came from Wales, about 1630, that he sailed from Glasgow, that he made the acquaintance of a Scotch girl on shipboard, and that she became his wife.

He settled in Weathersfield, Conn., as stated in Savage's Genealogical Dictionary. He had a son, Amos born in 1645; Matthew, born in 1647, and died young; another son, Matthew, born in 1651; and Samuel, born in 1653. This son Matthew came to Newark and was admitted a planter by a vote of the town, Nov. 29, 1680, fourteen years after the first settlement of Newark, when he was twenty-nine years old; he had no trade, and was written down "yeoman."

It is probable that his brothers, Amos and Samuel, one or both, came to Newark also about the same time, but there is no record on this point except that the name of Amos appears among the grand jurors of Essex County in 1700, and among the signers to the agreement for the third Indian purchase of over-mountain lands in 1701, on which lands he may have settled and became the progenitor of the Williamses of the Northfield region (now Livingston). He may have been the father of David Williams, Lieutenant in a troop of horse, who purchased half of the Anthony Olive farm May 18, 1726 (of Jonathan Lindsley, who bought the same of Peleg Shores), and in 1730 bought the other half.

1 By John C. Williams, of Newton, N. J.

According to the records, Matthew received the customary allotment of land in Newark, in the neighborhood of High and Hill Streets (see town map of 1806), and outlands at the mountain, bounded, probably, by a line beginning on Wigwam Brook, at the mill dam; running west up the ravine to the mountain top; thence north along the crest to a fault, or offset a little south of Eagle Rock; thence east to Wigwam Brook, and south to place of beginning, containing forty or fifty acres.

In 1685 the heirs of George Day had set off to them, by W. Camp, surveyor, sixty acres, bounded with the mountain, west; Matthew Williams, south; Wigwam Brook, east and the Common, north; "provided they pay the purchase for their lands as others have done."

In 1688-89, George Day exchanged lands with Matthew Williams, the latter parting with a dwelling-house, shop, other edifices and orchard and lands near Newark, and receiving two tracts at the mountain,—one bounded east by Wigwam Brook and the other on Parrow's Brook.¹

For some reason the lands near Eagle Rock, so acquired, were known to the later descendants as the David Day fields.

Matthew had four sons,—Amos, born 1690; Matthew, born 1695; Gershom, born (about) 1698, and Thomas, born 1701, the last, said to be the first white child born in Orange. Also daughters,—Johanna, born 1680, married John Condit (their wedding is said to be the first in Orange); Jemima, born 1686, married Samuel Harrison; Rebecca, born —, married Joseph Hedden; Ruth, born 1708, died 1724.

Some time previous to the birth of Thomas (1701) and after the birth of Matthew, Jr., (1695), the elder Matthew moved to his mountain lands, and built a dwelling on the south side of Eagle Rock road, near where the mountain stream unites with Wigwam Brook,—at that time a dense wilderness, inhabited only by bears, wolves and panther (alias cougar or puma), for whose destruction bounties were offered as late as 1751.

Garven Lawrie writes to the proprietors in 1684 from Elizabethtown,—

"Here wants nothing but people. There is not a poor body in the provinces, nor that wants. Here is abundance of provisions, pork and beef at two pence per pound, fish and fowl plenty, oysters, I think, would serve all England. Indian wheat (maize) two and six pence per bushel; it is exceeding good for food every way, and two or three hundred fold increase. Also good and plenty for one penny per quart, good venison plenty brought us for eighteen pence per quarter, eggs at three pence per dozen, and very good as ever I saw, vines, walnuts, peaches, strawberries and many other things plenty in the woods."

And yet with all this abundance and cheapness of beef, the story goes that the tract of land bounded by Washington Street, Harrison Avenue, Bloomfield road and Dodd Street, on which Rosedale Cemetery is located, say four miles around it, and containing six hundred and forty acres, was sold for ten cows and a bull, which would indicate that land was plenty and cheap also. Lawrie describes the mode of building thus: "They build with cloven timber, eight or ten inches broad, like planks, one end on the ground and the other nailed to the raising, which they plaster within." Whether Matthew built in this way or with logs we have no knowledge, but timber was plenty for any style of architecture. His son Matthew was a mason by trade, and it is probable that the stone house, erected about 1720, on the north side of the road and stream (where Mr. Bramhall now owns), was built by him or with his assistance, as he was then about twenty-five years of age.

This house was built of quarried stone, disposed to crumble, say twenty-five feet front and twenty-eight feet deep, one and a half stories high; a clumsy chimney, like a stone fence, set on end; a roomy garret, containing a large grain bin with a spout at the bottom to draw off the contents; two small windows in the front of the house, and an entry eight feet wide across the eastern end,—a cavernous and gloomy house, but comfortable and secure. It was demolished about 1822, and at that time looked as though it was one hundred years old. It was then replaced by a frame structure, still standing, by Zenas, a great-grandson of the elder Matthew.

The headstone of Matthew, in the old burying-ground at Orange, shows that he died Nov. 12, 1732, aged eighty-one years. The memorial of his wife, Ruth, is also to be seen. She died July, 1724, in her sixty-seventh year.

The following is a copy of a paper explanatory of itself:

"TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

"Be it known that, Whereas:

"Gershom Williams, Amos Williams, Matthew Williams and Thomas Williams, of Newark, &c., are under obligation mutually and jointly to stand by and for each other in the maintaining, securing and defending such right and property of lands as they and each of them have and hold, of, by, from and under their Hon^d father, Matthew Williams, of Newark, &c., deceased, &c. These presents now show and declare that Amos Williams, his heirs and executors and administrators, above said, is hereby released and discharged from the obligation above said, so far as it may concern or have respect unto the right, interest and property of the above said Gershom Williams, his heirs, executors and administrators, over or above the mountain.

After the death of Matthew, in 1732, Amos reigned in his (home) stead. Thomas seems to have occupied the lands south side of Eagle Rock road, where some of his descendants live to this day. Gershom and descendants occupied lands from the corner of Valley and Washington Streets, with some intervals, down to the corner of North Park Street, and Matthew, Jr., from Day Street to Park Street, both families remaining to this day.

Amos was a cooper by trade, also a justice of the peace. He married Mary Nutman, daughter of James Nutman, whose name appears in Newark in 1695. James Nutman came from Edinburgh, Scotland. His second wife was Sarah daughter of Rev. John Pruden, of First Church, Newark. This James Nutman seems to have been concerned in the third Indian purchase of over-the-mountain lands in 1701, and for love and affection, deeded one hundred acres of it to his son-in-law, Amos Williams (see old deed). He died March 8, 1739, aged seventy-seven years. His will names John, Samuel, James, Isaac, Ephraim, Abigail, Mary Williams and Hannah Sargeant. His son, Rev. John Nutman, married Mehetable Mitchell; was pastor of the church at Whippany, and died September, 1751, aged forty-eight years. His will names (no children of his own) Nathaniel, James, Benjamin and Sarah, children of his sister, Mary Williams; Phebe, child of sister, Abigail Tuttle; Rachel, child of sister, Rachel Englos; the children of his brother Isaac, (deceased), and of his sister Hannah Sargeant, (deceased), and gives ten pounds to Hanover Church. The name of Amos Williams appears in Newark town records as surveyor of highways in 1737-38; assessor in 1741-42. He died in 1754, aged sixty-four years. His children were Nathaniel, 1733; Benjamin, 1740; and Sarah, second wife of Joseph Dodd, born in 1742. Enos, James and another Sarah died young.

Nathaniel married Sarah Pierson, and lived in the old homestead. He learned the cooper's trade of his father, who desired him in his will to instruct his brother Benjamin, then fourteen years of age, in the same trade, which he did. Township records say he was overseer of highways in 1756. His children were Zenas, Amos, James, John, Uzal and Nathaniel.

After Benjamin became of age he took, by his father's will, the upper part of the farm, then a wilderness, and commenced clearing and building a home. The brothers built a dam and erected a saw-mill on Wigwam Brook about 1760 or 70. Benjamin married, first, Elizabeth Condit, who soon died, leaving a daughter Elizabeth. He then married Phebe, daughter of Caleb Crane, Esq.

When the Revolutionary war broke out, the brothers, together with their uncle, James Nutman, for good and sufficient reason thereunto them moving, espoused the unpopular English side. James Nutman was imprisoned in Morristown and Sussex County jails by the Committee of Safety. Nathaniel went to New York. His wife petitioned the Committee of Safety not to be sent to her husband, but asked to be allowed to remain with her children at home. He died there in 1782, of smallpox. His property was confiscated, but as his action was the result of an honest opinion, there was no personal ill-will against him by his former neighbors, but rather sympathy for his family, and at the sale no one would bid against the widow. His son, Amos, went to Shesburne, Nova Scotia, where he ended his days, leaving children.

Benjamin took out a written protection from a British officer, which owing to the situation of the opposing armies, could have been of but little value.

At the last moment by law allowed he was induced by his father-in-law to take the oath of allegiance to the new government and save his property, but he never surrendered his convictions. He always said that "the Declaration of Independence was as big a lie as was ever written," and would never accept an office under the new government, although prominent as a business man.

After the war of the Revolution he acquired considerable real estate, started a tan-yard, built a bark mill, currying mill, distillery, currying-shop and cider mill. Among other lands, he purchased the Col. Peter Schuyler farm (Schuyler's daughter, Catherine, married Capt. Kennedy). This farm was next north above Gen. Philip Kearny's place, over the river, above Newark, at what was then known as Barbadoes Neck.

The old man finished his last barrel while a grandchild held the candle, for the day was too short, and "I will never make another" he said. Now and then his stooping form may be seen, walking with feeble step over the fields, leaning on his cane, and followed by his faithful dog, Ponto, or he reads the New York Spectator, and New Jersey Eagle.

He has made half a dozen mills, and outlived them all. He makes a social call on his cousin, son of Matthew, Jr., who is about the same age. Their children have intermarried—Capt. Tom, the patriot; Governor Ben, the loyalist,—a busy stormy life of over eighty years; each has exhausted his energies, and they live their eventful lives over again, they differ, the dim eyes flash, the indomitable old Welsh blood is up; ah! but it is all blown over; blood is thicker than water; they part with mutual respect.

Another scene. A winter night; the hospitable kitchen fire-place piled high with blazing logs; one by one the neighbors drop in, till the semicircle is full. Among them sits the Governor.

"His hood all silvered o'er with age,
And long experience made him sage."

A cloud of smoke rolling up from white clay pipes and hissing backlog goes mingling, flaming, roaring up the huge-throated chimney. They talk of observation days, 11th, 12th, 13th of November, O. S.; that new cider mill and press the Harrisons, Baldwins and Dodds are introducing will never do; the Morris Canal, some day we will be taxed to fill up the big ditch; some folks are trying to use stoves to cook with; they are trying to banish liquors from the side-board, forming temperance societies, going to quit making cider, abolish distilleries, cut down orchards; the Methodists are going crazy with revivals, the Presbyterians, too; they say New York is going to sink; Gen. Lafayette is coming; "bury me plainly," says the old man. He died in September, 1826, aged eighty-seven years. The following children lived, married and had children: Caleb, Enos, Josiah, Phebe, Benjamin, Samuel, Amos, Alethea, Philip, James and Mary Elizabeth.

His son Benjamin inherited the homestead, and married Joanna, daughter of his cousin Zeus, and died in 1842, aged sixty-six years.

The homestead of 1680-1700 is part of it, still in the Williams family, and three generations left for future record. The whole family history in all its branches would spread out to such an extent as to be unsuited for this volume; hence the necessity of following it by a single thread in its later details. Will some future historian "gather up the fragments that nothing be lost," before it is too late?

In a record of two hundred years we find very few instances of official life in the family. One colonel, one captain, three lawyers (Gude forgive them!), an occasional justice of the peace, two doctors, two clergymen, some few deacons, some mechanics (good ones). Mostly the Williamses occupy the post of honor known as private citizens.

"He that holds fast the golden mean,
And lives contentedly between
The little and the great,
Feels not the wants that pinch the poor,
Nor plagues that haunt the rich man's door,
Embittering all his state."

It would be strange indeed if evolving protoplasm meandering down the centuries should have escaped contact with miasmatic influences and destructive cataclysms entirely every time, and the roadbed full of them. Perhaps the only insurmountable evil in the family has been a very few cases of alcoholic diseases, and as we conjecture the amount of buried evil and contrast it with the known good, the Pharisee within us murmurs, "Well done."

Within the family were several blacks, always well treated, sharing with the family its hardships and comforts, never punished, but treated like men and brothers. If one ventured to run away and seek his fortune by his own efforts, he was not pursued and brought back, but counted as among the foolish ones. Elsewhere in this chapter is a receipt from Schuyler Colfax for "$200 in part payment of negro man Charles." Notice that he is not called a slave; neither was he considered so. The Schuyler Colfax mentioned lived near Pompton Plains, and was the grandfather of our late Vice-President of same name, Abraham Williams, who took the money to New York and brought back the receipt, married a daughter of Mr. Colfax; hence his appearance in the transaction.

One striking feature, apparent at a glance, is the number of men in the family. This enabled the fathers to secure, clear up and cultivate much land, build houses, and carry on the different industries mentioned.

Time has effaced nearly every evidence of the busy shops which clustered in the Corner, along the banks of the Wigwam Brook. They exist to-day only in the memories of the sexagenarians.

Much of the real estate, though divided among the children, and subdivided among the children's children, and less some sold, still remains in the family.

The first coach that ever came to Orange was said to have belonged to Benjamin Williams, the "Old Governor," as he was familiarly called. This was used by him and his family many years in attending Trinity Church, Newark.

The first Episcopal Church services in this vicinity were held in his house, and many of his children and children of the neighbors were there baptized. When St. Mark's Church, Orange, was organized his children took an active part, and contributed largely, as will be seen by a perusal of St. Mark's history.

Essex County's Last Slave.—Anthony Thompson, the oldest and best-known colored man in the Oranges, died at his residence, at the junction of Washington Street and Eagle Rock Avenue, Tory Corner, West Orange,—on Tuesday night, Aug. 1884. He was the last of the old slaves of Essex County, and died of old age and a complication of troubles.

Uncle Anthony, as all his neighbors called him, was a tall, powerfully built man of great strength and endurance. His great-grandmother was the queen of an African tribe, and his grandmother, when a young girl, was stolen, with a number of others, by a slave-trader and brought to this country. Uncle Anthony was born in Raritan, Somerset Co., in 1798, his mother being a slave in the family of Rev. Dr. Philip Duryee, pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church of that place. Two of Dominic Duryee's grandsons, John G. and Joseph D. Harrison, are now living and carry on the flour and feed business at No. 502 Broad Street, Newark. While Uncle Anthony was a baby, Dominic Duryee sold out and removed to Little Falls (now Passaic County), and Anthony's mother was sold to one David Still, Anthony being sold with her. About a year after Anthony and his mother were sold to Samuel M. Ward, of Cranetown (now Montclair). They lived with Mr. Ward until the latter's death, in 1822. In his will Mr. Ward gave Anthony his freedom, but requested he should remain with Mrs. Ward until her death. She died in September, 1828, and Anthony, being then twenty-four years of age, was his own master. His mother was too old to begin life anew, and was a town charge. In those days the poor were sold off to whoever bid the lowest price for taking care of them.

Anthony, though he was just starting out in life bought his mother for one hundred dollars, took her home and cared for her until her death in a most filial and kindly manner. In 1828 he moved to Orange and bought a little place on Washington Street, East Orange. He lived there till 1833, when he bought the place where he ended his days. Soon after removing to Orange he began working for Benjamin Williams, in Tory Corner, which is now in West Orange. With the exception of a few short intervals, he has worked for the descendants of Benjamin Williams ever since, until 1881, when he gave up active work, and devoted himself to the care of his pretty little place. He had known five generations of the Williams family, and was always regarded by all that family with the greatest esteem and confidence. At the age of nineteen years Anthony joined the First Presbyterian Church of Orange, and from that time to the time of his death was an earnest, devoted and consistent Christian, and a man of exemplary character. He subsequently united with the Second Presbyterian or Brick Church, and when the First Reformed Church was organized, joined that. He was beloved and respected by all who knew him.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

MAJOR GENERAL GEORGE BRINTON MCCLELLAN.

THE subject of this brief sketch, who in due time, became the organizer and brave leader of the Federal armies in the internecine war of 1861-65, first saw the light of day, December 3, 1826, in the quiet and peaceful city founded by William Penn.

His father, a physician of eminence, was a native of Connecticut, into which "land of steady habits" and of sterling men, his ancestors had migrated from the mountains of Scotland, bringing with them the ancient Scottish love of liberty and of law, the just, tenacious nature of that hardy and heroic race which has bulwarked freedom and beaten back oppression on so many a hard-fought field, from the days of Bruce and Wallace, down to our own.

The great-grandfather of George Brinton, Samuel McClellan, commanded the first company of cavalry that joined the Continental Army, at Cambridge, and was credited to the State of Connecticut. He subsequently became a General in that army, and served with distinction throughout the war. He lived and died at Woodstock, Connecticut.

The father of George, having achieved by his ability and character, a high position as a physician, removed to Pennsylvania, and located in the midst of that galaxy of accomplished medical men by whom the name of Philadelphia, as the metropolis of physical science and the healing art in the New World was made illustrious throughout both hemispheres. It was the best reward of the life-long exertions of Dr. McClellan, that he was thereby enabled to bestow upon his children all the advantages of education which the country could afford; and at the early age of thirteen, George, was entered as a student of the Freshman Class of the University of Pennsylvania.

An inborn vocation, however, led him towards the life of an engineer and a soldier; and a cadet's warrant having been obtained for him, George Brinton McClellan, in 1842, was sent to the Military Academy at West Point.

At the Military Academy, young McClellan soon found himself thoroughly at home, distinguished himself in the exact studies to which he was called upon to apply his mind, and won the esteem of his superiors by his scholarly and soldierly bearing. He was graduated with the second honors of his class in 1846; assigned to duty with a company of the Engineers, and ordered before the close of the year into active service on the line of the Rio Grande River. Lieutenant McClellan reached his post just after the battle of Monterrey had been fought and won.

In 1847, he appeared for the first time on the stage of national affairs, as a soldier in the field, upholding the honor of the national flag. After a brief period of service, at once obscure and arduous, on the banks of the Rio Grande, he was ordered to Tampico in January 1847, to take part in the concentration of troops preparatory to the advance on the Capital of the Montezumas. Space will not permit our following Lieutenant McClellan in that arduous campaign, through which he passed, earning for himself that distinction which is ever a star in the crown of glory of a young officer—a brevet commission of promotion for gallant and meritorious services—he having received such, September 14th, 1847.

As Captain McClellan, he remained with the army in Mexico until the signing of the treaty of peace with that republic, and in June 1848, he returned to the United States, and was almost immediately ordered to the post at West Point, where, for three years, he remained in command of the Company of Sappers and Miners. In June, 1851, he was removed to Fort Delaware to superintend the construction of military works, at that post, and early in the next year, joined an expedition for the exploration of the then far off Red River, under Colonel Marcy, whose daughter subsequently became his wife.

From the Red River, he passed into Texas, upon the staff of General P. F. Smith, and until March, 1853, was occupied in the survey of the Texas coast. In the Spring of 1853, he was ordered to Washington Territory, where he remained till May, 1854, in charge of the western division of the survey for the northern route to the Pacific Ocean.

In March, 1855, he was promoted to a full Captaincy in the First Cavalry, and with Major Delafield and Major Mordecai, was ordered to proceed to Europe, there to study the operations of the great war then raging between the western allies and the Russian Empire.

The immediate fruit of his sojourn in Europe, was an elaborate and exhaustive report upon the constitution of the greater European armies, which was published by authority of Congress in the early part of the year 1857. After the publication of this report, in January 1857, Captain McClellan resigned his commission in the army, and went into civil life.

He was then appointed Chief Engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad, and upon the completion of that enterprise, was elected vice president of the company, which position he continued to fill, residing at Chicago, until August, 1860, when, having been chosen president of the Eastern Division of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, he removed to Cincinnati.

Upon the breaking out of the slaveholders' rebellion in 1861, Governor Dennison, of Ohio, in response to a call for troops, appointed George Brinton McClellan, Major General, to command the contingent of the State, being thirteen regiments of infantry. This commission was offered and accepted, April 23, 1861.

May 10, 1861, the general government assigned General McClellan to the command of the Department of Ohio, embracing the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, with his headquarters at Cincinnati. Four days after, he was commissioned a Major General in the regular army.

The war cloud had now burst forth in all its fury, and the few troops that had been called for, were distributed as best they could be under the then trying circumstances, and various officers were assigned to occupy different points, while the invasion of Western Virginia was committed to General McClellan, who was left to take care of himself, make his own plans, and pursue his own policy. This lease of liberty granted General McClellan at this time, resulted in the first victory for the Union arms, and the surrender of "John Pegram, Esquire, styling himself Colonel in the Provisional Army of the Confederate States," with six hundred men, at Rich Mountain, Va., July 11, 1861.

The reverses that were met with by the Union forces in the latter part of July of that year, were so great in contrast with the brilliant victory already achieved by General McClellan, that he at once became in the eyes of the government, the "Moses" that was to lead the Union armies into the promised land of peace. He was therefore summoned to report at Washington, where, on the 27th day of July, 1861, he assumed command of the troops in and around the Capital, consisting of about 50,000 infantry, 1000 cavalry, 650 artillerymen, with nine imperfect field batteries of thirty pieces.

Although these figures appeared to represent quite a respectably sized army, they only represented a heterogeneous mass of humanity, without organization or discipline, and to the task of moulding this mass of humanity into an efficient army, was General McClellan assigned.

His subsequent career as a commander in the field is far more likely to fix the public attention, than the story of the months he passed at Washington in the later summer and autumn of 1861, in bringing order out of confusion, system out of chaos, plans and a purpose out of incoherent passion. It was in those months that our Western, as well as our Eastern armies were planned and moulded into form. Fort Donelson and Vicksburg, Stone River and Chattanooga, as well as Fair Oaks, Malvern Hill and Antietam, were then preparing, and their victories made possible.

In November, 1861, General McClellan was placed in command of the armies of the Union, and at once addressed letters to his subordinates, Halleck, Buell, Sherman and Butler, commanding respectively the departments of Missouri and Ohio, and the expeditions of the South Atlantic and the Gulf. Had his instructions been carried out to the full extent of their meaning, no doubt the war would have ended much sooner than it did.

August 28, 1864, he was unanimously nominated at Chicago, Ill., by the National Convention, of the Democratic party, as its candidate for the office of President of the United States, and although unsuccessful at the election which occurred in the following November, yet was complimented by a very large and flattering vote of the States participating in that election. On the day of that contest he resigned his commission as Major General in the regular Army of the United States.

In 1865, he went to Europe, where he remained until the autumn of 1868, when he returned to the United States. He was then engaged in this country as a Civil Engineer and Railroad manager till the autumn of 1873, when he again visited Europe, where he remained two years, and returned again to the United States.

In 1877, he was elected Governor of the State of New Jersey, which position he filled with honor to himself and great credit to the State, for a term of four years.

In 1881, he was appointed one of the managers of the "National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers," which position he still honorably fills.

As a Civil Engineer, General McClellan has no superior in this or any other country, and in that profession he delights, and is still actively engaged. His home is on the summit of Orange, or First Mountain overlooking the Oranges, Newark, and all other portions of Essex county, and nearly all of Bergen, Hudson, Middlesex, and Union Counties, Staten Island, New York City and Bay, Brooklyn City and Bridge, and portions of Long Island.

IRA HARRISON.

Richard Harrison, the earliest representative of the family in America, came from Cheshire, England, and settled in Connecticut about the year 1640, from whence he and his family removed to Newark, N. J., with the colony which settled there in 1666.

His grandson, Samuel Harrison, who was the great-grandfather of the subject of this biography, located near Newark Mountain (now West Orange). His sons were Amos, Samuel and Matthew. The children of Matthew were Abijah, Aaron, Amos, Adonijah, Polly and Matthew.

The birth of Aaron, son of Matthew, occurred in 1753, in West Orange, where he followed the employment of a farmer. He married Phebe Crane, whose mother was a cousin of the Rev. Aaron Burr, and had the following children: Samuel, Jemima, Charles, Matilda, Phebe, Abigail, Ira and Aaron Burr, of whom Ira is the only survivor. He was born on the 4th of January, 1795, on the ancestral land in West Orange, where his early years were passed. A thorough education not having been regarded as prerequisite to successful farming, he was, at the age of eleven years, instructed in the skillful use of the plow, and meanwhile attended the neighboring country school. At the age of twenty-six he married Mary, daughter of Ichabod Jones, of East Orange, and had the following children: Aaron (deceased), Rhoda A., Samuel (deceased), Matilda, John, Phebe C. (Mrs. Josiah B. Williams), Alfred J., William L., Mary E. (Mrs. Ambrose M. Matthews), Frederic I. (deceased). Mr. Harrison, at the age of twenty-six, acquired the farm upon which he still resides and where, during his long and active life, he has pursued the healthful avocations of a farmer. As a Whig, and later as a Republican, he has been more or less active in local political issues, and served as treasurer and in minor township offices. He was largely instrumental in introducing the excellent system of roads which is now the pride of Orange and its suburbs. He is a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Orange, where he fills the office of elder, and has been for years a trustee. Mr. Harrison, in his ninetieth year, still enjoys exceptional vigor of body and mind.

CHAPTER LXV.

EAST ORANGE TOWNSHIP.

Titus township, which during recent years has become the seat of a population inversely proportionate to its small area, had no separate or individual existence until 1863. Prior to that time it was a portion of Orange township after its erection, in 1806, and anterior to that date a fraction of the great original township of Newark.

East Orange contains only about two thousand four hundred acres, or less than four square miles of land, and yet its population is undoubtedly upwards of ten thousand, and through nearly the whole of its extent it presents the appearance of a village or suburban city, which, in fact, it is.

Few regions of our country have within half or a quarter of a century exhibited such complete changes in social and material aspects as the territory embraced within the limits of East Orange. Prior to the building of the railroad the beautiful, undulating country, now traversed in all directions by finely macadamized roads, so thickly settled as to almost possess the character of a city, and displaying everywhere tasteful and even palatial homes, with all the adornments of art; was a pastoral spot, sparsely settled,—an expanse of field and orchard and woodland,—dotted here and there by the quiet and quaint homes of the early settlers.

During the past fifteen years the influx of population has been particularly swift and strong. Men of business in the large cities near, and persons seeking health or quiet, have here found the most favorable combination of conditions that they could desire for rural homes. Climate, sanitary advantages, beauty, well-ordered society, churches, schools, easy accessibility from the great towns are all realized here, and recognized each year by an increased number of those who, at least during a portion of their time, would be "far from the madding crowd."

The Region in the Past.—Of the early history of this township, the greater part which is ascertainable has already been given in the general chapters upon the Oranges, but we may allude to a few matters and people of the past before considering the institutions of the present. In this connection it is interesting to note that the territory which forms our subject was a portion, and a comparatively small one, of a purchase made March 13, 1677, from the Winacksoop and Shenacktos Indians, the reputed owners of the great mountain Watchung, for "two guns, three coats and thirteen cans of rum." Surely the red man's title was easily extinguished.

Prior to the middle of the last century the settlement on the river began to spread itself in this direction. The inviting plain between the Passaic and the mountain could not long remain an uncultivated wilderness with a race of hardy yeomanry growing up on its border. Titles to "wood lots" which had been set off to residents of Newark began to be transferred, clearings made and homes established. At this late day it is impossible to give facts concerning all of the original owners of land, but we shall presently produce items of interest about some of them. First, however, we shall endeavor to give an idea of the region as it appeared sixty years ago to the then young eyes of one who is now old.

Aspect of the Region in its Pastoral Days.—The streets of the present village and thickly populated region environing it, were only country roads sixty years ago. They were roads broken usually only to the width of a pair of wheels, with green grass and bushes and logs along the sides, and often were unfenced. What is now North Grove Street was then Whiskey Lane, the present South Munn Avenue was simply Munn Lane, and North Arlington Avenue bore the less aristocratic appellation of Pluck Street, later Cherry Street. Prospect Street in those days was called Doddtown road, Washington Street was designated as the Tory Corner road, and South Harrison Street was Harrison Lane. These were the only means of communication running north and south. Main Street was the Orange road, and was the only one running east and west between the South Orange Road and the Bloomfield turnpike.

The original settlers on the Orange road or Main Street between the present east and west limits of the township were, upon the south side, commencing at the east line, the ancestral acres of the Pecks, first owned by Joseph Peck, who owned land up to a point opposite the present Thompson Street; Benjamin Mann, who owned the adjoining tract, extending to Burnett Street; Abijah Hedden, who owned from the Mann lands to Halsted Street; and the Harrisons, Daniel and Jonathan, who were the proprietors of all the rich acres from Heddens to the township line.

On the north side, commencing at the east line, there was a large wood tract owned by the Wards, of Newark. This property, which extended up to Grove Street, afterwards came into possession of the Pecks and Heddens. Cyrus Jones owned from this tract up to Mulford Street. A man by the name of Canfield owned the property between the limits now marked by Jones and Prospect Streets, and kept a tavern upon it. Henry Baldwin lived about where the corner of Washington and William Streets now is.

In those days—sixty years ago—there were a few hatters and shoemakers in the community, and several persons who followed other occupations, as, for instance, the tavern-keeper, already mentioned; but the sparse population was made up principally of farmers.

Old Families.—The tract of land which has been mentioned as belonging to the Pecks was in the possession of Joseph Peck in 1694. He built a stone house near what is now the southeast corner of Maple Avenue and Main Street, and lived there until his death, in 1746. His son married Jenima Lindsley, and lived upon the homestead until his death, in 1772. He was the father of David and grandfather of James, from whom descended directly the Orange Pecks of to-day. James' children were William, a farmer, born in 1790, died 1849; Aaron, father of Cyrus, who lives at Roseville; and Phebe, who married Samuel Condit.

William's children were Phebe, wife of John M. Crowell, of Newark; Margaret, wife of Alfred Jones, a resident of this township; Ira, a farmer in the township; James, who lives upon a part of the homestead farm, long a prominent man in the community, now president of the County Road Board; and Harriet, wife of E. O. Doremus, another influential citizen.

Just before the Revolution, Matthias Dodd, a millwright by trade and born on Centre Street, Orange, bought about fifty acres of woodland east of what is now Grove Street, between the lines of William Street and Prospect Street, and built thereon a carpenter-shop, where the house of his grandson, Matthias M., now stands. Here he worked as a carpenter, and made wooden plows. He presently, however, gave up this peaceful avocation, and, exchanging the plowshare for the sword, became a soldier in the war of the Revolution. He was drowned in New York Bay in the prime of life. His son Lewis, born in 1784 in the Grove Street house, learned the trade of a shoemaker, and when twenty-four years of age, with five or six apprentices, began making shoes in the same shop where his father had fashioned wooden mould boards. In 1838 he went into partnership with his son Matthias in the dairy business, and also carried on general farming. Of the children of Lewis Dodd, Rachael is the wife of John Dunham, of Newark; Jane is the wife of F. Crans, of Grove Street; Matthias M., occupying a part of the old homestead, is a wealthy and prominent citizen of the township; Lydia is the wife of David C. Runyon, of Newark; Sarah is the wife of C. S. Osborne, of Newark; Bethuel is a physician; and Julia is the wife of Ed. A. Wallace, of Grove Street.

Abigail Hedden was another of the early settlers, and his son, Samuel S., was long prominent in the affairs of the community. Viner J., George W., and Albert E., sons of the latter, and Mrs. James Peck and Mrs. Nelson J. Baldwin, daughters, are residents of the township.

The homestead of the Jones family occupied the spot on which stands the residence of Dr. Duffield, corner of Main Street and Mann Avenue. Samuel C. Jones, secretary of the Newark Lime and Cement Company, a man who has long ranked among the most public-spirited citizens of the community, as well as his father, Viner Van Zant Jones, and his grandfather Cyrus Jones, were born at this place.

Adonijah Osmun and Peter Campbell, both shoemakers and elders in the Brick Church at the time of its inception, will be pleasantly remembered by the older residents. The latter died in 1852, aged fifty-six years. The names of both appear in the list of elders of the First Presbyterian Church, Mr. Osmun's in 1814 and Mr. Campbell's in 1820.

Other early residents were Abram R. Marsh and Levi Lathrop and Edward Ball, whose daughter Lydia married into the Peck family.

In 1829, Peter C. Doremus, a native of Morris County, located near the present corner of Main and Harrison Streets, and the following year selling that property, bought ten acres of ground near Prospect and Carlton Streets. He lived there until 1850, when he purchased what is now known as the Candler property, on Harrison Street, from which he moved to William Street, where he built the house in which he died in 1869, and in which his widow still lives. His son, Elias O. Doremus, is well known through his connection with the American Insurance Company of Newark, his long connection with the Board of Freeholders, his membership of the Legislature and his many public-spirited acts.

Lewis Mitchell, now deceased, was for many years a respected citizen of East Orange. Two sons, Aaron P. and George, are now among its most worthy and enterprising people.

Among gentlemen who have more recently identified themselves with East Orange, but who have been prominent in the promotion of its best interests, there should be named John M. Randall, Frederick M. Shepard, George W. Blackwell, George D. Woodruff, David Bingham, James W. Towne, Charles M. Decker, Edward Mecker and Gardiner R. Colby.

Municipal Organization and List of Civil Officers.—East Orange was organized as a separate township by an act of the Legislature passed March 4, 1863, the first section of which prescribed the boundaries, as follows, viz.:

"Beginning at a point on a line between the town of Orange and the township of South Orange, where the centre of Centre Street, in said town of Orange, would intersect said line, thence in a northerly or northeasterly direction to a point on the north side of Main Street, in the said town of Orange, where the line between the lands of Caleb G. Harrison and Nathan W. Pierson, near the corner of Baldwin and said Main Street, would intersect the north side of said Main Street; thence in a northerly or northeasterly direction to a large oak tree on the lands of and near the residence of William Patterson; thence in a northerly or northwesterly direction to a point on the east side of Park Street, in said town of Orange, where the angle in said street, near the residence of Aaron Williams would intersect said point, thence on in the direction of the last-mentioned line to the west side of said Park Street, thence in a northerly or northeasterly direction to a point in the centre of the bridge over the Neshanic Brook, where the south side of Dodd Street or the street running from David Riker's store to the Orange Cemetery would intersect said point, thence in a northerly or northeasterly direction to a point in the centre of the north side of the bridge near the residence of Henry Stucky, and thence in the line of the last-mentioned line to the line between the town of Orange and the township of Bloomfield; thence along the line between the said town of Orange and the said township of Bloomfield to the line between the town of Orange and the city of Newark; thence along the line between the said town of Orange and the said city of Newark to the line between the town of Orange and the township of South Orange; thence along the line between the said town of Orange and the said township of South Orange to the place of beginning."

The first election was held on the second Monday of April, 1863, at the house of Stephen W. Tichenor, Aaron B. Harrison serving as judge and Charles Crane as clerk.

Post-Offices.—There are four post-offices within the limits of the township, which were established as follows: East Orange, during the winter of 1873-74;

¹ Mr. Mann has been continually in the office since he was elected in the spring of 1884 for five years.

² Knight, of the township committee, committed suicide during this year, and John L. Roberts was elected to fill vacancy.

Watsossing, in 1880; Brick Church, in May, 1882, and Gravestend, in October, 1883. Isaac N. Beach was the first postmaster at the East Orange office, and held the position until February, 1875, when S. M. Long who stills retains the place, was appointed to it.

Water-Works.—The township of East Orange is supplied with water by the Orange Water Company under a contract made in 1881, for a term of ten years, with the privilege on the part of the township of renewing the same. The act of the Legislature incorporating the Orange Water Company was passed in 1865, and was intended to be used for the city of Orange, but the charter remained unused until December, 1880, when books for subscription to the capital stock were opened, and a controlling interest in the capital of the company was taken by some citizens of East Orange, who proceeded to effect an organization and still continue to manage it. The city of Orange subsequently undertook the erection of water-works at the expense of that city, so that the corporation bearing the name of the Orange Water Company has now no connection whatever with the city of Orange. The authorized capital of the water company is three hundred thousand dollars. The directors are Frederick M. Shepard, John M. Randall, Joseph A. Minott, John T. Rockwell, Joseph L. Munn, William Pierson, M. D., and Vernon L. Davey; and the officers are Frederick M. Shepard, president; John M. Randall, vice-president; Frederick M. Shepard, Jr., secretary; Joseph A. Minott-treasurer; and Joseph L. Munn, counsel. The superintendent is George P. Olcott, C. E., and the engineers are John W. Chase and George Chase.

The company in 1883 took a contract to supply the township of Bloomfield with water, and has nearly twenty-five miles of water-mains in the East Orange and Bloomfield divisions of its works, upon which two hundred and twenty-five hydrants are located, and now, at the close of the year 1884, has five hundred private consumers.

The pumping station is located at the line between the townships of East Orange and Bloomfield, and near the western boundary of the city of Newark. In this locality the company acquired by purchase and by condemnation about seventy-five acres of land, partly covered by forest trees, and containing a number of springs of water of great abundance and pure quality. These springs have been noted from the earliest history of Essex County, one of them, known as "the great boiling spring," being conspicuous as marking the point where the town of Newark and the townships of Orange, Bloomfield and Belleville came together.

In developing these springs the water company has constructed a series of so-called wells, the largest of which is fifty feet in diameter and is excavated to the depth of about fifteen feet below the surface of the ground, nine feet of which depth is blasted out of the red sandstone rock. The great flow of water made it practically impossible to excavate to a greater depth, and when the well was inclosed in impervious walls of masonry, it was found that the water rose to a height of two feet above the level of the surrounding ground and flowed over. The water has been subjected to chemical analysis, and is found to be entirely free from all organic impurities.

Distribution through the mains is made by direct pumping, with pressure sufficient to force a stream through hose connected with any hydrant in either East Orange or Bloomfield over any building in these towns; indeed, it has been shown by actual experiment that five streams can be simultaneously thrown upon the roof of the highest building.

Religious—FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—As near as can be ascertained, a Sabbath-school was established in the neighborhood of the present location of this church in 1824. The sessions of the school were held at the dwellings of those favorable to the object, and at that time nearly every householder was of one mind relative to religious matters, and thus continued for several years, when, in 1830, the Eastern school-house (as it is known) was built, and the Sunday-school services transferred to that. The old school-house stood on Main Street, just below what is now Munn Avenue. None of the pioneer records, if there were any, are now in existence to give us a clue to the proceedings of those pioneer assemblies.

Probably there was no election of officers in those early days, and the management of the school was quite informal. Among the pioneer managers or superintendents was Abram R. Marsh, Levi Lathrop, Aaron Peck and Ira Canfield. These each in their turn were prominently identified with the affairs of the pioneer Sunday-school. When the school was transferred to the school-house it was under the care of Henry Ball. Four years later Henry Pierson became superintendent, and remained in charge of the school till 1850, when he was succeeded by Samuel E. Jones. Mr. Jones continued in office until the organization of the church. Meanwhile a weekly prayer-meeting had been established, which, in connection with the school became the nucleus around which a church was gathered, and fully organized June 24, 1863, with a membership of fifty-seven. During that year a church edifice was erected on the site occupied by the present brown stone church, of Gothic architecture, built in 1876. On the same lot is a neat and commodious parsonage fronting on Munn Avenue, the whole constituting a complete parish centre, leaving nothing of a material nature to be desired. The value of the church property is estimated at fifty thousand dollars. In December, 1884, the communicants numbered four hundred, and the Sunday-school had upon its rolls the names of three hundred and thirty-five pupils.

The pastors of this church have been Rev. F. L. Kenyon, for two years, from August, 1864; Rev. C. A.

Smith, D.D., five years, from April, 1867; Rev. J. L. Danner, six years and four months, from December, 1872; Rev. Simon J. McPherson, from Sept. 24, 1879, to November, 1882. Rev. J. H. Whitehead, the present pastor, was installed July 1, 1884.

ELMWOOD CHAPEL is a mission of the First Presbyterian Church of Orange. It was dedicated Feb. 22, 1874, and built to meet the needs of the surrounding community, for a place to hold a Sunday-school and weekly prayer-meeting. During eight years it was used for this purpose, with the exception of occasional preaching services. The work was carried on entirely by the pastor and members of the parent church. To meet the needs of the growing Sunday-school the building was twice enlarged, in 1879 and 1881, and now has seating capacity of three hundred.

Since May 1, 1882, Rev. George S. Webster, assistant pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, has had entire charge of the chapel services.

THE SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (BRICK CHURCH).—At a meeting held upon the 20th day of March, 1830, a numerous and respectable portion of the inhabitants of the Eastern part of Orange assembled at the White school-house to take into consideration the building of a Second Presbyterian Church.

After considerable discussion, it was upon motion unanimously resolved, "that the time had arrived when it is expedient to erect a Second Presbyterian Church in Orange, and that we proceed to build without delay." The movement in its origin was shared in by nearly all of the inhabitants of this part of the town, whether church members or not. The society was formed, trustees elected, and the building nearly completed before the church was organized at all. The formal organization of the church took place April 26, 1831. At this meeting ninety-eight persons were present with regular letters of dismission from other churches, all but one being from the First Church. The first trustees were William Williams, Peter Campbell, Samuel Condit, Allen Dodd, Caleb Baldwin, Lewis Dodd and Adonijah Osmin, all elected April 20, 1830. A building committee, consisting of Aaron Peck, Dr. William Pierson, Andrew W. Condit, Samuel M. Dodd and Lewis Williams, Jr., was appointed at the same meeting. An election for pastor was held the same evening, and the lot fell unanimously upon Rev. George Pierson, who was born and raised in the midst of the community. He served the church with great acceptance from April, 1831, to February, 1835. Rev. Henry Axtell was installed as pastor May 7, 1835. His pastorate continued a little less than two years. During his ministry the parish house, which has since been the dwelling-place of all ministers of the parish, located on the corner of William and Hilyer Streets, was built. Rev. Joseph S. Gallagher became pastor of the church Oct. 12, 1837, where he labored in the midst of many trials and perplexities, but with more than average success, until April 16, 1850. Aug. 21, 1850, Rev. John Crowell was installed, and his pastorate extended to May, 1866. Rev. James H. Taylor commenced labors as pastor on the 20th of the following October, and remained until April, 1868. Rev. Henry F. Hickok, the present pastor, was installed, April, 1869, and resigned the charge, owing to ill health, in October, 1872. In December of the same year Rev. George S. Bishop became pastor. Mr. Bishop (now Dr. Bishop) resigned the pastorate in April, 1875, and became the minister of the First Reformed Dutch Church. In May following Mr. Hickok was re-called. In the summer of 1878 the church edifice was entirely remodeled and put in its present shape, at an expense of eighteen thousand dollars. The present membership is three hundred and fifty. During the half-century of its existence there have been placed upon its roll about fourteen hundred names.

BETHEL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—This church originated from an Union Sabbath-school which was held for many years prior to 1866 in the old school-house on Dodd Street. At that time a chapel was erected on the property of Reuben Dodd, and the Sabbath-school was afterward held in that building. There was occasional preaching, but no regular church organization until 1868, when a Congregational mission was started. This was afterward changed into a Presbyterian organization, and the church property transferred to that body. Bethel Presbyterian Church was organized Nov. 13, 1870. Rev. James H. Marr became the pastor, and on the following Sabbath Charles M. Davis was installed as elder. At organization the church consisted of twenty-seven members. During Mr. Marr's pastorate the membership greatly increased, the church building was enlarged and the church became self-sustaining. He ceased his labors Jan. 15, 1882, and on the 2d of the following May, Rev. David O. Irving, the present pastor, was ordained and installed. The church has a membership of one hundred and forty-five, a Sabbath-school of one hundred and eighty, is free from debt, and raised last year for congregational expenses fourteen hundred and thirty-six dollars.

FIRST REFORMED (DUTCH) CHURCH.—The First Reformed (Dutch) Church of Orange was organized by the Reverend the Classis of Newark, May 12, 1875, at which time it included 135 communicants. Since then 375 have been received,—297 on confession, and 68 by letter. The church has now 372 communicants, including a consistory of 16 members. The Rev. George S. Bishop, D.D., has been the only pastor. The Sunday-school at the date of its organization numbered 5 officers, 17 teachers, and 120 scholars. It now numbers 7 officers, 34 teachers, and 300 scholars,—a total of 349. David Bingham, Esq., has been the only superintendent.

The church edifice is in a central and commanding position upon Main Street, corner of Halstead, is of brown freestone, finished in dark colors, with crimson cushions and carpets. It is a gem of architectural beauty, built in the form of a cross, with a spire at one of the re-entrant angles. The cost of the whole was a little over thirty thousand dollars, which has been paid by spontaneous contribution.

The church is absolutely free. Each person, on entering the door, is expected to take the first seat he finds vacant. All are welcome, and all soon find themselves at home. The financial principles to which they have strictly adhered are the following: 1. That the members of the church support it. 2. That the consistory spend only such amounts as have been previously contributed. 3. That each member contribute something on each Lord's day, "as the Lord hath prospered him."

The pastor refuses to receive a stipulated salary. The gospel is supported by the promptings of a Christian gratitude and conscience, and the receipts have constantly been in advance of all expenditures. In government the church is wholly unsecular, having no connection whatever with the State. The spiritual interests are under the control of elders, and the temporal interests under that of deacons, subject to confirmation by the united consistory, of which the pastor is president. In doctrine the church is old school Calvinistic, being based on the following points:

1. The absolute depravity and utter spiritual death of fallen man.
2. God the Father's sovereign choice of a select people called the church, and His giving them to Jesus Christ His Son before the world began.
3. Christ dying for the church, and in the highest sense for her exclusively.
4. The mission of the Holy Ghost to call, regenerate and sanctify that church invisible.
5. The indwelling of the Holy Ghost in all believers, and their final and infallible preservation to glory.

The growth of the church upon the above principles, says the pastor, has been altogether unprecedented.

GROVE STREET CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—At a meeting of a few brethren of the neighborhood, at the house of Aaron P. Mitchell, early in the summer of 1866, it was decided to proceed to the formation of a religious society and the erection of a house of worship, to be followed by the organization of an Evangelical Congregational Church. A site for a chapel was soon secured, and with it adjoining lots for the erection of a main church edifice, when the growth of the church should require it. About Aug. 1, 1866, the society was organized, and the erection of the chapel was prosecuted with energy. The first trustees were Matthias M. Dodd, Aaron P. Mitchell, S. M. Runyon, J. E. Hodden, and Nathan Waterman.

Early in the winter of 1867 the present beautiful stone edifice was finished, at a cost, including furnishing, of fifteen thousand dollars. It was dedicated Dec. 18, 1867. On Jan. 3, 1868, the organization of the church was completed, with thirty-two members, and the following officers were elected: Deacons, Matthias M. Dodd and Robert D. Weeks; Prudential Committee, George L. Mitchell, Robert D. Weeks, and George Riker. On Oct. 14, 1868, Allen McLane became pastor. He was dismissed in May, 1874. In December, 1875, Rev. Rowland B. Howard was chosen acting pastor. He served five years, and was succeeded by Rev. Frederick B. Pullan, the present pastor.

In the spring of 1871 an addition to the chapel was completed, at a cost of about five thousand dollars.

TRINITY CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—An informal meeting of members of the Evangelical Churches resident in Orange and East Orange was held Jan. 19, 1870, at the house of Rev. Frederick A. Adams, to consider the question of forming a Congregational Church in the vicinity of the Brick Church Station. At this meeting it was decided "That the cause of religion will be advanced by the formation of a Congregational Church in this neighborhood; that the members of this meeting resolve to form such a church." The first public services were held in Lyric Hall, March 6th, the Rev. Dr. George E. Adams officiating.

The church was organized April 5, 1870, with recognition of twenty-five members, on letters of dismission from other churches, of whom twenty-one were from the Second Presbyterian Church. Rev. Dr. George E. Adams accepted a call July 11, 1870, to serve in an acting pastorate. He resigned Dec. 13, 1874, because of impaired health, and was succeeded by Rev. Richard G. Greene, the present pastor, who began an acting pastorate March 1, 1875. The chapel, on Harrison Street, was dedicated May 22, 1872. The present membership of the church is one hundred and twenty. The deacons are Frederick A. Adams, Jacob L. Halsey, Richard A. Thorp, John Wiley, Isaiah C. Howes, Richard A. Thorp is clerk and Isaiah C. Howes superintendent of Sunday-school.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH.—This church was organized June 14, 1837, and is now the oldest Baptist Church in Orange. The original members, fourteen in number, were John Hatt and wife Ann (in whose house on Grove Street, then Whiskey Lane, the first meetings were held), Joel and Rachel Hatt, George and Charlotte Haws, John Thatcher, Samuel and Sarah Self, John Lloyd and Eliza Lloyd, Michael Smithers and Ann Smithers and William Hatt.

Rev. Daniel Dodge, D.D., of Newark, was moderator on the occasion of the organization, and Rev. John Dowling, of New York, clerk.

A Sunday-school was organized Oct. 18, 1840, at Mr. John Hatt's house, Mr. William Peloulet being superintendent.

The corner-stone of the church edifice was laid Aug. 1, 1843, by Rev. Josiah Hatt. The lecture-room of the building was first occupied on New Year's day, 1841, and the finished house of worship was dedicated Oct. 20, 1858, the Rev. Henry C. Fish, D.D., of Newark, preaching from "When I behold Thy Heavens;" Dr. Dowling preached upon the thoughts suggested by "Weeping may endure for a moment," and Revs. George Hatt, J. B. Morse, D. T. Morrell, William Hind and the pastor, Rev. W. D. Hedden, assisted in the services.

The first pastor of this church, in 1840, was Elder John Betham. His services closed in June, 1841. Rev. Josiah Hatt, son of the founder of the church, became pastor in January, 1843, and was succeeded by Rev. Isaac M. Church, on April 16, 1845. He resigned in May, 1848, and on January 3d of the following year the church came under the charge of Rev. James McLeod. He was followed by Rev. Edward T. Hunt, who was ordained and made pastor Dec. 25, 1851. He resigned in October, 1852, and the church was then without a regular pastor until May 8, 1855, when Rev. William Hedden, D.D., assumed that relation. He served until February, 1882, when he was succeeded by the present pastor, Rev. W. F. Taylor. The church has a membership of one hundred and eighty-five.

CALVARY METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—The necessity of a second Methodist Church in Orange appeared in 1868, when Dr. R. L. Dashiell was pastor of the First Church, but no active measures were taken until the fall of 1869. At that time N. B. Taylor, Albert Mann, George J. Ferry, John Marshall and A. S. Townsend were constituted a board of trustees for the contemplated enterprise, a site for building was secured and the erection of the chapel began. It is a brick structure, with brown stone trimmings, and was dedicated June 12, 1870. There were thirty-seven original members. The following were the members of the first official board of trustees: N. B. Taylor, Albert Mann, George J. Ferry, A. S. Townsend and John Marshall. The members of the new church had the filliest sympathy of the parent society in their separation. The first pastor, Rev. Charles S. Ryman, commenced duties April 1, 1870. He was followed, in the spring of 1872, by Rev. J. B. Faulks, who was in turn succeeded, in the spring of 1875, by D. W. Bartine, D. D. Rev. J. B. Faulks again became pastor in 1878 and officiated three years. Then Rev. M. D. Church performed the pastoral duties of the charge until succeeded by Rev. Charles E. Little, the present pastor, in April, 1884. The church has at present one hundred and eighty-two members and the Sunday-school about two hundred scholars. A large plot of ground, on the corner of Walnut and Main Streets, has been recently purchased for thirteen thousand dollars, upon which a new house of worship will be erected.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH (EPISCOPAL).—A cottage service was started here April 18, 1869, by Rev. William H. Carter, D.D., in the residence of Isaac B. Griffin. This service was continued regularly until the erection of a chapel in Myrtle Street, which was opened for service by Dr. Carter Jan. 30, 1870. In the spring of 1875 the lot upon which this chapel stood was sold, the present site was purchased, the chapel removed to it and considerably enlarged and improved. This chapel remained a part of the parochial work of Christ Church, Bloomfield, until Eastertide, 1876, when the congregation decided to sever all connection with the Bloomfield parish, and take position as an independent mission. The parochial organization was effected Nov. 17, 1876. Nov. 22, 1876, the new parish was admitted into union with the Diocesan Convention under its present name. May 14, 1876, Rev. W. W. Wilson took charge of the chapel and remained until June, 1880. The following October Rev. Daniel I. Edwards became rector, and remained in active service until he was stricken with paralysis, in January, 1883. In August, 1883, his son, Rev. George H. Edwards, was called as assistant, and has been in active discharge of the duties of the parish since. There are at present one hundred and fifteen communicants.

CHRIST CHURCH (PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL).—This church was organized in 1869, and has been ministered to from that time to the present by Rev. H. S. Bishop. The house of worship was built the same year that the society was organized, and has been enlarged several times since.

OUR LADY HELP OF CHRISTIANS CHURCH (CATHOLIC).—For the erection of this church Rev. M. P. O'Connor began receiving subscriptions in June, 1882, and with such success that the corner-stone was laid on the 20th of the following August. Father O'Connor was succeeded as priest, in November, 1883, by Rev. P. McCarthy.

Educational.—The township of East Orange is divided into three school districts, the boundaries of which were described in section 6 of the act of the State Legislature erecting the township. Said section reads as follows:

"6. And be it enacted, That the territory in the township of East Orange shall be comprised and divided into three school districts, as follows: all the territory lying east of the center of Cherry Street, from the Bloomfield line to the Main Street, and on from the said point on Main Street to the east side of the town farm on the south Orange line, shall be the Eastern school district, all the territory lying north of a line drawn from the junction of Cherry Street and the Bloomfield line to the junction of Park and Washington Streets, and on through the center of Park Street to the line between the town of Orange and the township of East Orange, shall be the Franklin school district, all the remaining territory in said town shall be the Ashland school district, and the said districts shall hold elections for school trustees in their respective school districts, according to the provisions of the general school law, on the first Monday in April, at the usual hour."

These three districts correspond very nearly with the school districts organized under the old school law, and, indeed, with the neighborhood organizations that existed before any systematic organization was effected. An act passed by the Legislature of New Jersey, Nov. 27, 1794, and entitled "An Act to Incorporate Societies for the Promotion of Learning," furnished the occasion and provided the means for the organization of the first schools of a public character.

Three school houses were built within the bounds of what is now East Orange township,—one, called the Eastern School-house, in the district still bearing that name; another, called the White School-house, located at Brick Church, in what is now Ashland District; and another, known as Doddtown School-house, in what is now Franklin School District.

The following sketch of the Eastern District can be truthfully applied to the other two, except that portion relative to the building of present school-houses. The original book of minutes relating to the Eastern District shows that the money to buy the lot and build the school-house was raised by a large number of small subscriptions, the subscribers becoming stockholders. In addition to the names of all the old families living in the vicinity, this venerable subscription list shows also the names of several eminent citizens of Newark,—Frelinghuysen, Pennington, Whitehead and others. The government was vested in a board of seven trustees, chosen at the annual meeting of stockholders. The trustees held title to property and managed all affairs of the school. These schools were, of course, small, each engaging but a single teacher, but served an excellent purpose. They gave way, in time, to the school districts, which were organized under the general free-school law. Their places are now occupied by modern brick structures, the Ashland District having two. The Eastern School building is of brick, three stories, was built in 1870, cost, with lot and furniture, forty-six thousand dollars. They are all provided with the most modern appliances for the training and comfort of pupils.

The Ashland District has two school buildings, viz.: Ashland and South Ashland Schools, under the care of one principal. The first-named school is located on Mulberry Street, with the following teachers: Gertrude F. Adams, preceptress and teacher of Latin and literature; Mary M. Gile, teacher of higher mathematics; Grace E. Coan, teacher of history and algebra; Clara M. Whitaker, teacher of natural and physical sciences; Katherine E. Day, teacher of fourth grade; Mary L. Fenby, teacher of fifth grade; Amelia G. Beers, teacher of sixth grade; Helen D. Meeker, teacher of seventh grade; Emma L. Coday, teacher of eighth grade; Sadie E. Hall, teacher of ninth grade; Gertrude Greenwault, teacher of tenth grade; A. Huldah Palmer, teacher of kindergarten; Theodore F. Seward, teacher of vocal music; H. E. Twining, teacher of penmanship and drawing; Emma S. Condit, teacher of elocution and gymnastics. Adam Robinson, janitor.

The South Ashland School building is located on Clinton Street, with the following teachers: Mary R. Plaisted, preceptress and teacher of Grammar Department; Ida Roos, teacher of Primary Department; Theodore F. Seward, teacher of vocal music; H. E. Twining, teacher of penmanship and drawing.

The school buildings are both of brick, the Ashland built in 1871 and valued at fifty thousand dollars, and the South Ashland at six thousand dollars. The number of pupils enrolled at the former for 1884 was five hundred and sixty-nine, and at the latter was ninety. Trustees, Edward Meeker (term expires March, 1885), Woolsey R. Hopkins, district clerk (term expires March, 1886), Joseph P. Thompson (term expires March, 1887).

The principal of these schools is E. R. Pennoyer, A.M., who has held that position since 1869.

The Franklin District has a large and commodious brick school building, located on Dodd Street, between Midland and Glenwood Avenues, and was built in 1873, and now valued at \$22,000. The total enrollment of pupils for 1883 was 325, with an average attendance of 177, $\frac{55}{100}$. Principal, Charles I. Webster, High-School Department; Assistants, Miss Virginia E. Hooper, Grammar Department; Miss Emilie L. Foss, First Intermediate Department; Miss Lillian Bushnell, Second Intermediate Department; Miss Ida A. Eaton, Primary Department.

This school now has four departments,—a High-School or supplementary class, a Grammar Department, First and Second Intermediate Department, and Primary Department.

The trustees of the district for 1884 were Lucius Med-Adam (district clerk), George Sutphen, Van Zant Dodd.

Eastern Public School, School District No. 36, for 1884 reported as follows: Vernon L. Davey, A.B., principal, has been in the service of this district since 1877. Teachers:—Higher Department, Miss G. Stevenson, Miss M. E. Humphreys (elocution and gymnastics), Miss E. W. Peck; Grammar Department, Miss J. Cutler, Miss E. Stockton, Miss N. M. Arnold; Primary Department, Miss M. L. Petersen, Miss C. Welsh, Miss L. Wallace, Miss M. Hetzel, Miss M. D. Baldwin. Vocal music, Theodore F. Seward.

The enrollment of pupils for 1884 was five hundred and five, with an average attendance of four hundred and eighteen.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

JOSIAH F. DODD.

Daniel Dodd, the progenitor of the family in America, settled soon after his emigration, in 1646, in Branford, Conn. Daniel Dodd, Jr., prior to the year 1671, became a resident of Newark, N. J., where he wielded considerable influence as a leading citizen and an extensive land-owner. In the line of descent was David, the grandfather of the subject of this biographical sketch, who was born in 1733 and died in 1817. He married Sarah, daughter of Joseph Harrison, and became the father of David, Jr., whose birth occurred in 1773, upon the ancestral property, in East Orange township, now owned by his son, Josiah F. Dodd, which was his home during his lifetime. He married Lydia, daughter of Samuel L. Ward, of Bloomfield, N. J., and had children, Joseph C., Eliza W., Mary Ann, Ellen M., Reuben W., Margaret E., and Josiah F. The death of Mr. Dodd occurred at his home in East Orange in 1859. His son, Josiah F., was born on the 19th of February, 1818, on the homestead which, in the direct line of inheritance, is now his property, having been in the family for successive generations. He received such educational advantages as the neighboring schools afforded, and early decided to render himself independent of the vicissitudes of a changing fortune by becoming master of a trade. He chose that of a carriage-builder, and removed to Newark for the purpose of completing his apprenticeship. At the expiration of this period circumstances influenced Mr. Dodd's return to his home, where he became interested in the cultivation of the land embraced in the family estate. That portion on which the homestead stands became his by inheritance, and is his present residence. In 1861 he partially abandoned the quiet pursuits of the agriculturist, and became engaged in business in Newark as a manufacturer of prussiate of potash, which has since absorbed much of his time and attention. Mr. Dodd was married, on the 24th of November, 1842, to Sarah Maria, daughter of Elijah Ward, of Morristown, N. J. Their children are Matilda W., (Mrs. John Brower, of New York), Mary Eliza and Julia Frances, the last two being deceased. Mrs. Dodd's death occurred in May, 1851, and he was again married, Aug. 16, 1862, to Eleanor, daughter of Ellis Carhuff, of Pennsylvania. Their children are Sarah E., Virginia W., Jenny and Joseph A., (deceased), and Mary E., the only survivor, wife of J. Ward Grummon, of Bloomfield. Mr. Dodd is in politics a Republican, and while interested in advancing the principles of his party has a disinclination for the excitements of political life and no ambition to share its honors. Questions of public policy are carefully considered, and measures tending to benefit the community receive his cordial support. He is a director of the Orange National Bank of Orange. His religious interests lie with the First Presbyterian Church of Orange, of which he is a member, though he has liberally aided in the erec-

B., the subject of this biographical sketch, whose birth occurred Aug. 9, 1806, in East Orange, which has been his lifetime residence. After a period of attendance at the district school, he was apprenticed to the hatters' trade, in which he became proficient. RICHARD B. HARRISON.

Stephen Harrison, the grandfather of Richard B. Harrison, was a resident of Orange, (now East Orange,) in Essex County, N. J. Among his children was Abial, born May 20, 1765, whose death occurred Oct. 16, 1833. He married Elizabeth Lyon, who was born Nov. 9, 1764, and died May 2, 1855. Their children were Lydia, born in 1792; Stephen, in 1793; Sally, in 1794; Abby, in 1797; Hannah, in 1799; Elizabeth, in 1804; Eliza, in 1803; and Richard atons, had been principally devoted to the labors of a farmer. He was, in 1831, married to Mary B. Porter, of Orange, whose children are Elizabeth (deceased), John (deceased), Mary E. (Mrs. Samuel Condit), Sarah (Mrs. Edwin Harrison), Joseph D., James T., and Caroline (Mrs. Henry Ward.) Mr. Harrison was formerly a Whig in politics, and now votes the ticket of the Republican party. He has held various offices connected with his township and been frequently sought for positions of trust. In religion he is a Presbyterian and member of the Second Presbyterian Church, familiarly known as the Brick Church, in which he has served as trustee.

Geographical.—Caldwell township occupies the northernmost portion of Essex County. It is bounded on the north by Little Falls township, Passaic Co., and Pequannock, of Morris County, east by the township of Montclair; south by West Orange and Livingston townships, Essex Co.; and west by Hanover and Montville townships, Morris Co. It contains an area of twenty-eight square miles or seventeen thousand nine hundred and twenty acres.

Dutch Occupation of the Territory.—Up to the close of the seventeenth century no settlements had been made in Caldwell. The country west of Watchung, or First Mountain, in 1700, had but a sparse population of Indians of the Delaware nation. Between the years 1710 and 1720, it appears that several Dutch families settled in that portion of Caldwell now known as Fairfield. The first distinctive mention made of the lands beyond Watchung, or Orange Mountain, in connection with local affairs, is found in the town records of Newark. An item under date of Oct. 2, 1699, indicates that a Mr. Pierson and Ensign Johnson were appointed a committee by the town authorities to negotiate the purchase of the "tract lying westward of our bounds to the Passaic River." It seems, however, that these parties did not succeed in acquiring a grant or deed from the proprietors. It appears further, as a matter of record, that Sir Thomas Lane and others, under the title of the West Jersey Society, secured the conveyance by letters patent, bearing date June 10, 1701, of a tract of land lying at Horseneck, which clearly refers to a section of country located west of First Mountain and extending to the Passaic River. An Indian deed to a Dutch company in 1679, given by Captalium to Hans Deiderick, Garret Garrison, Walling Jacobs, Hendrick George and company, of Bergen, was confirmed by another from Governor Carteret and Council in 1684, which clearly included that portion of Caldwell lying west and north of a "straight line drawn from the mouth of Pine Brook a little to the north of Cedar Grove, extending to the village of Acquakonock." It is doubtless the case that a number of the very early settlers of Fairfield secured the title to their lands from this source.

Land Troubles of 1740-50.—In 1702 the agitation and excitement of the people, who found the way of progress blocked by the jealousies and rivalries of the East Jersey proprietors, culminated in disturbance and confusion. The proprietors finding their embarrasments increasing, voluntarily surrendered the right of government, with which they had been invested, to the crown, which was accepted by Queen Anne, April 17, 1702. At this juncture, the settlers of Newark, still intent upon the possession of the tract beyond the First Mountain, and unmindful of the claims of the proprietor, made purchase directly from the Indians of the land "westward or northwest of Newark within the compass of the Passaic River, and so southward unto Minsouk Path, viz. all lands as yet unpurchased of the heathen." The deed was executed by Lountique, Taphow, Manslum and divers other Indians. This document was lost by fire in the house of Jonathan Pierson, in Newark, about the year 1744. It bore date March, 1701-2. This deed was confirmed through renewal by King Quichtooc, King Tischewokamin, Shaphoe and Yaupis, as the successors and heirs of the original grantors. It was executed March 14, 1744-45. The amount paid for the tract of thirteen thousand five hundred acres was one hundred and thirty pounds New York currency, or about three hundred and twenty-five dollars. This tract included the section from Fullerton's brook, below Swinfield Bridge, to a point near Little Falls, and between Second Mountain and Passaic River.

The towns-people of Newark, to the number of one hundred and one individuals, assumed themselves to be joint proprietors of this tract lying west of First Mountain, which they caused to be divided in lots or shares. During the period to 1740, the section acquired a very limited population. The northwest portion of what is now included in the boundary of Caldwell, in 1740, had the largest settlement. From 1740 to 1750 the settlers were greatly harassed by the several proprietors, who demanded payment for the lands occupied. The titles which had been acquired through the Indian deed of 1702 were pronounced void, in accordance with an act of 1683, which made it a criminal offense to negotiate transfers of lands from the Indians. The proprietors used reasonable persuasion to induce the settlers to purchase or lease their holdings, but a long controversy followed. Several riots occurred. The jail at Newark was raided upon several occasions to release those who had been imprisoned for unlawful transactions in opposition to the rights and claims of the proprietors. The jail was broken open on Jan. 1, 1746, when the rescuing party were led by Mr. Thomas Gould in person, who carried a flag. On Nov. 13, 1740, the house of Abram Phillips, of Horseneck, one of the parties who recognized the proprietors' claims, was broken open, the owner turned out and a stack of oats burned. The people became very much excited at this juncture, and in the March following the rioters entered general alarm.

Prominent among the settlers who were parties to this controversy were Francis Spar, Thomas Gould, Saunders Sanders, John Condit and John Law. The general proprietors referred their claims to the courts, and the long suit-at-law following resulted disastrously to the settlers. Many lost their homes, while others were reduced to extremest straits in repurchasing the lands for which they had previously paid, and which they had improved by years of toil. There were thirty five families, however, found in the north-west portion of Horseneck, several of whom were bona fide purchasers from other proprietors, whose transactions dated as far back as 1716. Their titles were confirmed. The remaining families shared the persecutions and disasters of their neighbors to the east and south, whose titles were held to be void, and all were dispossessed.

The foregoing, historically considered, is pertinent to all that portion of Essex County now included within the boundaries of Caldwell, Livingston and West Orange townships, and of a portion of Acquackonock. Caldwell was not set off as a township until 1798, when it embraced Livingston and West Orange townships.

Boundary of Township.—An act of the Legislature approved Feb. 16, 1798, entitled "An act for dividing the townships of Newark and Acquackonock into three separate townships," gives the following as the boundaries of the "Township of Caldwell": "Beginning at Cook's bridge, on the Passaic River; thence running down the old Canoebrook road along the Springfield line, until it comes to where said line turns off to Keen's Mills; from thence on a straight line to within five chains to the west of Joel Condit's quarry on the Springfield Road, near the top of Second Mountain; thence north fifteen degrees east, twenty chains along said mountain; thence on a straight line to the top of First Mountain to where a certain road laid out along the line of lands of Stephen Crane, deceased, intersects the top of said mountain; thence along the same until it comes to the Paterson line; thence along the said line to the Passaic River; thence up the middle of the stream, the several courses of the same, to the place of beginning."

Naming the Township.—The name Caldwell was given the township as an expression of the affection and reverence in which the people held the memory of that sterling patriot and devoted minister of Christ, Rev. James Caldwell. He frequently visited the territory above described, and ministered to the spiritual needs of the poor and struggling settlers. The murder of his wife, a most estimable lady, at her home, by a British soldier, on June 25, 1780, and his own tragic death at Elizabethtown Point, on Nov. 24, 1781, where, while on a mission of mercy, he was shot by a sentinel, had produced a widespread feeling of profoundest grief. His devotion to God and country, attested by countless deeds of mercy and daring, his eloquence, which had stirred all hearts, and his patriotism, which had been a bulwark of defense to his country.—these had made his memory glorious and imperishable. In the adoption of the name, Caldwell, the settlers felt they were honoring alike themselves and their town.

The boundaries as defined in the act of 1798 were subject to change in 1813, when Livingston township was formed from Springfield and Caldwell, and again in 1863, when the township of West Orange was formed. Within its present boundaries, Caldwell embraces a section of beautiful country.

Topography.—Its topography is pleasantly diversified. Its southeastern boundary is First, or Orange Mountain, while at a distance of two miles northwest, extending north and south, parallel with this range, is Second Mountain. These mountains are formed of trap rock, which has issued, not through fractures in the sandstone, but has been forced up between the layers of the latter and formed into long ridges of trap, varying in thickness of deposit. It has the dip toward the northwest, characteristic of the sandstone.

VERONA VALLEY situated between these parallel ranges, presents many features of interest. The Peckman River, which has its rise in West Orange, flows through the entire length of this valley, and unites with the Passaic below Little Falls. Verona Lake, covering ten acres of land, and the McConnel and Bronze Powder Company's ponds, give the Peckman Rivulet its prominence in local geography. The western slope of the First Mountain is easy and gradual of descent to the Peckman stream, in the valley below, and the soil, though of drift formation, ranks as fairly medium for agricultural purposes. The same holds true of the section embraced between the Peckman River and the ridge of Second Mountain to the west. In the valley proper there are limited areas of excellent land. Both these mountain-sides present many picturesque situations, and they afford a large area admirably adapted to building purposes.

The most elevated table-land of large area is occupied by the village of Caldwell. It has an elevation of four hundred and fifty feet. The easy undulations both to the south and north of Caldwell, and the long stretch of slope to the Passaic River, which flows through the bottom-lands to the west and northwest of Caldwell village, give this portion of the township pre-eminence as to favorable location and surroundings. From the more favored points, the eye sweeps a large territory of richly-diversified country. Boonton, on the eastern side of Boonton Mountain, with its irregular and elevated streets, and dwellings seemingly ranked on terraces, stands out in clearest relief in the morning sun. The churches and prominent dwellings of Morris help to enrich the scenery presented by the valleys and hills to the west.

This entire western slope is an immense sand and gravel deposit. In many places the gravel covers the underlying rock to a depth varying from one hundred to one hundred and fifty feet. For this reason the local atmosphere is dry and healthful.

THE PASSAIC VALLEY, which includes the villages of Clinton and Fairfield, is largely of alluvial formation, and embraces the area from the foot-hills, west of Caldwell to the Passaic River, west and north. The soil is of the best for cropping in Essex County. The three extensive natural meadows which border on the Passaic constitute an interesting feature of this section. The first is known as Hethfield Swamp, and has five hundred and eighty-six acres of meadow and forest. Its hay product probably exceeds four hundred tons yearly. It also yields valuable hard timber. The "Little Piece," containing three hundred and eighty-nine acres, has been very largely denuded of its groves, and is devoted mainly to hay-growing and pasturage. Its yield of hay is estimated at five hundred tons yearly. Further on to the north is the largest of these meadows, known as the "Great Piece." It has thirteen hundred and thirty-one acres, a third part of which is wood and timber land. Its product of hay will reach fifteen hundred tons yearly. These meadows are frequently submerged during the prevalence of the rainy seasons. It is authoritatively stated that the Passaic River, from the Swinfield Bridge to Little Falls, a distance of twelve miles, does not average a fall of two inches per mile. The trap rock reef at Little Falls, which is, in fact, a section of the ridge of rock that constitutes Second Mountain, over which the Passaic flows, is the great natural obstacle in the way of drainage. Since the erection of a dam at the reef for manufacturing purposes, however, the overflows have been more frequent and prolonged.

In this connection, a brief mention of the organized efforts which have been made to remove these obstructions is pertinent. In 1844, the owners of the low meadow lands contributed one thousand dollars by voluntary assessment, to be used in lowering the reef at Little Falls. Caleb D. Harrison, one of the landowners, was intrusted with the superintendence of the work; and, during the dry season of summer and autumn, he effected the removal of a section of rock across the bed of the channel, one hundred feet in length, twenty in width, and one foot in depth. Beneficial effects were at once apparent. Inundations were less frequent. The water, which overspread the meadows, did not remain long enough to become stagnant, as had been the case before, and the coarse water-grasses, after the lapse of a year, were in process of displacement by better varieties. The removal of the rock, as above stated, was experimental, but the results gained proved the plan practicable. Its further prosecution, however, was forbidden by the mill-owners, who had erected a dam below the reef of rock. A special law, secured by these mill-owners in 1868, authorized the repair and extension of the old dam, which, when completed, proved a greater obstruction than the reef had been. At the suggestion of Dr. George H. Cook, State geologist, as the result of a careful survey of the Passaic River, prosecuted under his direction, efforts were again made for the reclamation of the low meadows. During the year 1872, by enactment of the Legislature, commissioners were appointed, who were authorized to remove the obstructions at Little Falls; but legal difficulties interposed in the matter of a satisfactory adjustment of the claims and purposes of the land holders, as opposed to the legal rights of the manufacturers at Little Falls and Paterson, which, coupled with the discouragements met by the commissioners in their endeavors to negotiate the sale of the bonds, whose issue the act referred to had authorized, has, up to this time, prevented the realization of this needed improvement.

Civil Organization. The following is a transcript from the town-book of the first town-meeting held at Caldwell:

Public Roads.—The several sections of roads that constitute Bloomfield Avenue were originally old roads, established in 1739, each section being under the care of the villages, and were known as the "old road to Newark." Later, Israel Crane obtained a charter for the Newark and Pompton Turnpike. He followed the line of these roads, purchasing rights of way of several citizens for the purpose of establishing a direct road from Mount Prospect to the vicinity of Pine Brook, on the Passaic River. This and the Pompton branch were purchased by the Essex County Road Board. The Pompton road reverted to the township, but the Caldwell road was regraded and the road-bed macadamized.

The road in Fairfield leading to 1800 Falls, on which the Octagonal Church was situated, was laid out as early as 1720.

The Dutch Lane Road, Franklin Avenue, was laid May 29, 1790; 4 rods wide.

Curly Lane was laid out Nov. 24, 1767, and was relaid April 24, 1776, 3 rods wide.

Sunset Avenue was a very old road, and was relaid June 17, 1800, 44 feet wide.

Peckman Lane, now Gould Lane, one of the earliest roads in the township was relaid Dec. 2, 1854, and relaid in 1876, 60 feet wide.

Bushtown Road, or road from M. C. Dobbins to J. B. Davenport's, is a very old road, no record.

Central Avenue was laid out of 2 rods wide in 1702, relaid 65 feet wide in 1874.

March Avenue laid out March 11, 1870; 66 feet wide.

Pine Lane laid out Oct. 13, 1797; 3 rods wide.

Ridge Road laid out very early, relaid June 2, 1800, 2 rods wide.

Lindsey Road laid out Aug. 1, 1797; 2 rods wide.

Road by N. N. Crane's laid out Oct. 6, 1706; 2½ rods wide.

Railroad Efforts.—There have been several general efforts made to secure the building of a railroad. Difficulties, however, have interposed in these endeavors and defeated the worthy schemes. In 1872 a charter was obtained for a railroad to connect with the Bloomfield Branch at Montclair. A company was organized, and Jonathan Provost was chosen to negotiate terms with the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company. He had completed the negotiations with this company, and was engaged in securing the necessary subscriptions, when proffers were made by parties in the interest of the Montclair and Greenwood Lake Company to take the majority of the capital stock and build the railroad, extending it to Morristown. The proposition proved a delusion. The Montclair and Greenwood Lake Company obtained control of the charter, and after a showing of activity, abandoned the undertaking. The successors of this defunct company hold the Caldwell charter still, through compliance with the technicalities of the general railroad law.

County Penitentiary.—The Caldwell Penitentiary, as it is generally known, was erected in 1873, and opened for the reception of prisoners in 1874. The first warden was John D. Vermilye. It is a county institution.

The building is commodious and admirably adapted to its purpose. Its sanitary arrangements are very superior. Its drainage system was that recommended by Col. Waring.

The prisoners are occupied in farming and in stone-breaking. They produce the material for the repair of the county roads. They belong to the younger and less obdurate of the criminal classes.

Thomas T. Speer succeeded Mr. Vernilye in 1878, and is the present warden. The management is highly commended by the authorities.

VILLAGES AND HAMLETS

Franklin—PIONEER SETTLERS.—The village of Franklin, one mile west from Caldwell township, had a few inhabitants in 1740. Of many of these pioneers there are no records. The estate which at the present time constitutes the farms of Anthony and William Cadmus, Richard S. Francisco and Robert Morton, was purchased originally in 1754 by John Mead. His date of settlement in this section was prior to the purchase. He came from Holland in 1730. His property embraced a large area of natural meadow, and of rich, fertile soil. His sons, Aaron and John, shared this property. The former removed to Newark, while John remained in possession of a part of the homestead. John's sons were John, Allan and Aaron. John purchased a property in North Caldwell, which he sold to H. S. Hewitt, of New York; Allan settled in the western part of Franklin, on the old Newark road. His sons—George E., Joel D., James R. and John M.—have occupied prominent positions as merchants, and all except James R., have been closely identified with the progress and prosperity of the township. Joel D. Mead rendered valuable service in the promotion of educational interests. Never, strictly speaking, a politician, still he was influential in political circles, and was honored in the councils of his party. He removed to Florida in 1880. John M. Mead succeeded him in the general store business at Caldwell.

Jonas Crane located on the west of the village during the middle of the last century. He possessed a section of valuable timber and meadow land. This property passed to his son Amos. Calvin S. Crane, another son, who had received a liberal education, established a select school at Caldwell. The property is now held by George R. Crane. The other old estates of this vicinity are possessed by Aaron O. Kent, Josiah A. Francisco, I. N. Canfield, all of whom are thrifty farmers. Mr. A. O. Kent is a retired schoolmaster, having taught, with uniform success, in the schools of Franklin and Clinton for upwards of forty years.

As far back as 1735 what is now the main business portion of the village belonged to a Mr. Lewis. Andrew Ray purchased a part of this tract, perhaps in 1780. Shortly afterward, he introduced lace-weaving in the village. He sold his property and business to Thomas Cochran early in this century. Mr. Cochran came from Paisley, Scotland. He soon occupied a position of trust with his employer. His skill, his devotion to business trusts, his integrity, never marred during his long career by an untoward act, and his genial, though quaint, methods of expression and action, which were characteristic of him in all his relations, have given him an enviable repute in local history. His management of the lace industry was successful, and he retired with moderate wealth. In 1846, he removed to Bloomfield. His property was owned afterward by Joseph Caruan, from whom it was purchased by the Rev. H. P. Blair, a Campbellite preacher. He removed to Danbury, Conn., in 1857. Some of the property was sold in villa lots in 1858, and Hassel Garrabrandt, William Bond, Jacob Bush and James Garrabrandt built dwelling-houses thereon just previous to, and during, the Rebellion. Ambrose Bush bought the homestead, and has recently opened a grocery-store on the property.

Philemon Bates owned another section of the Lewis property on the north of the old Newark road. Mr. Bates built a cider mill and distillery, and was a hard-working and ambitious citizen; but he became involved in transactions outside his business, and failed. Some of his property was afterward held by Nathaniel Douglass and Thomas Cochran. Mr. Douglass also obtained title to other portions of the Lewis property, and became a resident of Franklin in 1790. He built the dwelling now occupied by Philander S. Pierson in 1800. He built the brick store at the same time, and dealt in a general variety of goods, including drugs, dry goods and groceries. In 1806 he built the tobacco factory, which has had a remarkably successful career.

To Mr. Douglass belongs the credit of introducing enterprises which have contributed greatly to the prosperity of Caldwell. In his intercourse with his neighbors, he was dignified, resolute and influential.

He was active in church matters, and the older inhabitants remember him for his efficient services in the promotion of the cause of religion.

Mr. Douglass' estate was transferred to his son-in-law, Dr. James Orton, who began his career as a practitioner at an early age, and continued in the profession for the space of fifty years. He traversed a large section of country in his practice. He died at the advanced age of eighty-three years. His sons are James D. and Henry. The former engaged in banking at Newark when a young man, and is highly esteemed in financial circles. Henry was a surgeon in the army during the Rebellion, and is now practicing his profession in New York City.

The homestead was then sold to Mr. George Lane, who removed the dwelling, and erected a large and attractive cottage in its stead. Mr. Lane has transformed the property into a desirable and elegant country-seat.

HARRISON FAMILY.—David Harrison came from Orange in 1749, and located one half mile west from Caldwell village. His tract was a large one. He was untiring in his purpose, and before the beginning of the Revolutionary war he had a large area of arable land and an apple orchard in bearing. He entertained patriot soldiers on several occasions when they were foraging, and kept their live-stock in a secluded field, which, from this circumstance, obtained the name of Hog Pasture. He died from sun-stroke, at the age of eighty-three years, while raking rye in his field. He had a large family, all of whom were girls, except two.—David, who removed to North Caldwell, and Jabez, who built a frame house on the Newark road, and who inherited from the estate a farm of fifty acres. Jabez had two sons, one of whom, David, died at Detroit in 1812. He had been connected with Gen. Harrison's army of the West, and had shared its fights and hardships. Caleb D. Harrison remained for a time with his father, then, in 1821, entered into partnership with Nathaniel Douglass in the tobacco business. In 1830, he became superintendent of the Rosendale Cement Works, near Kingston, N. Y. He returned to Franklin in 1833, and bought from the several heirs, the greater portion of his grandfather's estate. He purchased the store property from Thomas Cochran in 1836, and replaced the Philemon Bates dwelling-house by the erection of one more modern.

Mr. Harrison was a magistrate for several years, town clerk for four terms and assessor for six years. He transacted legal business for his neighbors, who gladly availed themselves of his counsel.

The homestead is now held by Caleb M. Harrison, who, after eleven years' absence from the village, returned upon the death of his father, in 1868. During this period he had occupied the principalship of the public schools of Plainfield and New Brunswick, the State superintendency of public schools during 1863 and 1864, and the principalship of the Newark Academy from 1864 to 1869, inclusive. It was during his superintendency that the initial steps were taken in the reform of the public school system of the State. Afterward he devoted himself to agriculture, being the first in his section to compound mineral fertilizers in kind and quantity in adaptation to special crops. In 1880, he was appointed to the superintendency of the Newark City Home, a reformatory institution. He holds that position at the present time. The farm is rented by his nephew, Caleb A. Harrison, who is engaged in the milk business, and who utilizes the land solely in the interests of his trade.

CRANE FAMILY.—Samuel Crane settled in Franklin in 1745. He purchased large tracts of real estate, and was very extensively engaged in agriculture. He was an active and influential churchman, and was universally respected as a man of unsullied reputation. His sons, except Nathaniel S., removed to Westville. Nathaniel remained upon the homestead. In his early years, he was prominently identified with the militia of the county, and held the rank of major. Mr. Crane excelled in the quantity and quality of his apple products, and made large quantities of cider. This article, as well as the vinegar made therefrom, was justly esteemed in the markets of Newark for unvarying excellence. Mr. Crane's property passed to his sons,—Wilson, Samuel, Duryea, James H., Cyrus and Joseph W. The old homestead was sold in 1882 to David Terry, who is engaged in general farming.

LANE FAMILY.—Henry Lane purchased a small estate from John Cory and David Harrison at the close of the Revolution. He enlisted in the Continental army when very young, and remained in service till the close of the war. He became a leading carpenter in this section, and died in 1850, aged eighty-eight years.

His son, William, inherited the estate, and followed his father's business. Mr. Lane has been an active worker in promotion of Sabbath-school and church interests. His sons George and Isaac occupy attractive estates in the eastern part of the village. Mr. George Lane purchased a half interest in the tobacco manufactory in 1836, and retired with considerable wealth in 1874. His property is one of the first of the township in location, adornment and surroundings. Mr. Lane has represented his township in the Board of Chosen Freeholders, and has been an active trustee of the Caldwell Public High School since its organization, in 1873.

Isaac Lane succeeded his brother in the manufacturing business above noted. He is associated with Lewis G. Loekward and John B. Allee.

VANNESS FAMILY.—Thomas Vanness came from Warwick, N. Y., during the Revolutionary war, and settled on the road leading to Fairfield, commonly called Dutch Lane, because of the large number of Holland people who first owned the lands on the road. His grandsons, Thomas and Peter, and great-grandson

Cornelius, now occupy his estate. John H. Vanness, who was engaged in blacksmithing for a long period, settled upon the Cook property. The other old estates of this section are now in possession of Mrs. Alice Flintoft, Barney Francisco and James Manning.

LOCKWARD.—John T. Lockward, who graduated from the Maryland State Medical College, March, 1823, came to Caldwell in 1835, and practiced medicine from that time until his death, in 1843. In 1841 he purchased the village property of Zenas C. Crane. This is now owned by the heirs of Charles Aubrey. Dr. Lockward was esteemed as one of the best of physicians, and had a very extended practice. His son, Lewis G. Lockward, has been an active citizen, and has served the township as freeholder and as collector with unvarying approval.

BACKUS.—Henry F. Backus holds several tracts of real estate, and is engaged in agriculture and is doing a large milk business.

COURTER.—Henry Courter began harness-making in 1858, and subsequently added a furnishing store to his other line of goods. Industry and energy brought him a fair measure of prosperity. He died in 1865. His brother, M. H. Courter, in the spring following, 1866, assumed the business, and has conducted it profitably since.

PIONEER POST-OFFICE AND STORES.—From 1790 till 1830 Franklin was the leading village of the township. The post-office was located here, under the postmastership of John L. Hudson. The brick store for a long period led in general merchandise, and was patronized largely by the citizens of Morris County. After Nathaniel Douglass it was conducted by John L. Hudson. Thomas Cochran managed it for a short period. In 1836 it was purchased by Caleb D. Harrison, and thereafter held by him until 1858, when it was rented to Philander S. Pierson, who conducted it with marked success for several years. Afterward it languished, being occupied for short periods by those who cared only to do a safe trade, mainly in groceries and house-furnishing supplies.

BUSINESS INTERESTS.—The tobacco manufactory has been a source of continuous profit to those engaged in it. It has made, in its history, many moderate fortunes. The succession of firms has been as follows: Nathaniel Douglass, 1806 to 1821; Douglas & Harrison, 1821 to 1827; Harrison & Moore, 1827 to 1828; Harrison & Steele, 1828 to 1829; Steele & Crane, 1829 to 1835.

Zenas C. Crane purchased George C. Steele's interest in 1835, and sold two-thirds to David Campbell and Jacob Bush. Style of firm, Z. C. Crane & Co.

David Campbell and Jacob Bush purchased Zenas C. Crane's interest in 1839. Style of firm, Bush & Campbell.

In 1842, Jacob Bush purchased David Campbell's interest.

In 1843, David Campbell admitted as a partner. Style of firm, Bush & Campbell.

In 1848, Zenas C. Crane admitted as a partner. This year they purchased the Steele & Crane property at Caldwell. Style of firm, Bush, Campbell & Co.

Dec. 17, 1850, David Campbell and Zenas C. Crane purchased Jacob Bush's interest. Style of firm, Campbell & Crane.

In 1854, Calvin G. Backus admitted as a partner. Style of firm, Campbell, Crane & Co.

In 1856, George Lane admitted as a partner. Style of firm not changed.

April 8, 1862, David Campbell, Calvin G. Backus and George Lane purchased Zenas C. Crane's interest. Style of firm, Campbell, Backus & Co.

April 15, 1864, David Campbell and George Lane purchased Calvin G. Backus' interest. Edward A. Campbell was admitted at the same time as a partner. Style of firm, Campbell, Lane & Co.

Jan. 1, 1865, Henry Cyphers admitted as a partner, style of firm remaining the same.

Jan. 1, 1867, Isaac Lane and Lewis G. Lockward admitted as partners, style of firm remaining the same.

Jan. 1, 1874, David Campbell, George Lane and Edward A. Campbell purchased Henry Cyphers', Isaac Lane's and Lewis G. Lockward's interest. Style of firm, Campbell, Lane & Co.

May 1, 1874, Isaac Lane, John B. Allee, Jr., and William Ackerman purchased the Caldwell part of the business. Style of firm, Lane, Allee & Co.

May 1, 1879, Lewis G. Lockward admitted as a partner. Style of firm not changed.

March 15, 1880, Isaac Lane, John B. Allee, Jr., and Lewis G. Lockward purchased William Ackerman's interest, style of firm remaining the same.

May 1, 1882, style of firm changed to Lane, Lockward & Co.

Blacksmithing has been a prominent industry in the village since 1822. John H. Vanness and Enos W. Martin were longest engaged in this enterprise. James Miller bought the shop and fixtures from Mr. Martin in 1869. Mr. Miller built a substantial shop, affording room for a wheelwright department, which is controlled by H. C. Ryerson.

Philander S. Pierson, who occupies one of the oldest properties of the village, is a gentleman of moderate wealth, and the Republican party have honored him with the important office of county collector for the past twenty years. Mr. Pierson has acted as commissioner of deeds, notary public, and has transacted considerable business for insurance companies. He came to the village in 1846, and taught the district school for a season, when he entered the store business with Caleb D. Harrison.

James H. Crane holds considerable real estate. He built several houses on Franklin Avenue, and has contributed, through his business interests, to the prosperity of the village.

The leading farmers of this section are Richard S. and Josiah A. Francisco, J. A. Canfield, Henderson

Cadmus, Levi Kent, George R. Crane, James A. Speer, and Cyrenus D. Connor.

EDUCATION.—Franklin has maintained a school since 1780. The first instructors were Irish teachers. The school has been good, average, and languishing at periods, in sympathy with the qualities of the teachers employed. Among those whose honorable service demands recognition is Aaron O. Kent, whose scholarship and interest and skill in his work made his school deservedly popular. Jabez Allen, Joseph and Richard Carberry, and Joseph Carman are held in pleasant memory by their pupils. The school was merged with those of Westville and Caldwell in a union school in 1871. In 1876 the old school-house was purchased by the citizens, and remodelled and enlarged for chapel purposes. The Sabbath services are conducted by the neighbors, and are non-sectarian in character. The Sabbath-school is in charge of Superintendent John B. Allee.

Caldwell.—The village of Caldwell began its history in 1740, when Thomas Gould and Saunders Sanders purchased and settled upon the properties which constitute a large portion of the village west from Bloomfield Avenue. Sanders built a stone dwelling on the site now occupied by the barn of Henry Post, and Thomas Gould built on the road leading from Caldwell to Roseland, on or near the location of Dr. Halsey's residence. This year, 1740, was notable in the history of Horseneck, for, upon what appears as trustworthy authority, on the 20th day of June nearly all the Indians removed from this section and joined the Six Nations, near Seneca Lake, in the State of New York. Several lingered for a time, and the last one, "Indian John," left in 1761. There are no records to show that they were hostile, or that the few whites who lived in this vicinity experienced any trouble in their intercourse with these aborigines. Their burial-grounds were located near the Halsey property, on the road leading to Roseland, and the other in North Caldwell, on the farm now belonging to Messrs. Wilson and Raven.

The stone house of Sanders was one of the first buildings erected in the village, and was built probably in the year 1748. It was first occupied as a public-house. It was a place of resort for the villagers, and also for the transaction of public business. It was known in later days as the "Old Stone Fort," perhaps from the fact that during the Revolutionary war a small body of patriot troops were quartered there for a brief season. Gen. Washington graced the place with his presence on one occasion during the war, and dined under a harvest pear tree which stood a few feet south of the dwelling. It was occupied as a residence until 1840, and afterwards as a barn. It was torn down in 1848, and the stone used in the foundations of the First Baptist Church. Thomas Gould came to Caldwell when he was twenty years of age. His "frame house" was the first in the village. He was possessed of great powers of endurance, enterprising spirit and energy. His influence in the affairs of the struggling settlers was decided and salutary. He died in his ninety-ninth year, 1808. At this time his descendants numbered two hundred and seven, most of whom were then living.

His sons were Joseph, Robert, Timothy and William. Joseph owned the property now owned by Cyrus Canfield; he removed to Ohio. Timothy settled in Horseneck, and occupied what is now known as the Winaus property. William owned the estate of Nathaniel G. Gould, deceased. This property is now held by the heirs, grandsons of William Gould, prominent among whom are William and George. Gen. William Gould was frequently in active service during the Revolutionary war and took part in the battles of Springfield and Monmouth. He served with Gen. Lee in the whiskey insurrection in 1794. He had an extended reputation for integrity and ability. He was a member of the State Legislature from Essex in 1805 and 1817. By his candor, public spirit and devotion to his trusts, Gen. Gould endeared himself to the community at large. He was always foremost, both in public and church affairs, and his memory will long be cherished. Thomas Denman Gould was a son of Robert Gould. His life was spent at the old Gould homestead. He was an active churchman, a successful farmer and a genial gentleman, highly esteemed for his virtues.

His son Randolph succeeded to the estate, but was unfortunate in business management, and died at an early age. The estate is now owned by Dr. William Halsey.

John L. Hudson established a pottery in 1819 on the Gould property. Thomas D. Gould purchased the buildings and business, and continued the manufacture of earthen-ware goods until 1840. It was never a source of much profit.

PIONEER MILLS.—In 1760, Messrs. Thomas Gould and Sanders built a grist mill on Pine Brook, on the old road leading to Westville, where the old tobacco factory stands. A saw mill owned by Gould & De Camp antedated the grist mill by several years. In 1790, Zadoc Baldwin constructed a saw mill, and in 1800, Nehemiah Crane established a fulling mill. These primitive manufacturing enterprises were useful rather than remunerative, as they hastened the development of the resources of the town, and drew thither a small number of partially skilled laborers. In 1780, Zadoc Baldwin began the manufacture of potash from wood ashes. His buildings were located in the old tan-yard, and in 1797 he added a department for the tanning of hides. This industry proved profitable, and was of marked advantage to the prosperity of the village. It was continued until 1865; Matthias Canfield, Abram Personette, Jonathan Provost, Matthias S. Canfield and John Moore were engaged in this manufacture for successive periods.

PIONEER STORE.—Mr. Baldwin has the credit of opening the first store for general merchandise in Caldwell, during the year 1790. His successors in this business were all prosperous. The entire history of this enterprise records but one failure.

The successors of Mr. Baldwin were Messrs. Stephen R. Grover, Moore & Kennedy, M. G. Arden, Demas Harrison, Burnett & Crane, Hopping & Burnett, Steele & Crane, C. G. Crane, Joel D. Mead and John M. Mead & Co. The "Caldwell Store" has long been the leading mercantile house of the township.

The rival store was established in 1852. The building was erected in 1848 by John C. Anderson, who was then engaged in the manufacture of shoes. He failed very shortly after the erection of the store, and the property was purchased by Demas Harrison. The latter associated Jotham E. Williams with himself in the store, and continued until 1857, when Williams retired, and Marcus Harrison, eldest son of Demas, became sole proprietor. He retired in 1883, the business passing to his son, Theodore F. Mr. Marcus Harrison was postmaster for twenty-one years.

PIONEER STAGE LINE.—Demas Harrison, grandfather of Demas Harrison above noted, was the proprietor of the first stage line of this section. He made semi-weekly trips to New York. Afterward Newark became the terminus. The succeeding stage proprietors were James McDavid, John Ward, S. A. Estler, James Husk, Stephen Bond, Joseph Baldwin, Horace Bailey and William Wheaton.

The Caldwell and Montclair stage line was started by P. H. Harrison, who sold to G. B. Harrison. The latter was succeeded by James Husk, in 1883. Of late years, since the establishment of the Bloomfield Railroad, stage accommodations have been of superior character.

EARLY SETTLERS.—Samuel Moore was born in 1762, and came to Caldwell, where he resided until his death, which occurred in 1835. He was sexton of the church at Caldwell for a long period. He bought considerable property in what is now the heart of the village. His purchases included tracts from Peter Van Blarcom, Zadoc Baldwin and Stephen Brundage.

His sons were Joseph C. and George D. G. Moore. The former became a minister, and held pastorates in the Presbyterian Churches at Clyde, N. Y., and at Succasunna Plains and West Milford, in New Jersey. He was a devoted and successful pastor.

George D. G. Moore graduated from Union College in 1842. He removed to Wisconsin and was a member of the Senate of that State from 1849 to 1851, inclusive. He returned to New Jersey in 1858. In 1869 he was elected surrogate of Essex County, which office he held for the period of ten years, having enjoyed the high honor of a re-election in 1874. Mr. Moore is at present located in Newark, engaged in the practice of law.

Moses Campbell settled on a section of land, embracing the George Davenport property, in 1750.

He held a "proprietary title." He left his farm and business interests to the care of Mrs. Campbell at the outbreak of the Revolution, and served under Gen. Washington until the disbanding of the army. His son Ezekiel purchased a farm of fifty acres from Justus Burnett and — Van Houten. This land is located in the village of Caldwell, and is now in possession of Richard C. Campbell, his grandson.

Zadoc Baldwin was a large land-holder, and owned one hundred and five acres of land, nearly in the centre of the village. This tract was sold as village lots in 1800. Sales on the north of the old road were made to Justus Burnett, Gen. William Gould, John W. Wardell, Aaron Crane, Joshua Moore and Stephen Grover. The land south of the road he reserved for himself, except a small tract purchased by Nehemiah Crane. Mathias Canfield afterward bought the balance of the eastern part of this tract.

DRUGGISTS AND PHYSICIANS.—Of the recent business enterprises, the Caldwell drug-store has been one of the most successful. It was established by Arthur Watkins in 1878, who was succeeded by Lester A. Wyatt, who enlarged the trade. It was bought by Dr. E. E. Peck in 1881. Dr. Peck has a growing practice, and is recognized as a rising physician.

Of the physicians of the village, Dr. E. F. Maynard and Dr. C. H. Hunter, his successor, are historically most closely associated with the village enterprises. Dr. Maynard had a large practice, and was a gentleman of considerable wealth. He built several dwellings and improved sections of real estate in the village. He removed to Florida in 1860. Dr. Charles H. Hunter succeeded to his practice. His reputation as a skillful and successful practitioner is well established in the county. He also possesses considerable property, and has one of the finest cottages and villa sites in this section. Of the homeopathic physicians, Dr. A. R. Beach probably had the larger practice. He was devoted, studious, and gave to his practice untiring energy and watchful care. He was prostrated by fever resulting, doubtless, from overwork, and died in 1870, aged thirty-five years. Dr. H. D. Winans and Dr. E. R. Lane enjoy the confidence and patronage of a large circle of friends in Caldwell and in portions of Morris County. Dr. Lane has a growing practice, and is popular in his professional school.

HOTELS.—Sanders' "Stone Fort" was the first hotel of Caldwell. Aaron Crane built a hotel in 1803. It has not, however, had an enviable repute. Ichabod Ward was moderately successful, but after his death Caldwell had a hotel in name only until the advent of A. A. Snyder, who has kept a first-class house, and has been largely patronized by summer boarders, most of whom have been prominent citizens of Newark. Mr. Snyder purchased the hotel property from Zenas C. Crane in 1882, and has since greatly improved it.

BUSINESS INTERESTS.—The cigar manufactory of

S. B. Bond dates back to the year 1869. Mr. Bond employs several hands, and finds a ready market for his products.

William Bush employs three hands, and is engaged in the same line of trade.

James Jacobus also has a manufactory, and has several mechanics employed.

A harness-making enterprise was established in 1840 by John McChesney. He continued it for a period of ten years. His son, Joseph, resuscitated the industry in 1875. He abandoned it, however, in 1883, when he engaged in the wholesale trade of cigars and tobacco.

Of the carpenters of Caldwell, Jared Beach has the credit of erecting more buildings than any of his associates. He has a highly-honored record for his industry, economy and honesty. He is a gentleman of much intelligence, and has been honored by his townsmen in several elections to important offices. Mr. Beach has a valuable farm on the outskirts of the village. His son, Joseph E., is engaged in building. Owen M. Beach practices law, and has an office in the village of Caldwell.

PROMINENT CITIZENS.—Joseph P. Gould came to Caldwell in 1817, and purchased property of Demas Harrison. His sons were Amos C., William and Charles. Amos C. inherited the estate of Joseph P. Gould, his father. Mr. Gould was thoughtful and conscientious, and was much esteemed as a citizen and neighbor. The sons of Amos are Joseph P. and Thomas.

John McChesney settled in Caldwell in 1837. He was postmaster from 1845 to 1854. In 1853 he was appointed associate judge in the Court of Common Pleas. In 1858 he was appointed clerk of the Grand Jury. At the November election, 1859, he was elected county clerk for the period of five years.

Judge McChesney was one of the ablest men of Caldwell. He was quick to perceive and master the salient features of public questions. His reading and study wedded him to politics, and he was a ready and fluent controversialist. He served his township as legal adviser, and was justly esteemed as a magistrate, which office he held continuously during the last twenty years of his life.

He owned a small section of valuable real estate in the village, which is now held by his heirs. He died March 16, 1883.

Jonathan Provost was born at Pompton Plains, Dec. 2, 1798. He removed to Caldwell in 1822, and engaged in the tanning trade. Under his management the business was largely increased, and he retired in 1854 with what was then regarded as a moderate competency. He was a gentleman of excellent ability and clear judgment. In the church he was, perhaps, the most active and influential of its members. His benefactions were many. He was sometimes regarded as austere, and often misapprehended. He was at times spiritedly opposed in church and public affairs, yet he never lost his grasp of the good he sought to achieve. The Presbyterian Church owes much to Mr. Provost's energy and munificence. In public affairs his influence was widely recognized. He was not a politician, but his views on questions of local policy were sought by party leaders. No one did more for the material progress of the village. Every true advance movement found in Mr. Provost a friend and champion.

Mr. Provost died on Nov. 3, 1875, aged seventy-seven years. His son, Thomas C., occupies the homestead. He is engaged as a counselor-at-law in the city of Newark.

Lewis C. Grover, Esq., purchased the Grover parsonage from John H. Stager in 1854. Mr. Grover at this time was practicing law in Newark, and stood in the front rank of the able counselors who gave the Newark bar of that period wide renown. He resided in Caldwell twenty-two years; he sold his estate to Thomas S. Small in 1872. Mr. Grover identified himself with the affairs of the church and town while a resident at Caldwell, and many improvements were effected through his counsels and liberal donations. He became interested in insurance matters, in 1845, by drawing the charter of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, and obtaining its passage by the Legislature of that year. He was counsel and director until 1862. He was then elected president, and continued such until he resigned, in 1881, when he was appointed executive counsel, under an agreement securing his special services permanently to the company. In 1846 he obtained of the Legislature the charter of the American Fire Insurance Company, and then became director and counsel of that company, which office he has held ever since.

The Grover property was greatly improved by Mr. Small, who ranks prominently among the citizens of Caldwell.

THE FIRST POST-OFFICE of the township was located at Franklin, and John L. Hudson was the first postmaster. He was appointed in 1812. C. D. Harrison succeeded him as postmaster. The post-office was removed to Caldwell in 1826, with Calvin Crane as postmaster. I. B. Ward, J. A. Burnett, Z. C. Crane, John McChesney, and Joel D. Mead held it afterward for varying terms. Marcus and Rufus Harrison have held the office since 1860.

EDUCATIONAL.—The old parsonage was sold to Calvin S. Crane in 1823. He added thereto, and occupied it as a boarding-school until his death, in 1837. This was one of the most flourishing schools in the Middle States, and had an extended reputation. It numbered fifty boarders, beside several day scholars.

Rev. Brown Emerson purchased this property in 1843, and occupied it until 1847. The school under this gentleman's management was ordinarily successful. He sold the estate in 1847 to Dr. Maynard, and the school was removed to Belleville. In 1847, Rev.

Samuel L. Tuttle opened a select school in the academy building, and conducted it for two years, to the great satisfaction of his parishioners. This school continued until 1849. In 1856, John W. Taylor taught a select school in the hall over J. M. Mead's store. He was followed by Arthur B. Noll, in the house now occupied by Morris B. Lindsley. His school consisted largely of day scholars. Mr. Noll was an eccentric teacher, but withal he was enthusiastic and his pupils shared his spirit. His stay in the village was from 1858 until 1866; afterward Mr. E. O. Stratton and Miss Mary R. Anderson opened select schools, but each taught for a season only. The public school finally absorbed the pupils, and no effort was afterward made to sustain a private school.

The public school at Caldwell was, for different periods, very satisfactorily conducted. Among the ablest of its teachers were a Mr. Stratton, Joseph Carberry, Harrison Ketcham, Aaron O. Kent, Matthias S. Canfield, John W. Taylor (now a prominent lawyer of Newark, and lately a State Senator) and T. O. Jacobus.

The schools of Caldwell, Franklin and Westville were consolidated in 1872 by a vote of the districts. A charter for the organization of a graded school, providing for the purchase of lands and erection of suitable buildings, was approved April 4, 1873. The Board of Education provided for in the charter met May 7, 1873, and organized by the appointment of C. M. Harrison, president; N. N. Crane, district clerk and secretary; and Joel D. Mead, treasurer. The other members of the board were C. D. Connor and I. N. Canfield. Under the direction of the board, the Caldwell school building and grounds were sold, and land purchased of the heirs of John McCormack. A commodious building was erected during the spring and summer of 1874, at the cost, including land, of $18,892.67. The school opened in October of this year with an attendance of two hundred and ten children. The teachers were Addison Ely, principal, academic department; Miss M. J. Sly, junior department; Miss L. H. Armstrong, intermediate department; Miss Ella Pike, primary department. The successors of these teachers have been as follows; Miss A. E. Clothier, Miss Elizabeth Stockton, Miss F. B. Thomas, Miss J. C. Cutler, Miss Emily Merry and Miss Louise Kitchell. Mr. Clarence E. Hedden, a graduate of Amherst College, succeeded Mr. Ely in 1879. The present teachers are Misses Swift, Schumacher, Skellenger and Hetfield. The school is justly esteemed for its thoroughness and clever management. It ranks among the first schools of the county. Mr. George Lane is now president of the board.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—The church society now known as the First Presbyterian Church of Caldwell had its beginning at an early date in the history of Horseneck. About the year 1770, however, definite efforts were made to secure gospel service in the village. All the hamlets of the township contributed to the success of the movement. The people were visited by Rev. Dr. Darby, of Parsippany, Rev. Jacob Green, of Hanover, Rev. Jedediah Chapman, of Orange, and Rev. James Caldwell, of Elizabeth, whose ministrations the society enjoyed at irregular intervals, though but seldom upon the Sabbath. About this time the erection of a suitable place for public worship was agitated. The matter progressed favorably for a time. Timber was cut, dressed, and in good part framed; but the war of the Revolution occurring, the partly-framed structure was left to decay. Sabbath services, however, were instituted. In the event of failure in procuring clerical instruction, printed sermons were read, and time was devoted to conference and prayer. In 1779 a deed for ninety and one-half acres of wild land, situated in the village, was presented to the society. The donors were Caleb Hetfield and William and Noah Crane, of Cranetown (now known as Montclair). During this year, at mere nominal cost, the society purchased fifty-two acres of land in the "Little Piece" as an addition to the parsonage. These lands were used as a source of revenue.

The affairs of the struggling church were referred to a standing committee, consisting of Thomas Gould, Samuel Crane, John Gould, Joseph Harrison, Joseph Baldwin, Henry Francisco, Reuben Harrison, Joseph Gould and Abram Noe. The gentlemen continued in service as managers until 1797 "when their duties were transferred to the five trustees, who had been elected at the time of the incorporation of the church, ten years before." At a meeting, Feb. 27, 1782, whereof the Rev. Mr. Chapman was moderator, the congregation decided to build a dwelling upon the parsonage land. The building was not completed till 1786. It is the eastern portion of what is known as the Beach House, now owned by Edwin Hedden, Esq., of Newark. The upper portion of this parsonage house, though neither ceiled nor plastered, fitted up with slab benches and a rude oaken table, was occupied as a place of public worship until 1796. At the annual meeting, Jan. 15, 1792, it was resolved to build a brick church edifice, and it was proposed to raise twelve hundred pounds (New York currency) for this purpose. The parishioners were few, and rich only in lands, and it was impossible for them to raise this amount. However, recourse was had to contributions from the neighboring parishes, and in this manner a sufficient sum was collected and pledged to begin the work of building. A frame church was finally decided upon, as more in accordance with the interests and needs of the people. The timber was hewn in the woods, and early in 1793 was drawn together and joined, and during the month of June the frame was raised. A long and tedious delay occurred, resulting from pecuniary embarrassments, and the building was not ready for occupancy till 1796. On Wednesday, the 6th of April, of this year, it was formally dedicated. The church was filled to overflowing on this occasion.

A company of singers from Bloomfield was present and participated in the impressive ceremonies, and a large number of strangers from this and the adjoining county of Morris came hither to unite with their brethren in this religious festival.

The old church was an imposing edifice. Its dimensions were fifty by sixty feet. Its steeple towered one hundred and thirty feet heavenward, and was plainly visible from the valleys and distant hills of Morris County. During the year 1839 the interior of the church was remodeled and modernized. The work was done by Jared Beach, Esq., who received sixteen hundred dollars for work and material, which, with six hundred dollars for "furnishings," made the total cost two thousand two hundred dollars. It continued in use until 1872. On Friday night, November 29th, between ten and one o'clock, it was destroyed by fire. The society at once began the work of erecting a chapel, to be used until a substantial and commodious church edifice could be provided. The work was entrusted to Messrs. Nicolai & Bond. On December 22d of that year the congregation assembled in this chapel for service. It was a plain structure, made from joists and boards, seventy-two feet in length by forty in width. It was occupied until Nov. 25, 1875 when the present magnificent stone church was completed.

At the annual meeting of Jan. 1, 1873, steps were taken looking to the building of a stone church. A special meeting held one week thereafter elected Philander S. Pierson, Samuel Crane, G. B. Nicolai, and Philip H. Harrison as a visiting and advisory committee, whose duty it was to examine various churches, consult with architects and report at a future meeting. On February 22d of this year the committee reported at length, when the parishioners voted to build a church at a cost not to exceed sixty thousand dollars. On the 31st of March following another meeting was held, at which Mr. James H. Carpenter, architect, was present, and submitted plans and estimates. His recommendations were adopted. Messrs. Jonathan Provost, N. O. Baldwin, P. H. Harrison, E. W. Crane, W. J. Best, T. L. Small and J. D. Mead were elected trustees for 1874, and under their guardianship the work of building progressed rapidly, though they were sorely tried financially because of the disastrous shrinkage in real and personal property, which occurred during this eventful year. The real estate of the church located in the village could not be made to realize its fair value, and recourse was had to loans and subscriptions, the landed property being pledged as security. Upon this property as collateral, and by subscription, the necessary amount was raised for the completion of the church.

The cost of building, organ, and furnishing was seventy-four thousand six hundred and eighty dollars. The church occupies the site of the old one. It is of superior architectural design, and is among the most elegant of country churches.

A sketch of this society is not complete without reference to its pastors, whose history is measurably the history of the church itself.

A young man, Rev. Mr. Shepard, was the first stated minister here. He remained but six months. He was a decided Congregationalist, and it was probably due to his teachings that in October of 1785, ten months after the organization of the church, the congregation formally adopted the Congregational form of government, which continued until April 25, 1831, when the church connected itself with the Presbytery of Newark. Mr. Shepard was a spirited preacher, possessed of a lively imagination, and was desirous of permanent settlement, but he is said to have been injudicious in the advocacy of his views, and thus failed of unanimity among his parishioners.

On the 3rd of August, 1787, a call was extended to the Rev. Stephen Grover, of Tolland, Conn., a graduate of Dartmouth College. Mr. Grover accepted, and at once entered upon his duty. His salary was at the time of settlement one hundred and fifty dollars per year, his fire-wood, the use of the parsonage-house and also of the land for tillage and pasturage. His salary was to be increased ten dollars yearly until it reached the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars. His ministrations were most remarkable, both in its successes and duration. An ardent lover of his office, he worked with tireless energy to lead his towns-people to acknowledge the claims of religion. A fluent speaker, animated in manner and method, he quickly found the way to the hearts and consciences of his auditors. His appeals, during seasons of revivals, were often touchingly pathetic, and these occasions were always of gravest interest and solemnity.

Several very interesting revivals are connected with his ministry. The first had its beginning in June, 1796, shortly after the dedication of the church. The people of the entire township were aroused. Rev. Mr. Grover, in the records left by him, remarks, "Inquiring souls truly flocked around this house of the Lord as doves flock to their windows before a rising storm." At the beginning of this revival the church membership was one hundred and eighteen, whereas at the close of 1797 it was over three hundred. During the winter of 1807-8 the church enjoyed another remarkable season of religious interest. In June, 1808, one hundred and fifty-two people united with the church. Several other occasions of special interest during Mr. Grover's ministry remain to be noted. The first occurred in 1825, when thirty-three members were added to the church, and again in 1831, when thirty-seven united with the church; in the year following, 1832, fifteen professed conversion, and in 1833 there were fifty-one received into full communion.

During these later years Rev. Baker Johnson had been associated with Mr. Grover as co-pastor. Rev. Mr. Johnson resigned his pastorate in the summer of 1833, much to the regret of the congregation, who vainly urged his continuance in the pastoral office. In the October following Mr. Grover, then in his seventy-sixth year, retired from service, upon an annuity which was paid until his death, which occurred on June 22, 1836. No citizen of Caldwell ever enjoyed in so full a degree the unvarying regard and affection which were manifested for Mr. Grover, and no one left such a deep and lasting impression upon the minds and hearts of the entire people as did this devoted pastor.

Mr. Grover was succeeded by the Rev. Richard F. Cleveland, who was installed in the summer of 1834. Mr. Cleveland's pastorate extended over a period of six and one-half years. He was possessed of very superior ability, and was fervent and logical as a preacher. During his ministry one hundred and nine people were united to the church. He enlisted the respect and sympathy of his parishioners, and left many warm friends in Caldwell. It was during his ministry here that his son, Grover Cleveland, was born, who now occupies the gubernatorial chair of the State of New York, and in 1884 was elected to the Presidency of the United States.

In 1841, Rev. Samuel L. Tuttle, a graduate of Princeton College and of Auburn Theological Seminary, was settled as pastor. During his pastorate the church was prosperous and united, and enjoyed three revivals of considerable interest. In 1848 the old bell, which was purchased from Daniel Dod, of Mendham, who had cast it for the Newark court-house, was displaced by a new one, at a cost of six hundred and eighteen dollars, and weighed sixteen hundred and twenty pounds. During that year the church grounds were graded and planted with maples and elms, which now add so greatly to the beauty and attractiveness of the village. Mr. Tuttle was a gentleman of nutring energy, a sound and entertaining preacher and popular among all classes of his parishioners. He resigned his charge March 7, 1849.

He was succeeded by Rev. Isaac N. Sprague, D.D., who began his labors Jan. 1, 1850. Dr. Sprague was an earnest and devoted pastor. In the pulpit he was often singularly impressive. He was a revivalist, and during his stay the accessions to the church were four hundred and sixty in all,—a yearly average of twenty-four. During his pastorate the interior of the church underwent repair and improvement, an organ was provided and the cemetery purchased.

He had been pastor of several large and prosperous churches, and was transferred to Caldwell from the Second Congregational Church of Brooklyn. He resigned his charge in Caldwell Jan. 1, 1869. During his connection with the church additions of membership were made as follows: In May, 1851, 48; in March, 1855, 27; in May, 1857, 47; in May, 1858, 61; in May, 1860, 22; in May, 1862, 79; in August, 1864, 22; in May, 1866, 19.

These figures are more eloquent than words in portraying the activity and earnestness of this devoted pastor. His memory will be kindly cherished by all who enjoyed his ministrations.

Rev. Charles T. Berry succeeded Dr. Sprague. Mr. Berry graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1860, and from the Union Theological Seminary, in New York, in 1863. He was installed at Caldwell May 5, 1869. His labors have been signally blessed. In his pastoral work he maintains the high standard of excellence acceded to his predecessors. Both in the pulpit and in his relations to the people he has borne himself with that commendable dignity characteristic of the clergyman of learning, piety and devotion.

Mr. Berry was an earnest co-worker with his people in the erection of the present church edifice. During the year 1870 special interest in religious matters was elicited, and there were seventy-three persons added to the church membership in May of that year. Additions of considerable numbers have been made since, as follows: In May, 1872, 14; in April, 1876, 50; in April, 1878, 14; in April, 1883, 21. The growth of the church, however, is not fully indicated by the foregoing. There have been, during the intervals above noted, continuous accessions on profession and by letter,—a yearly average of twenty-three. The church membership at the present time (October, 1884) numbers five hundred and eleven.

The following is a list of the officers of this church from its organization:

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH of Caldwell was organized by ten steadfast Baptists, who met at Mrs. Underhill's house, in Verona, June 10, 1848. It was first called the Caldwell and Bloomfield Church. The first pastor, Rev. John Q. Adams, was an aggressive preacher. His sermons on baptism evoked a great deal of bitter discussion, and for a season demoralized his field of labor. But he was an earnest man, of large sympathies, and a thoughtful friend, whose companionship was a source of teaching and spiritual profit. His special revivals of 1849 and 1850 were models, in that they were made occasions for simple religious instruction, which was imparted with an enthusiasm that held and inspired his auditors. This church now has a membership of forty communicants. The pastors have been Rev. John Q. Adams, Rev. Messrs. Wheeler, Bates, Hutchinson, Willifer, Balbage, Carpenter, Howell, Steelman and Jones. The Rev. W. G. Thomas, a graduate from Rev. Dr. Spurgeon's theological school in London, fills the pulpit acceptably at the present time.

The present church edifice was erected in 1854.

THE CALDWELL LIBRARY ASSOCIATION dates back to 1804. The stockholders were Jonathan Ward, Silas Whitehead, Matthias Canfield, Cyrus, Nehemiah, Simeon, Nathaniel and Caleb Crane, Zenas, Pzal, Joseph and Samuel Harrison, Col. W. S. and Gen. William Gould, I. W. Ward, Stephen R. and Noah Baldwin, James Cochran, Abijah Williams, Josiah Steel, M. B. Douglass, Jonathan Beach, Stephen Grover, D. Dobbins, Thomas Speer and Justus Burnet.

The library consisted of three hundred volumes. Matthias Canfield was the first librarian. He was followed in this office by Stephen Grover and William G. Crane. In 1835 the volumes were divided pro rata among the share-holders, and this enterprise, which had accomplished much good, was not again revived.

ESSEX LODGE, No. 44, F. A. M., was instituted Nov. 14, 1820. The lodge-room was in an upper room of I. B. Ward's hotel, Caldwell.

The first officers were James Orton, W. M.; Stephen R. Grover, S. W.; Peter Speer, J. W.; John A. Kiersted, Treas.; William M. Miller, Sec.

THE OLD BRASS CANNON, AND WHAT BECAME OF IT.—The village of Caldwell in 1824 had a brass cannon presented to its citizens by Col. Peter Decatur. In 1816 Congress voted Commodore Stephen Decatur two pieces of brass cannon, which were among the trophies of his victories in the war with Algiers. The occasion of the presentation was Lafayette's visit to Caldwell. In firing a salute the old iron cannon, which had remained in the village since the Revolution, exploded, and Col. Decatur generously offered to donate one of the pieces, which had been his brother's. Commodore Decatur, it will be remembered, was killed in a duel with Commodore Barron in 1820. The gift was highly prized. During the war of the Rebellion it was taken possession of by the State, and is now at the arsenal in Trenton.

Verona.—This village, formerly called Vernon, is two miles west from Montclair, and one and one-quarter miles east from Caldwell village. Among its first inhabitants was Mr. Butters, who located near Mount Prospect, one-quarter of a mile south from the Pompton turnpike, probably in 1730. Mr. Butters was a large real estate owner, and the extended area of cleared land in that portion of the village formerly known as Butters town gives evidence of his energy and enterprise. He left no descendants.

In 1776, Mr. Nathaniel Baldwin purchased a large estate from Mr. Butters, which he occupied during his life-time. It descended to his son Lucius. It is now in possession of De Witt C. Baldwin, who is an enterprising farmer and active citizen. The estates of Calvin I. Shafter, Zenas Crane, Charles A. Smith, Marshall Baldwin and Peter Raabie make up the remnant of Mr. Butters' large estate.

George Personette settled in Verona, on what is now known as the Personette homestead, in the year

1740. He was of Huguenot parentage. He taught school during a portion of his life. He was elected an elder of the Caldwell Presbyterian Church in 1784. He died in 1816, aged ninety-three years. His son, John Personette, was born on the homestead in 1751. He removed to Cedar Grove, where he built "the long stone house" in 1782. He was engaged in business at that place, and died in 1844, aged ninety-three years. He had ten children. His son Joseph inherited the Verona estate of his grandfather, and Abraham Personette settled in Caldwell. George and John remained upon the property at Cedar Grove. George died in 1855, when his brother John removed to Orange, where he is now living, in his eightieth year. Joseph Personette left two sons, Jephthah and Stephen, the first of whom inherited the old homestead, while Stephen, who became a successful physician, occupied a small tract near the Newark turnpike, now Bloomfield Avenue. He was born in 1813 and died in 1880. He was prominently identified with church and local affairs for a long period. He established a drug-store, and had an office connected therewith for the transaction of legal business. In 1875 he was appointed physician to the county penitentiary, which office he held until his death. He served his district as representative in the Legislature during the years 1847-48.

The Peter Riker estate dates back to 1750. There are no records, however.

Christian Bone, a botanical doctor, bought a part of this property in 1790. Dr. Bone was born in Hesse-Cassel, and was impressed in the service of Great Britain. He was among the hired Hessian soldiery. His sympathies, however, were with the struggling patriots, and shortly after his arrival he escaped from the British and joined Gen. Washington's army, with which he remained in active service till the close of the war. He was frequently employed in special service. After his settlement in Verona he acquired local celebrity through a vegetable bitters which he compounded. He constructed a dam across Peckman River in 1814, and made the large pond known as Verona Lake. He built the water mill in 1814, and used it as a flour and feed grist mill. He sold this mill, in 1831, to Alfred Hopping, who, in turn, sold it to the Messrs. Corley, from whom it was purchased by Thomas Estlinborough. In 1869 it was sold to Cornelius Jacobus, who supplied machinery for spoke and hub turning. In 1875 it was rented by Slayback & Worman, who are doing a large flour and feed trade. The landlady property of Dr. Bone became involved, and was sold upon foreclosure of mortgages at a merely nominal price. It was finally sold by Caleb Riker to Hiram Cook. The village is greatly indebted to Mr. Cook's energy and enterprise for the valuable improvements made upon this property. He hid it out in villa sites in 1868, and erected six cottages of attractive architectural design. These properties are occupied by Charles Birdseye, Charles H. Ingalls, George W. Dorr, E. N. Cavello, Mrs. Jaeger and Hiram Cook.

A small flour and feed mill was built on the Peckman River, in the extreme north of the village, in 1790, and another dam built, making the Bronze and McConnell's Ponds. In 1830 it was purchased by Nicholas Stag and C. H. Jacobus, who enlarged the building, and provided machinery for wood sawing and turning. They held the property until 1874, when they sold it to Henry Ahlborn, who added extensively to the buildings, and organized the American Bronze Powder Company, of which he is the efficient president. This company is doing a thriving business, and employ from twenty to twenty-five mechanics.

Lemuel Jacobus began the manufacture of brushes in 1832. He was succeeded by his son, Austin G. Jacobus, who has extended the business and employs from ten to fifteen mechanics.

William Pow established himself in the blacksmith's business in 1826, and built a water mill on the Butterstown road, where he engaged quite extensively in the making and polishing of iron steps for carriages.

Stephen Gould established a printing-office, in 1824, on the corner of Bloomfield and Gould Avenues. He employed several printers, and issued law books and blanks. This business was discontinued in 1830.

The first store of the village dates back to 1834. John and Caleb Baldwin conducted the general store business, and were succeeded, by Smith C. Baldwin, Joel D. Mead, Alexander M. Gould, William L. Scott, each of whom conducted the business for varying periods. The first store-house was burned in 1867, and a new one built by W. L. Scott during the same year. Charles S. Simonson succeeded to the enterprise in 1881.

The Verona Smith-Shop was established in 1840 by Isaac N. Potter, and a wheelwright department was attached thereto by Marcus Y. Baldwin. These parties were succeeded by William Brinio, Sylvanus Kitchell and Wheelock Canfield. In 1864, John H. Simonson bought the wheelwright interest, and in 1881, after the destruction of the old building by fire, built a brick shop, and combined the two enterprises, adding facilities for fine carriage making and painting.

J. E. Williams came to Verona in 1865, and entered into partnership with Charles Smith, who conducted the paper and paper stock business, under the firm-name of Smith & Williams. In 1868 the firm dissolved, each member taking a portion of the business. Mr. Williams opened a store for the sale of remnants and dry-goods in 1878, which has had what might be termed a phenomenal success. Customers flock to this store from all parts of the county.

Mr. Williams' real estate is among the best of the section. His residence is one of the finest in the village.

Dr. H. B. Whitehorne opened an office in this village in 1874. His field of practice has extended yearly, and he is known far and wide as a painstaking and skillful practitioner.

Anthony Gould may be mentioned also as among the first to come to Verona. His was followed by three Jacobus families in 1800, who claim no kinship. The greater number of the people occupying Verona Valley at the present time are recent accessions.

Judge John L. Johnson, of the County Common Pleas Court, has a pleasant residence on Gould Avenue. Judge Johnson is an active and influential citizen, to whom Verona is largely indebted for the advance of her educational interests. Before his appointment to this judgeship he was in charge of 1816, near the residence of Judge J. L. Johnson. Owing to local disaffections, a large number of citizens met at night and moved the house across the street on property then owned by Dr. Bone. Shortly afterward it was removed to the old common, near the present school building. Another and better structure was erected in 1851-52, and occupied until 1881. Under the trusteeship of Judge John L. Johnson, Dr. H. B. Whitehorne and William G. Jacobus, a series of school-meetings were held during the spring and summer of 1881, at which, after mature deliberation, it was decided to erect a new building and purchase grounds therefor. The land and brick building cost twelve thousand five hundred dollars. The school is now conducted in accordance with the

the mathematical department of the Newark High School.

Mr. Gustav Cimiotti, who came to Verona in 1881, has built an elegant residence, and is one of the leaders of the village in matters pertaining to its growth and prosperity.

Among the farmers who are utilizing their acres in the reaping of profits from successful croppage are included Frank C. Goble, De Witt C. Baldwin, Austin E. Hedden and Gilbert P. Pease.

Mr. M. McConnell has been engaged since 1860 in the growing of grapes for the manufacture of wines. His products have obtained favor among medical practitioners for their purity and excellence.

EDUCATIONAL.—The first school-house was built in 1816, near the residence of Judge J. L. Johnson. Owing to local disaffections, a large number of citizens met at night and moved the house across the street on property then owned by Dr. Bone. Shortly afterward it was removed to the old common, near the present school building. Another and better structure was erected in 1851-52, and occupied until 1881. Under the trusteeship of Judge John L. Johnson, Dr. H. B. Whitehorne and William G. Jacobus, a series of school-meetings were held during the spring and summer of 1881, at which, after mature deliberation, it was decided to erect a new building and purchase grounds therefor. The land and brick building cost twelve thousand five hundred dollars. The school is now conducted in accordance with the

NEWARK CITY HOME.—The most prominent structure in Verona is the institution known as the Newark City Home. In 1873 the city of Newark purchased the farm of Henry Walker for the sum of twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars. They erected, on a shelving portion of the eastern slope of Second Mountain, a very commodious structure, which cost eighty thousand dollars. The first board of trustees were Mayor N. Perry, George Peters, David Ripley, Joseph Periam, N. J. Demarest, William Johnson, J. C. Ludlow. The design of the institution is the reformation of the wayward girls and boys of the city of Newark. There have been five hundred and sixty commitments, and from this number four hundred and ninety-five have been paroled to their friends or provided with employment among thrifty and industrious people. The work has been attended with marked success. The reclamation of eighty-five per cent. of the whole number committed has been claimed. The first superintendent was Benjamin F. Howe, who had been familiarized with reformatory work in the State School of Ohio. Mr. Howe died in 1880. He was succeeded by C. M. Harrison, who holds the superintendency at the present time.

RELIGIOUS INTERESTS.—The Methodist Church of Verona was the result of the labors of Duane Beach, a local preacher. During the year 1830 he held services in the house of Lucas Baldwin; during the progress of his work a very large number of the people of Verona and vicinity became converts to the Christian faith. As the meetings grew in interest, application was made for the use of the school building. It is said that the trustees were rigid Calvinists, and they objected. The will of the people, however, prevailed, and the school-room became the focus of the new religious interest. The first meeting at the school-house was an overflow, both as to numbers and interest. The phlegmatic trustees themselves were present to protest if there were need, against the innovations, but the unction of the revivalist caught them in its embrace, and before the meeting closed they were praying and shouting in unison with their Methodist brethren. At the termination of these meetings a class was formed and connected with the Bloomfield Church. In 1833 a society was organized, and on February 16th a deed for a church site was obtained from Dr. Bone for the consideration of one dollar. Subscriptions were freely made in money, material or labor. Work upon the building began at once. The corner-stone was laid June 16th. Revs. Manning Force and George Cookman participated in the exercises. The building was finished and dedicated in the year following. This structure was occupied continuously until 1867 with but little repair. It was greatly damaged during this year, however, through the burning of the adjacent stores. In 1873, Rev. E. V. King became pastor, and it is owing to his energy and faithful work that the church and parsonage were thoroughly remodeled and enlarged, at a cost of six thousand dollars, Mr. Hiram Cook being the builder and architect. A debt of two thousand dollars remained upon the property until 1882, when, under the pastorate of Rev. E. S. Ferry, it was liquidated.

The Verona Methodist Episcopal Church has been active and progressive. Its pastors have been noted for their faithfulness, and many for their zeal and fervor as revivalists. The present pastor, Rev. Albert Mann, is known as an able and attractive speaker, and his auditorium is crowded with eager listeners. During the winter of 1884 the church enjoyed a revival remarkable in its interest and number of converts.

The following is a list of the pastors of this church:

Abramam Geerhart, appointed 1834; Samuel Grace, P. B. Day associates, appointed 1835; Curtis Talley, appointed 1836; Wesley Robertson, appointed 1837; C. S. Downes, appointed 1838; J. B. M. Kover, appointed 1841; L. P. Map, appointed 1842; J. S. Beagle, appointed 1843; Austin Gray, appointed 1844; J. P. Fort, appointed 1846; J. P. McGormick, appointed 1847; E. M. Griffith, appointed 1849; David Teed, appointed 1851; A. I. J. Trait, appointed 1859; C. A. Wambough, appointed 1854; S. T. Moore, appointed 1859; John S. Swain, appointed 1857; Thomas J. Williams, appointed 1859; John W. Barrett, appointed 1861; G. H. Winans, appointed 1862; G. W. White, appointed 1864; J. In T. Jackson, appointed 1865; J. E. Hensock, appointed 1867; J. S. Gilbert, appointed 1870; E. V. King, appointed 1873; J. E. Hensock, appointed 1875; Henry J. Hayter, appointed 1878; John L. Hayer, appointed 1879; E. S. Ferry, appointed 1882; Albert Mann, Jr., appointed Nov. 13, 1883.

The first trustees of the church were Stephen J. Gould, Isaac Dobbins, John Baldwin, Mathias Wheaton, Cornelius Gould.

Cedar Grove—PIONEER SETTLERS.—This village is situated in the northeasterly part of the township. Prior to 1815 it was called Peckmantown. A very prominent grove of cedars, on the property now in possession of J. J. Thatcher, used to attract much attention, and Cedar Grove thus came to displace the old name.

The Van Ripers, Vreelands, Doremuses and Jacobuses appear to have been the first permanent residents. The first of these were in Cedar Grove as early as 1730. They have left no records. They were occupied with wood cutting and hauling, and in summer with the cultivation of the limited area of cleared land in their vicinity. These people were the descendants of Hollanders, who settled in Northern New Jersey.

MILLS AND MANUFACTORIES.—In 1790, Noah Sayre, then a resident of Cedar Grove, formed a partnership with John Personette, of Verona, and engaged in the tanning and carrying business. After a brief trial, which proved their business profitable, they added a mill for the grinding of bark and the sawing of lumber, and provided machinery for wood-turning. Mr. Personette sold his interest to Mr. Sayre in the year 1820, who continued the business until 1830, when he retired. His milling property for a time went into decay. He died in 1844, at the advanced age of ninety-four years, leaving no issue.

Richard and Thomas Van Riper built a small turning mill as early as 1770, the site of which is now occupied by Bowden's cotton mill. In 1815, Messrs. Vanderpool, Wallace and others, of Newark, formed a company called the Cedar Grove Manufacturing Company. A mill was built on the site now occupied by John Thatcher for the purpose of spinning cotton-yarn. It was operated for a time, but did not prove profitable. Messrs. Bowden & Stanley, English gentlemen, rented this mill in 1822, and in 1825 it was burned. In 1826, Mr. Bowden purchased the Van Riper turning mill, enlarged it and introduced cotton machinery. His cotton batting became well and favorably known, and he did a thriving and profitable trade. Mr. Bowden was the organist of Trinity Church, Newark, from 1819 until 1835. He traveled to Newark every Sabbath morning, sometimes on foot, to render this service. He died in 1857, aged sixty-seven years. He was succeeded by his son Anthony, who has proved himself a thorough business manager and a public-spirited citizen.

The brush manufactory of John B. Ward was built in 1854; he enlarged it in 1872. Mr. Ward did considerable business, and employed twenty mechanics for a great portion of the year. This factory was burned in April, 1884.

The Marley saw mill was built early in this century by K. Perry. It is now owned by the Marley Brothers, who have added machinery for hub-turning, and who do a remunerative business.

The varnish factory of Messrs. Hastings & Winslow was established in 1880. Mr. Hastings is the resident member of the firm.

AGRICULTURE.—The agricultural interest of this section is well advanced, as represented by substantial results. Mr. Canfield, a pioneer farmer, owned a large estate, which he cultivated with great success. John and William Canfield, his sons, possess the larger portion of this estate, and are favorably known in the markets of Newark for the excellence of their products. In this favorable mention should be included William B. Allen, Henry V. N. Jacobus, Henry T. Jacobus, Isaac Jacobus, Sebastian Taylor, John Martine, Peter Heller and Henry Stevens, all of whom are thrifty and successful cultivators of superior farms.

SCHOOLS.—The first school-house in this village was built in 1770, which was destroyed by fire about 1820. Another was erected, but was displaced by a new and commodious building in 1868. The school of late years has been fully up to the average of its grade. Mr. Alfred Beau-clerc has been principal of this school for several years. He is popular with all classes. The second story of the school-house has been fitted up as a lecture-room, which is used by the citizens for entertainments. It is also occupied upon the Sabbath by the clergymen of Caldwell, Verona, Fairfield and Little Falls, who hold alternate services.

Clinton.—The village of Clinton occupies the lowest lands of the township. A large section is natural meadow and swamp, occupied for pasturage, all of which is subject to overflow.

The first settler of whom we have authentic trace was a Mr. Garrabrandt, who, in 1711, claimed to own these lowlands. A Mr. Bush, who came from Holland,—the great-grandfather of ex-Sheriff William Bush, who now resides in this section,—came here about the year 1711. His son was one of the parties who were dispossessed by the general proprietors. Mr. Bush at one time could have obtained title by the transfer of a yoke of cattle. He shared the obstinacy of his neighbors, and was finally dispossessed. He squatted, however, on another section. This has since remained in the family. His son, Henry Bush, was a man of marked energy of character, and left his impress upon the community. His sons, William and Nicholas Bush, are residents of Clinton. William Bush removed to the West in 1838, when a young man, and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He returned to Clinton in 1843, and purchased one hundred and fifty acres of land, and engaged in general farming. He was for several terms a member of the Board of Freeholders, for nine years assessor, and in 1867 was elected sheriff of the county, in which office he rendered honorable service. Mr. Bush is a leading member of the Fairfield Reformed Church, and has been active in local educational matters. Nicholas is occupied with his farm, and is among the foremost in the Methodist Church Society in Clinton village.

The other pioneers were the Jacobus, Crane and Doremus families, who were bona fide purchasers. Among the squatters were the Bushes, the Vanderhoofs and Massakers. At the beginning of the present century Clinton numbered fourteen frame dwellings and ten log houses. These were occupied mostly by the descendants of the parties above named.

Daniel Jacobus became a resident of Clinton before the Revolution. His son, Gould Jacobus, settled in Cedar Grove. His sons, Elijah and Amzi, are residents of the same village. William G. Jacobus began business in Verona in 1879.

John Husk, a native of Holland, bought a tract of land in 1800. He shot a deer upon his first visit to Clinton, on the spot which afterward became his garden.

His sons, Stephen and Richard, have small estates in Clinton; James and William own farms in Fairfield. James purchased the Caldwell stage line in 1883, and divides his time between his two enterprises.

William Crane had a large section of real estate. He settled thereon in 1800. The homestead part of this property is now held by Simeon D. Pier.

The leading citizens of the closing years of the last and the first of the present century were Capt. Caleb Dodd, Justus Burnet, Timothy Gould, and Zadoc Crane, who owned the major part of the lands of the Great and Little Pieces. These were men of sound judgment, whose counsels were sought, and whose influence was felt throughout the entire community.

The leading farmers of this section are John H. Henion, Isaac Canfield, John De Baun, Daniel Henion, Simeon D. Pier and son, William Bush, Peter Vanderhoof.

EDUCATIONAL.—Clinton organized a school about the year 1790. The old school-house stood near the spot occupied by the barn of J. G. Jacobus. Another was built early in 1800, but displaced by the present one in 1857. The first teacher was a Mr. McKinnie, an Irishman, who taught the school for several years, and who is remembered for his quaint manners and his skill as a violinist. The new school building, erected in 1857, stands at the junction of the Horse-neck, Pine Brook and Fairfield roads. Of the teachers, the people speak in terms of praise of Rodney T. Hyde, whose teaching began in 1820. Mr. A. O. Kent had a successful school in this district for six or eight years. The school is fully up to the average of its grade. Miss Alice M. Mead has been engaged here for the past two years to the general satisfaction of parents.

RELIGIOUS.—The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1823, with six male and perhaps twenty female members. Rev. Manning Force was the first pastor. This and the church at Hook Mountain are under one pastorate. The church edifice was built in 1823. The organization now embraces one hundred and sixty-five members.

Fairfield PIONEER SETTLERS.—This is the oldest village of the township. The Dutch occupied the rich bottom-lands of this section as far back as 1720. There were adventurers, also, who squatted upon favorable localities, some of whom removed early in the last century, while others remained, and their descendants are found both in Essex and Morris Counties. Indeed, many of them were found in the northern parts of North Caldwell, Cedar Grove and Franklin. There are but meagre records, however, of the experiences of these pioneers. As a rule, they were thriftless, ignorant and vicious. Up to the advent of the English-speaking settlers, the spirit of lawlessness was dominant with the large majority of the adventurous people. They were frequently visited by a Mr. Dean, a Separatist preacher from Morris County, who sought to instruct them in matters of Christian faith and duty, but they treated him rudely. They are described, in their intercourse with the Indians as "corrupting and being corrupted, depraved manners and spiritual degradation being thereby increased."

Of the substantial and God-fearing settlers, there were several families. It appears that Simon Vanness owned on the northeastern boundary of the village a large tract of three hundred acres. He obtained a title, probably, through some of the early Indian deeds. He came from Holland as early, doubtless, as 1713. He was a party to the controversy with the proprietors, mentioned in the opening pages of this history. He accepted the terms of settlement proffered, and in 1744, "the third day of September, in the eighteenth year of the reign of George the Second, King, etc.," he obtained a deed from James Alexander, Robert M. Morris and David Ogden confirming him in his possessions. This deed recites that, "whereas John Johnson and George Willocks, late of the city of Perth Amboy, deceased, in their life time did grant in fee simple to Simon Vanness of Essex County, with other lands in their deed & him given" the tract which constituted his estate, and "whereas the parties above mentioned being owners of the West Jersey's Society's patent," the said Alexander Morris and Ogden, by agreement with these proprietors, confirmed, by authority from the general proprietors, the several deeds given by the parties of Perth Amboy previously mentioned. This old deed, now in the possession of Mr. William E. Vanness, is a valuable relic, and helpful in the solution of phases of the long controversy of the primitive settlers with the landed proprietors. The deed whereof this is confirmatory was one of those given by other proprietors, some of which date back as far as 1716.

Simon's sons were Hendrick, Isaac, Evert and Simon. In 1749, after the decease of Simon Vanness, Sr., Hendrick, waiving his right of primogeniture, caused the estate to be divided among the sons above named, and also the sons-in-law, Michael Kook and Cobey Jacobuse. The last were from Morris County, but shared with the sons in the estate.

William E. Vanness, who possesses a valuable farm, a part of the original estate, is now in his eightieth year. Evert was his great-grandfather. Isaac J. Vanness, who holds another large portion of the estate, is a son of Isaac, a grandson of Peter a great-grandson of Isaac, and great-great-grandson of Simon.

David Pier was contemporaneous with Simon Vanness, and shared his experiences. He owned two hundred acres in Pier Lane. His sons were Isaac and David. Isaac entered the Continental army in 1780. During the winter of 1781 when a small body of the American troops were quartered at Pompton Plains, a portion of a company remained for a time upon the Pier property, and Gen. Washington visited them while there.

The large family of Piers and the Vannesses found in this section may be traced back to these two early pioneers. It should be recorded in this connection that Evert Vanness and Isaac Vanness purchased other estates adjoining that of their inheritance. Cornelius Hotfield, Frans Post, William Crane, William, Earl (of Scerling), John Reid, Walter Rutherford and David Ogden were the grantors, and their title, it appears, came through "Sir Thomas Lane and others, called the West Jersey Society."

The names Francisco and Kierstead were common in this village as far back as 1750. In 1754, Aaron Kierstead had a child baptized, as appears upon the Dutch Church records. The Van Droofs numbered several families, some of whom were in Clinton.

These people, who were possessors of real estate, led quiet and unobtrusive lives, and their descendants occupy the greater portions of the real estate owned by their progenitors. They have sustained the Reformed Church of their village, and maintained a school since 1760, when the first school-house was built.

Cornelius Dey established the Fairfield Hotel in 1800. He was followed by his son, Henry, who was succeeded by his son, Samuel. He has added a store, and conducts his affairs on temperance principles.

The Doremuses are also among the early settlers, and are a branch of the Pompton Plains family of that name.

Thomas Speer, whose descendants were located in Fairfield, lived on the Van Houten property, in North Caldwell. He was an early settler. His sons were Richard, John, William, Thomas and Tunis.

Richard Speer established the Pine Brook Hotel. His son, William B., succeeded him. Josiah, another son, was for a long period a justice of the peace, and represented this district in the State Legislature for two terms. Tunis T. Speer settled in Fairfield. His sons were Peter T. and Thomas T. Speer. Peter T. was a land surveyor. In 1864 he was elected county register. Thomas T., now (1884) holds the wardenship of the Essex County Penitentiary.

The grinding of bark became a leading industry of this section. The business was conducted by Tunis T. Speer, Squire Peter and John T. Speer. The several Speer estates in Fairfield have passed into the hands of James Husk, Abram Zeik and Hamilton Walling.

CHURCHES.—The Reformed Church of this village is the oldest in the township. The old octagonal church was built certainly as early as 1730. It stood opposite the present residence of James Husk, Esq. Its early records have been lost. There are baptismal records of the Kiersteads, Boshes and others reaching as far back as 1750. It was for a long period really a branch of the Aequackononek Church, and probably did not support a settled pastor until a long period after the organization of the society. All the pastors up to 1800 were Hollanders and "were known as belonging to the party in the Church, who claimed to supply the pulpits in America from the institutions of learning in Holland." From seemingly good authority, it appears that religious services were conducted from 1720 till 1760 by neighboring pastors. It is the prevalent impression that Rev. John Duryea was the first resident pastor; he preached in the old and in the new church. The present edifice was completed during his pastorate. He owned a quarry, and contributed the stone for the building, which was inclosed and doubtless occupied as early as 1804. The society was broken by dissensions during the progress of building, but was reunited and reorganized in 1817, when the Rev. Ava Neal became the resident pastor. Mr. Neal is described as a gentleman of learning and very able as a speaker. The indulgence of social drinking, however, led to the development of a passion for liquor, and he became intemperate.

The pastors have been as follows: Revs. —

Blauw, supplied pulpit from 1762 till 1768; — Meyer, pastor from 1772 to 1785; — Seydt, pastor from 1789 to 1790; John Duryea, pastor from 1801 to 1817; Ava Neal, pastor from 1817 to 1822; H. B. Stryker, pastor from 1823 to 1827; James G. Ogilvie, pastor from 1827 to 1832; — Raymond, pastor from 1833 to 1835; A. Bronson, pastor from 1836 to 1838; Joseph Wilson, pastor from 1838 to 1845; J. J. Quick, pastor from 1845 to 1849; Joseph Wilson, pastor from 1849 to 1873; E. N. Sebring, pastor from 1873 to 1877; M. M. Smith, pastor in 1877 from April to October; P. S. Pockman, pastor from 1878 to 1881; James H. Owens, pastor from 1881 to present time. The present consistory of the church are, Elders Thomas Sindle, Henry Doremus and William Bush. William Jacobus, recently deceased, was a member of this body.

Among the pastors, Rev. Joseph Wilson occupies the most prominent place, not because of the long duration of his office, but more particularly because of his genial character, learning and ability. He was fearless in the advocacy of what he esteemed the right, and he possessed the aptitudes of leadership in a large degree. He invariably carried his auditors with him, and secured the very general acceptance of his views. He was a warm friend and a devoted pastor, and has left an indelible impress upon this society. Rev. Mr. Quick was an amiable gentleman, an earnest preacher, and popular among his parishioners. Of the later pastors, the Rev. Mr. Pockman, whose stay was regretfully brief to his people, occupies a prominent position as a minister, able as a speaker, affable as a companion and sincerely devoted to his high mission. Rev. James H. Owens, his successor, stands equally well approved. His people are thoroughly united, and the church affairs are in a prosperous condition.

Westville Village.—Caleb Hetfield inherited from his father, Cornelius, a very large estate in Westfield, which he occupied as early as 1730. He held the title to the lowlands, comprising a part of Hetfield Swamp. He was a slave-owner, and held a large number of negro men and women. Although an extensive cultivator of the soil, he is said to have been unsuccessful. The cost of providing for his slaves absorbed very nearly his entire income. He was liberal in his gifts of land to the Caldwell Presbyterian Church, but recreant to the cause of American independence. His pronounced Toryism made him the target of scorn and dishonor. His estate is now held by the families of the Cranes and Harrisons.

The history of this village consists, therefore, of an outline sketch of these families. They have been progressive and steadily prosperous in their avocations, and have controlled large areas of real estate. Many of them accumulated considerable capital from their agricultural and lumber industries.

HARRISON FAMILIES.—Joseph Harrison bought a large tract of land of a Mr. Wright, located partly in Roseland, shortly before the outbreak of hostilities with Great Britain. In 1793 he purchased what was then known as Wright's Island, located in Westfield Swamp. On this property, hidden in the woods, Mr. Harrison found an old log cabin, which the former owner may have occupied before 1750. This old structure had been, from 1780 until 1793, the haunt of a gang of counterfeiters. The extent of their nefarious operations has never been known; they were so secluded in this retreat, and their association had been so skillfully disguised, that they escaped suspicion for a long period. The parties engaged in this unlawful enterprise were Aaron Crane, Dr. Ezol Crane, Richard Hollenbeck, a schoolmaster, Moses Campbell, Thaddeus Russell and Andrew Miller. Some of the apparatus used by these counterfeiters was found in the log house, while several of the dies were discovered in an old building in Caldwell as late as 1847. It is said that they prepared their own paper and executed designs with remarkable skill. When discovered, a quantity of counterfeit silver dollars, having a body of copper coated with silver, was found in their possession, and these were designed for trade in Mexico. Several were incarcerated; the physician and schoolmaster fled before they could be apprehended, and were not afterward heard from, while the weaker of the accessories were left to remain in Caldwell, under a suspension of sentence.

Joseph Harrison served in the Colonial army, and was in the thick of the battle at Springfield. He was a staunch supporter of the measures instituted for the organization of the First Presbyterian Church at Caldwell.

Samuel Harrison, a son of Joseph, acquired a large property of three hundred acres in or near the village of Westville. He was an energetic and skillful farmer, and was prosperous. He was a man of strictest integrity, devoted to his duties, and he contributed liberally to the charities of religion.

His sons, Samuel O. and Cyrus F. Harrison, who located in Caldwell, hold his Caldwell property, to which they have made valuable additions. These gentlemen own excellent farms, to which they devote themselves with gratifying results. They are devoted members of the Caldwell Presbyterian Church, and in all their relations uphold the honorable repute of their excellent ancestry.

Uzal Harrison, a cousin of Joseph, located in Westfield in 1790. In 1798 he built the water mill now in possession of his grandson, George B. Harrison. He was the leading miller of his section. Henry W. Harrison, after Uzal's death, held a large portion of his real estate, from whom it has descended to Ashbel and Henry F. Harrison. Aaron B. Harrison, a younger son of Uzal, bought the grist mill in 1842, where he conducted the flour and feed business until 1864. Mr. Harrison was one of the first Garrisonians of the township. His, on one occasion, was the only "Abolition" ballot cast in this township. His sons, Henry J. and William H., entered the Seventh New Jersey Regiment at the outbreak of the Rebellion. Henry was killed at the battle of Gettysburg. William entered the regiment as lieutenant, and was promoted to a captaincy in 1863. George B. Harrison, a younger brother, bought the Caldwell stage line in 1868. He evinced enterprise in this undertaking, and was prosperous. In 1883 he was elected a member of the House of Assembly.

CRANE FAMILY.—Nob, a great-grandson of Jasper Crane, is the progenitor of the Cranes of Montclair and Caldwell. Samuel Crane settled in Franklin; two of his sons, Caleb and Cyrus, established themselves upon large sections of real estate in Westville. Col. Cyrus Crane left his homestead and a portion of the contiguous lands to his son Asher, who is now living, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. He has been engaged mainly with his farm, though he has held an interest in the wood and lumber business since the death of his father, in 1827. He is everywhere esteemed for his integrity and his munificence in his church relations. His sons, Cyrus and Marcus, are engaged with their father in agriculture. Cyrus has served the township acceptably as chairman of the town committee for several terms. The sons of Caleb, Zenas C. and M. Personette Crane, each held a large property. Zenas C. Crane was a partner in the tobacco business at Franklin for several years. He was a successful business man, and possessed large wealth. He died in 1883, leaving the bulk of his real estate to Caleb, his youngest son, who is occupied therewith in general farming. He is well and favorably known, and was for a term an active member of the township committee.

M. P. Crane was an active and successful farmer. His sons, Caleb G. and Edward W., engaged in the agricultural warehouse business in Newark, where they achieved large success. C. G. Crane served as an alderman for several terms. Edward W. represented his district in the Legislature for two terms, with credit to himself and constituents. The real estate of M. P. Crane is now held by his nephew, Wilson Crane, of Boonton.

PIERSON FAMILY.—Elijah Pierson, one of the first painters in the township, owned the estate now held by Mrs. Samuel Crane. He possessed a small farm. David H. Pierson, one of his sons, evinced scholarly aptitude in his youth. He received a collegiate education and entered the ministry, but afterward opened a classical school at Elizabeth. In his work as an educator he achieved an enviable reputation. He resides at Elizabeth.

INDUSTRIES.—The saw mill in Westfield was built by Caleb Westfield. It, with much of his other property, passed into the hands of the Cranes. This mill was burned in 1851. It was promptly rebuilt, and was for a long period held jointly by Nathaniel S., Moses P., Zenas C. and Asher Crane, each party owning a certain number of shares. Samuel Crane, a son of N. S. Crane, was an owner, after 1857, of several shares, and he was the business manager until his death in 18—. He was succeeded by his son, Nathaniel N. Crane, who conducts the business at the present time. The mill is supplied with modern machinery.

CANFIELD FAMILY.—Matthias Canfield was born in Orange, 1775. After the completion of his term of apprenticeship with Matthias Smith, of Bloomfield, he purchased the tanning and currying business of Zadoc Baldwin, in the village of Caldwell, in 1800, and continued it until 1817, when he sold to Abram Personette. He built and occupied the house now owned by Joel D. Mead. He sold his Caldwell real estate and removed to Westville, where he purchased real estate from Joseph Gould. He is remembered for his sturdy qualities and for his active influence in local affairs.

Cyrus Canfield, a son of Matthias, occupies the old homestead, which he has greatly improved. He is a thorough and successful farmer, and is active and influential in town affairs, having held a place in the township committee for several terms. Samuel Canfield has a farm on the south side of the village, which he has cultivated with profit, while Isaac N. is located at Franklin, on the Henry Francisco property. Matthias S. is a resident of Caldwell.

North Caldwell—PIONEER SETTLERS.—This village occupies the most elevated lands of the township. It was originally covered with extensive forests of oak and hickory, the most valuable of the native hard woods. The soil is fertile and the drainage excellent. As the forests disappeared the more favorably located areas were cleared, and the village now possesses large tracts of fine arable land. Settlements were made very early in the last century by yeomen devoted to the wood and lumber interest. These people, for the sake of convenience and economy, located in the near vicinity of the water-springs, of which there were many, while the country was largely a forest. The roads, too, originally were known as "wood-paths," being laid out with reference to convenience in wood-hauling, and they date back as far as 1730.

The oldest accessible records show that Henry Bush, from whom a part of the present village took the name of Bushtown was among the first of the pioneers who remained upon their settlements. Hendrick Kollier (sometimes Choller or Collier) owned a considerable tract; Aaron Simons, John Tindall, Jacob Garabrantsen, Henry Stager, Thomas Sanford, Josiah Gould, William Libbey, Azariah Crane and Joseph Baldwin and Van Riper were the principal land-owners, and had their estates fairly well improved before the Revolutionary epoch. Their descendants are in possession of the greater portions of these old estates.

Joseph Baldwin was succeeded by his son Noah. The sons of the latter, Joseph E., Noah O. and Marcus Y. Baldwin, possess this estate at the present time, and are actively engaged in lumber and agriculture.

The last named is favorably known alike for his intelligence and generosity. He has represented his township in the County Board of Freeholders for several terms.

In 1770, Stephen Gould purchased the Ashfield tract from John Taylor, of Burlington.

Josiah Gould also held a large property. Stephen J. Gould was born on the old homestead, and succeeded to the estate. He was a progressive and successful farmer. He died in 1882, eighty-two years of age. He was one of the first trustees of the Verona Methodist Episcopal Church, and held that position until 1873. Two of his sons, Caleb and Charles B., are residents of North Caldwell, the latter having acquired title to the homestead. He is a thrifty farmer, and active in church and educational circles.

Jonathan Beach built a stone house in the northern portion of the village, probably in 1749. This property is now held by Jonathan Davenport. The estate of Thomas Sanford is occupied by branches of the Stager family. The Evert Van Zile farm passed to David Kent, from whom it was purchased by Thomas H. Stager, who has greatly improved it. It ranks as one of the finest properties of this vicinity. The old stone house built by Elias Courter and his landed estate were occupied by a son, John E. Courter, who died at a very advanced age, after which the house and a part of the land were purchased by William Rickard.

Jacob Jacobus, who built a substantial stone dwelling in the last century, was followed by his son Aaron and grandson Jacob, after whom a son-in-law, Peter Francisco, inherited the property. His sons, Barney and Frank, share this well-known estate.

David Harrison, Jr., bought a farm in North Caldwell, where he settled about 1770. He was an active and enterprising young man, and soon became prominent in public affairs. His excellent abilities and sound judgment were utilized by his towns-people, for whom he acted in the capacity of magistrate and legal adviser. He was a judge of the Court of Common Pleas and commissioner of deeds. His property is now held by Amzi Mintonye.

John Noe owned a section of land adjoining Joseph Baldwin. He is another of the hardy pioneers who did yeoman's service in battling the wilderness. He has left an unsullied name.

The other families in this vicinity are, with few exceptions, "to the manor born," and of the accessions since 1800 it may be said they are mainly from old colonial families.

EDUCATIONAL.—The first North Caldwell school-house dates back to 1770. Another was built shortly after 1800, but was burned down. A small building took its place. This was succeeded by the present neat edifice, which was built in 1871, under the trusteeship of Charles B. Gould.

Throughout this entire section it seems that it was the proverbial Irishman that did the first teaching.

The earliest recollections of the oldest inhabitants of this village are most vivid touching the experiences of a teacher whose name was Roorke or O'Roorke. He was a martinet, and certainly did good work; but he was not a teetotaler, and his exhibits as a drunken master perhaps more than the excellence of his teaching has prolonged the memory of his career.

The teachers of recent years have been ladies, and the school ranks among the best of the ungraded schools of the township. The trustees of this district are Chas. B. Gould, Sherman Paddock and Francis Sindle.

one of the founders of Newark. He had four sons,—John, Jasper, Deliverance and Azariah. The last named, who died in 1730, aged eighty-three years, was married to Mary, daughter of Capt. Robert Treat, and had four sons,—Azariah, John, Robert and Nathaniel. The latter married Elizabeth Gibson, to whom were born six children, Noah, of this number, being the great-grandfather of the subject of this biography, and the brother of Samuel Crane, a resident of Montclair until his later purchase of the property in Franklin, Caldwell township. His son,

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

SAMUEL CRANE.

Joseph Crane, who died in 1681, came from England and settled in Connecticut. From thence he removed, in 1666, to New Jersey, and became Nathaniel S., married Jane Lee Durges, who was of Huguenot ancestry, and had children,—Samuel, John D., Caleb S., Henry W. and Jane E. (Mrs. Nelson Pierson). Samuel Crane was born on the 16th of November, 1810, on the homestead in Caldwell township. He was accustomed from his early youth to labor, and enjoyed but limited advantages of education, a careful habit of observation, together with intelligent reading, having done much in later life to supply this want of his boyhood days. He was employed in various capacities, the farm, the cider mill and the saw mill in turn demanding his attention.

On the 6th of February, 1834, he was married to Miss Maria, daughter of Elijah Pierson, of Caldwell, to whom were born children,—Jane L. (Mrs. G. W. Steel), Nathaniel N., Anna M. G. and Eliza C. (Mrs. G. W. Poole). On his marriage Mr. Crane purchased a share in the saw mill, the capacity of which he greatly increased. This he conducted successfully during his lifetime, but a few years later secured a farm opposite the homestead, and made it his home for nine years, when the present family residence—the Pierson homestead—was purchased with the land accompanying it. He was an intelligent farmer, with a love for agricultural pursuits. He availed himself of superior to any personal consideration. Mr. Crane was in his religious faith a Presbyterian, and a trustee of the church of that denomination in Caldwell. His death occurred on the 19th of December, 1874, in his sixty-fifth year.

"He left behind, not wealth nor fame,
But flowers that to ever fade;
A quiet trust—an honest name,
A spirit undismayed."

many modern appliances which science has devised to aid the farmer in his labor, and brought wisdom and foresight to bear in his varied operations. Mr. Crane was formerly a Whig in politics, and later became a pronounced Andrew Jackson Democrat, though not an active politician. He was identified with the township and its interests, serving as freeholder and in other capacities at various times. His known integrity and scrupulous exactness caused his services often to be sought as the custodian of important trusts, while his broad and generous spirit made him not only respected, but beloved in this community. His convictions were firm, and the demands of duty ty, where he was an enterprising farmer. Among his children was Samuel, who also followed the employment of an agriculturist in Caldwell township, of the same county. He married Mollie Baldwin, of Bloomfield township, and had children,—Caleb, Cyrus, Zenas, Nathaniel, Dorcas, Mary and Elizabeth. Caleb was born on the homestead in Caldwell township and succeeded to the employment of his father. His wife was Lydia Personette, of Cedar Grove, Essex Co., whose children were Maria, Samuel G., Elizabeth (Mrs. Gershom Freeman), Moses P., Zenas C. and Lydia P. (Mrs. George C. Stute). The birth of Zenas C. occurred Oct. 22, 1804, at the parental abode in Caldwell, in the immediate neighborhood of which his life was spent. Not satisfied with the meagre advantages of the district school, Mr. Crane spent a portion of his boyhood at a school near his home, and on completing his studies assisted in the cultivation of the farm. He later engaged in butchering for a brief period, and subsequently, with his brother, Moses P., embarked in the manufacture of shoes. In connection with George C. Steele, he became a manufacturer of tobacco, and conducted the business for a number of years, ultimately returning to the farm, which he cultivated from 1839 to 1849, when the tobacco interest was resumed, his partner being David Campbell. After an interval of farming, he removed, in 1880, to Caldwell, where his death occurred on the 10th of July, 1883. Mr. Crane was married, on the 17th of October, 1833, to Miss Mary, daughter of Rufus Harrison, of Livingston, Essex Co., N. J. Their children are Marcus H., married to Ellic Muzzy, of Springfield, Ohio; Caleb, married to Rachel A. Jacobus, of Mottville, N. J.; and Annie M. (Mrs. Lewis G. Lockwood). Mr. Crane was active in the direction of the City National Bank of Newark. He was formerly a Whig in his political views and later advocated Republican principles, but was in no sense a politician. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church of Caldwell, in which he officiated as elder until his death.

LIVINGSTON TOWNSHIP.¹

THE narrative of the township of Livingston lacks most of the essentials to make it vividly interesting. It is a great rural district, and its history is without stirring events. The tract now comprising the township was within the bounds of Newark, and was controlled by the authorities of that place until 1797.

At that date two townships were created,—Caldwell and Springfield,—and from these was taken in about equal portions the territory that is to-day known as Livingston. This was in the year 1813.

Just when the first settlers took up their abode here it is impossible to tell, as there are no dates recorded that cast light on the subject. It is known, however, that Whippany, in Morris County, was settled about the year 1685, and a road or pathway from Newark thence was established about the same time, and the course of this pathway lay through the southern part of Livingston. Immediately thereafter there were settlements along this road, and by the beginning of the last century a number of families were permanently located here, following such pursuits as their respective talents suggested for the purpose of procuring a livelihood.

The settlers about the villages of Newark and Elizabethtown turned their attention entirely to tilling the soil, and at an early date had removed a great share of the forests, and as the locality grew in population there came to be a demand for wood for all purposes, greater than could be supplied from the immediate vicinity. The luxuriant growth of hickory, oak, chestnut and white-wood beyond the mountains then attracted attention, and the work of cutting and hauling began. At first those engaged in the business drove from Newark to the woods and back again daily, but the advantage of being constantly upon the ground was soon manifest, and a few of the more sturdy men engaged in the work determined to locate at the scene of their labors. Accordingly, log cabins were built which were first occupied by men alone; subsequently, when small tracts about the cabins had been cleared, their families came, too, to assist in providing for their wants and to relieve them from the monotony of their work.

In the northwestern part of Livingston, not far from Eagle Rock Avenue, there are a number of springs, the waters of which unite and form a splendid stream that flows southerly and empties into the Passaic River just north of Chatbam. As early as 1701 this stream was known as Canoe Brook, and the name was applied to designate the section of country through which it ran. How the name originated is not positively known, but there is a tradition that a family of Indians remained in the township until somewhere about 1750. A little before the French and Indian war broke out they became anxious to remove from the neighborhood for a place where their people were more numerous. In the absence of the conventional birch, they stripped a fine chestnut of its bark entire, and making it into a canoe, took advantage of a spring flood, passed down the brook to the Passaic, thence to the Hudson River, and by that to Canada. This incident, however, were it true, could scarcely have given rise to the name, as Canoe Brook Swamp is referred to in records as early as 1700.

About the year 1730 the proprietors of East Jersey began to appropriate the lands of this section, a survey being made in that year, for John Burnet, of a tract along the Passaic River north of the Whipponing or Hanover road. In the southern part of the township the first survey of lands was made in 1741, for John Stiles, and covered a tract of fifteen hundred and eighty-six acres, and included the lands occupied at the present time by David and Bern Dickinson, and running as far north as the farm now owned and occupied by Isaac S. Crane. This land was subsequently divided into sections of one hundred acres and sold, and they were long known as the Canoe Brook lots. Surveyors have relied upon the monuments and bench-marks fixed and described in this old survey for their data for surveys up to the present time. Among the first settlers on this tract were Timothy Meeker and Effingham Townley, Jr., both of whom came from Elizabethtown. They were extremely active in populating the place, Meeker being the father of no less than eighteen children, and one of his sons is accredited with two more than that number. Some of their descendants still remain in the township.

Among the early settlers on the west side of the township were Epaphras Cook, Joshua Burwell, Enoch and Noah Beach, and William Ely. From its proximity to the place of the first-named the bridge across the Passaic at Hanover was long called, and is by some still known as, Cook's bridge.

That portion of the township now adjacent to Caldwell was settled by the Harrisons, Wards and Tompkins.

In 1742 and 1744 large tracts of land in the southwestern part of the township were surveyed for Lewis and Andrew Johnston, of Perth Amboy. One of these tracts on the Passaic, containing 782 acres, was purchased in 1744 by Nathaniel Camp and Jonathan Squier, the consideration being £391, and in 1773 the sons of Squier and Camp bought an adjoining tract of 694 acres, for which they paid £1156. These transactions show that the place was growing and that land was advancing in value quite rapidly.

It will be noted that the growth of the southern part of the township, which has been known in later years as "Northfield" at one point, "Morhousetown" at another and "Cheapside" at another, was in the earlier days in advance of the other and northern parts. That it was so will not be doubted, when it is remembered that the road now known as Northfield Avenue was the first road over the mountain from Newark to Whippany, through Livingston, and was the route taken by the New York and Easton stage line. The old turnpike, which was built and owned by a company chartered by the State Legislature, did not open the road at present known as Mount Pleasant Avenue until 1807, more than one hundred years after the old road had been in use. The Swinefield road (Eagle Rock Avenue) has been in use a little more than one hundred years. It is a rather singular name, and came from the fact that a number of large farmers about Tory Corner were in the habit, in the spring of every year, of driving large herds of swine by that route to the Passaic River, near what is now Swinefield bridge, leaving them there to pasture through the summer. The place was an excellent one, and was found to be decidedly profitable. The roads throughout the township were for the most part opened between the years 1760 and 1780. Wagon-paths were made by the settlers for their own convenience, and subsequently they were surveyed by the surveyors of highways, and their courses recorded.

In the year 1775, on the road between the corner where the Northfield Church stands and Orange, there were but four families,—i.e., David Dickerson, Timothy Meeker, John Meeker, and Samuel Pierson. Twenty-three years later, 1798, the number had increased to ten, or nearly as many as there are at the present date. The names of the heads of families in 1798 were David Dickerson, Abner Ball, Everitts Townley, Timothy Meeker, Isaac Meeker, Jonas Meeker, John Townley, Corey Meeker, Jonathan Meeker, and Zenas Pierson.

Schools.—The value of education was fully appreciated by the sturdy men of these early times, and before the close of the war for independence the subject of a school building was agitated. During the year 1782 a small stone building was erected a short distance southeast from where the Northfield School building now stands, and that served the double purpose of a school and meeting-house until the Baptist Church was built.

Religious.—The larger number of the inhabitants came from Elizabethtown, and many were members of the Baptist Church located at Lyons Farms. The only other church of that denomination in this part of the State, north of Scotch Plains, was at Morristown. Through the efforts of the parent church at Lyons Farms a mission was established at Canoe Brook, and it was styled the Northfield. Meetings were held at first in the houses of those most interested in the cause, and on the 19th of April, 1786, a church organization was effected, with a membership of eleven persons, nearly all of whom were dismissed from the church at Lyons Farms with that object in view. The names of the eleven were Obed Dunham, Mary Dunham, Timothy Meeker, Thomas Force, Jr., Sarah Cook, Moses Edwards, William Meeker, Mary Corey, Content Edwards, Desire Edwards, Timothy Ward, Jr. The clergy present and officiating were the Rev. Ebenezer Ward, Rev. William Van Ness, Rev. George Guthrie, and Rev. Reune Runyon. The last named was the pastor of the ancient church at Piscataway. The Rev. Mr. Guthrie was from Kentucky.

The Rev. David Loofborrow was called to the pastorate of the church in 1787.

The first public baptism took place on the 17th of June, 1790, when Abner Ball and Rachel, his wife, were baptized in Canoe Brook by the Rev. Ebenezer Jones. Three weeks after, on July 10th, Mr. Ball was elected church clerk, and held that office for more than half a century. He was also elected president of the board of trustees, and was deacon in the church from the year 1798 to the time of his death, which occurred May 21, 1848.

The Rev. Stephen Dunham followed Mr. Jones in the pastorate of the church, but remained only a short time, on account of differences between him and some of the congregation.

In 1801 the church became a legal corporation, and assumed the name of the Northfield Church. The Rev. David Loofborrow was called to the pastorate of the church in 1787. The necessity for a place of worship became seriously felt at an early day, and many were the discussions in reference to it and to its location. The latter caused some dissension, and as three prominent places had been proposed, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

* Whereas, three places have been proposed for building the meeting-house.

Resolved, that three subscription papers shall be circulated, one for building at each place proposed; that the house shall be built at the place to which the largest sum of money shall be subscribed; the other subscriptions to be void.

Notwithstanding this expedient, the question, which was so important for the welfare of the church, was not soon settled. Several years later the site on which the cozy little structure now stands, including four and a half acres of land, was selected in deference to the wishes of Moses Edwards, who was not only the largest subscriber towards the building fund, but was one of the most ardent workers in the church. The land was purchased of Squire Burnet. A few of the active workers took umbrage at the selection of the site over one they had proposed, and declined to contribute in any way towards the construction of the edifice, illustrating thereby that human nature was materially the same then as now.

The old Burnet house, which still stands, and is occupied by the venerable Smith Barnwell, was fitted up as a temporary place of worship, and was used as such for some time. Somewhere about this date the Rev. Isaac Price officiated as pastor for a short time. Then followed the Rev. Caleb Jones for a year or two, and after him came the Rev. Ebenezer Jayne. A Rev. Mr. Briant also served the church a short time.

The progress of this church under such adverse circumstances, and with so many changes, was necessarily slow, and it was at a stand-still spiritually and temporally. Towards the close of the last century, however, Moses Edwards, the same who had done so much towards the building, began to labor to strengthen the church spiritually. He was a good and noble man, and soon developed rare powers as a speaker, and more than ordinary ability as a student in matters pertaining to theology. The church recognized his ability and devotion, and at the request of many of his friends, he applied for a license to preach, which was granted to him May 5, 1798. Three years later he was ordained a minister of Christ. His week-days were spent in work upon his farm or in his blacksmith-shop,—the only one for miles around,—which left him but little time for preparation for his Sabbath-day duties; but he was extremely apt in the application of Bible truths, and was an eloquent speaker. His work was highly appreciated by his little flock, and their affection for him was deep. He received no stated salary, but the voluntary contributions of the congregation were very liberal. Mr. Edwards continued his ministrations until the year 1815, when, with his family, he removed to Clermont, Ohio. His farewell sermon was preached to the largest congregation that had ever assembled in the church, and it was with deep regret and unfeigned sorrow that his congregation parted with him. He was the father of Enoch Edwards, and grandfather of Deacon Tobias Edwards, who died not many years ago, leaving Enoch, George and Stephen, and two daughters, Hannah and Tripheny, the first-named son and daughter occupying the old homestead.

About the year 1801 the society built the old church on the site now occupied by the present one. It was dedicated to the service of God, Dec. 22, 1801, and was a source of much comfort to the congregation. The names of the ministers that presided over the destinies of the little flock for a number of years thereafter are as follows: The Rev. John Watson, ancestor of the present family of Watsons residing on Mount Pleasant Avenue; the Rev. Augustine Elliott, who came from South River, N. J. He was a native of England and a tailor by trade. The Rev. Elisha Gill came next, and he was followed by the Rev. John Hancock (a Methodist), the Rev. Stell E. Randolph, Rev. Isaac M. Church, Rev. Josiah Jones, Rev. John H. Waterbury, Rev. John Q. Adams, Rev. Thomas Davis, Rev. Mr. Hinds, Rev. Samuel C. Moore, Rev. Willard Howell, Rev. John T. Craig, Rev. James L. Davis, Rev. A. C. Knowlton. The present pastor of the church is the Rev. Alexander S. Bastian, who also serves the Livingston Baptist Church.

The ecclesiastical organization of the Livingston Baptist Church occurred on June 17, 1851, with a membership of fourteen persons, and in 1884 had a membership of fifty. The house of worship stands on the north side of Mount Pleasant Avenue, near the corner of Canoe Brook Avenue, and was built in 1852, and has a seating capacity of two hundred and fifty. Since its organization eighty persons have been baptized into the church. The present pastor, the Rev. Alexander S. Bastian, is the tenth. The names of the pastors, arranged in the order in which they have served the church, are: Revs. G. G. Gleason, Thomas Davis, Thomas M. Grenell, H. W. Webber, J. B. Hutchinson, Samuel C. Moore, J. T. Craig, James L. Davis, A. C. Knowlton, Alexander S. Bastian. The church edifice, furniture and grounds cost five thousand dollars, and the parsonage and furniture two thousand dollars. The church has an invested fund of three thousand dollars, and is entirely free from debt.

Early Houses and Mills.—The first dwellings occupied by the people, as heretofore stated, were log cabins, but the ingenuity of man soon supplied something better. At several points on the swift-running streams that coursed through the country were eligible sites for the development of water-power, and it was made available by the erection of saw mills. These turned out clapboards of white-wood, white oak and other wood, and the framing timber was hewed out of oak, while shingles were split from chestnut and oak. Chimneys and hearths were made from stones picked up in the fields, of which there was an abundance. Bricks for chimneys were also used in the early history of the township. They were made at two brick yards established near Canoe Brook, the site of one of which is still marked by a pond-hole about a quarter of a mile east of the turnpike road on Canoe Brook Avenue. The other was located on what is now known as Burnet Hill, near the residence of Samuel H. Burnet. The bricks were very soft, and not fit to compete in the market with those from Haverstraw, in New York State, but they served admirably for chimneys, and for filling in between walls of dwellings, thereby making them solid and comfortable.

The great abundance of good timber afforded plenty of work for the people, as it was cut off and used for wagon-making, for which it is very superior, building purposes, or carted to Newark or Elizabethtown and sold. The price was very low, varying from two shillings and sixpence to five shillings per two-horse load, according to quality and the demand for it. Of the five saw mills that were in existence at one time in the township, not one is now left. The old saw mill of Deacon Thomas Foree, located on Canoe Brook, midway between the Northfield road and the turnpike, was revived in 1852 by John Emmons, but timber at last became so scarce that even that had to be abandoned. At the present time a few men get a livelihood by carting firewood to Orange, but little or no standing timber is to be found in the entire township.

The part taken by the inhabitants in the Revolution, while not sufficiently prominent to draw much attention to the locality from the outside world, was marked enough to prove its thorough loyalty to the cause of independence. Elijah Squier, son of Jonathan, served as captain of a militia company, and did excellent service in the cause. Timothy Meeker, with eleven sons and one son-in-law, all fought in the battle of Springfield, and drew much attention to themselves by their zeal and bravery. The raids of the British soldiery on several occasions caused serious loss, but nothing in comparison with that of the people below the mountain. The latter many times were obliged to abandon their homes, and then they were wont to take refuge in a natural hiding-place known as the Round Hollow, which is situated on Cedar Street, a short distance north of Northfield road. The place was also used on many occasions as a place of worship before the public school-house was built.

Taverns.—The first hotel or public house in the place was kept by Samuel Burnet, grandfather of Samuel N. Burnet, and it occupied the spot where the latter's house now stands. This old sign-post stood in front of the place until 1836. The old hotel was a great convenience to the people traveling by the old stage line. After the opening of the turnpike, in 1807, as it was kept in better condition, the stages took that road to Orange, Newark and New York.

Then the old hotel, corner of Canoe Brook Avenue, was established, and it became a famous hostelry both for the stages and for farmers on their way from Sussex, Warren and Morris Counties to the Newark market.

About fifty years ago considerable business was carried on in the place in the manufacture of shoes. Nearly every farmer learned shoemaking, and worked at it during the winter months, and one or two persons carried on business and employed quite a number of hands. Among these were Samuel H. Burnet and Smith Barnwell, both of whom are living. A great many individuals took out work from the large shoe manufactory of Ichabod Condit, subsequently Joseph A. Condit, in Orange, who were engaged almost entirely on Southern work. The breaking out of the war, and the introduction of machinery in shoemaking, put an end to that kind of work here.

In the war of the Rebellion Livingston did not take a conspicuous part, but to its credit, be it said, it was always prompt in responding to the calls of the government. At no time was a draft forced upon the town. As each call was made for troops its quota was promptly filled, and that mainly through the exertions of Samuel H. Burnet, who represented the county of Essex at Morristown, and looked after its interests in the matter of disbursing the county bounty and procuring volunteers.

In the year 1879 a grange was formed in Livingston, which has had a membership of upwards of seventy at some times, and for a long time its membership has steadily exceeded fifty. Its first Master was Rufus F. Harrison, and its present Master Joseph H. M. Cook. It has done a valuable work in the matter of educating farmers in the more advanced methods of farming, and there are growing evidences of thrift which can be attributed to its influence. It has still a further work to perform in that direction, and will doubtless succeed in doing it.

BLOOMFIELD took its name, in 1796, from Gen. Joseph Bloomfield, afterwards Governor and chancellor of New Jersey. Local names had become attached previously to separate settlements during the slow growth of a hundred years. "Second River" was designated by the Newark Town Council as a district of Newark in 1743-44 for that portion of the later Bloomfield now known as Belleville. "Cranetown" became a popular name for the western portion towards the mountains at about the same early time. "Watseson Plain" and "Wattseson Hill" were the hill and the plain in the southern part. "Newtown" was applied to the straggling settlement eastwards well down the present Belleville Avenue. The "Morris Plantation" had drifted into "Morris's Mill" or the "Morris Neighborhood." The "Stone House Place" for the northern end appears as early as 1695. "Crab Orchard," as colloquial for land then covered by crab-apple trees north of the old church, and "Hopewell" as an invention of the young men for the same region, had died a natural death.

If a native name was to be selected, Waterson or Watsessing should have been chosen. This Indian name is said to mean crooked or elbow-like, and to have been applied to Third River, the principal stream of the present town, which is very crooked throughout its course, and which makes a large elbow near the centre of the town.

Gen. Bloomfield, who had come into notice during the Revolutionary war, was now recognized throughout the State as a rising man. His public services and personal popularity directed attention to him at the critical time. His name was chosen, and the honor tendered was acknowledged in circumstances alike creditable to the people and to him. The choice was the act of the Presbyterian congregation then worshipping for some time in "the Joseph Davis house;" and inasmuch as the people were then beginning the erection of a house of worship, a white marble tablet, with the inscription, "Bloomfield, 1796," was set in the brown freestone tower, to mark the beginning of a new township.

The next year Gen. Bloomfield paid the town a visit with a military escort, in formal recognition of the honor done him. The civil township, however, was not erected until 1812, when it included the territory from the crest of the mountain to the Passaic River.¹

Earlier and Later Outlines—The tongue of land bounded by the curve in the Passaic River was originally divided between the Puritan and the Dutch colonies. The mountain was the ridge of the tongue. The whole breadth of the middle and the southern portions was Newark, and its settlement proceeded from the "town on the Passaic."² The smaller portion of the tract—the tip of the tongue—was Acquackanonk, and its settlement proceeded from the Bergen colony, through Hackensack and through the nearer Indian village of Acquackanonk Passaic, at the head of navigation. The line between the two was the original line of the Newark colony in 1666. The eastern line at that time was defined to be the "Pesayac River," and to reach northward "to the Third River above the town," and the northern boundary "from thence upon a northwest line to the mountaine."

The mountain was the west line of the Newark colony, or the Newark town proper.

The purchase from the Indians in 1666 did not define a west line. The corrected deed of sale in 1677-78 specifies "that it is meant, agreed and intended that their bounds shall reach or goe to the top of the said Great Mountaine and that Wee, the said Indians, will marke out the same."

The Town Patent or Charter was not given till 1713, and has a complete boundary. It specifies the land

"Purchased from ye Indians, now known by the name Name of Newark, Bounded easterly by a great creek that runs from Hackingsack Bay, through ye Salt Meadow Called by the Indians Wespahick and now Known by ye Name of Bound Creek, and continuing from the head of ye Said Creek to the head of a Cove to a Markt Tree from thence it Extended Westerly upon a straight Line, by Computation seven Miles be the Same more or Less, to the End or foot of the Great Mountaine and to the Ridge thereof, called by the Indians Wading Near where Runs a branch of Rahway River from thence extending in a Northernly Course along the Edge of the said Mountaine to a heap of Stones, Erected to Ascertain the Boundary between the said Town of Newark and the Town of Aquackanonk, from thence running a Southernly course by Aquackanonk Bound Line to where the Brook or Rivulet Called by the Indians Yant'kah, but now Known by the Name of the Third River, Empteth itself into Passayack River, and from thence continuing Down along by the said Passaic River and Hackingsack Bay to the mouth of the said Bound Creek."³

This gives us the west and north and east line of what became afterwards Bloomfield.

For one hundred and thirty years, however, before Bloomfield received its name the territory was identified with the Newark township, and it was not until one hundred and forty-six years from the first settlement that it received a separate town charter.

The township of Newark, designated for provincial convenience, was much broader. It extended far westward beyond the upper Passaic.

The town definition for the use of the province, first made in 1693, is as follows:

"The township of Newark shall include all the land from the mouth of the Bound creek, and from thence to Bound Hill, from thence North-west to the partition line of the Province, and from the mouth of the said Bound creek up Passaic River to the third river, and from thence to the partition line of the Province."⁴

The southern line of Bloomfield was established in 1806, when the township of Newark was divided by

Joseph Bloomfield was captain in the Third Regiment of the New Jersey Regulars in 1776. The regiment, commanded by Col. Elias Dayton, was sent that year to support the Northern army in Canada, but it was diverted from Albany to the Mohawk Valley. Capt. Bloomfield brought Lady Johnston, of Johnston Hall, as a prisoner to Albany. The regiment went on to the German Flats and to Fort Stanwix, Rome, N. Y., to which place Capt. Bloomfield returned from Albany, bringing the news of the Declaration of Independence. He was made major in December, 1776, and was present in the battles of Brandywine and Monmouth, and resigned his commission in 1778 to accept the clerkship of the Assembly. In 1781 he was attorney-general of the State, and was re-elected to that office in 1788. In 1794 he was general of militia, and took part in the suppression of the "whiskey insurrection" in Pennsylvania. He was Governor and also chancellor of New Jersey in 1801, and from 1803 to 1812. In the war of 1812 he was appointed a brigadier-general. He died in 1829, and was buried in Burlington, where he had resided for many years.

its own authority into three wards,—the Newark Ward, the Orange Ward and the Bloomfield Ward. The Orange Ward became that same year the township of Orange and the Bloomfield Ward became the township of Bloomfield in 1812. The line between the Orange and the Bloomfield Wards was established in 1806, as follows:

"Beginning at the Green Island in Passaic River, and running from thence to the Boiling Spring on lands of Phineas Baldwin, dec'd., and from thence to the Bridge at the Slough between the houses of Jonathan Baldwin and Elihu Pierson, and from thence to the bridge near Martin Richards', and from thence to Turkey Eagle Rock, on the top of the first Mountain; which we agree shall be the line between the Bloomfield Ward and the wards of Newark and Orange."

Internal Divisions.—The benevolent care of the poor was the occasion of the first internal division of the Newark township. The "inhabitants of Second River and the Body of Newark" acted separately "in all affairs relating to the Poor" for fifty-three years. The line of division established, was in part the line which afterwards divided Belleville from Bloomfield. The description given in 1743-44 is as follows:

"Beginning at Passaic River at the Gully near the house of Doctor Pagan, thence northwest to Second River, thence up the same to the Saw Mill belonging to George Harrison, thence a direct line to the north-east corner of the Plantation of Stephen Morris, thence to the Notch in the mountain, leaving William Crane's house to the southward thence on a direct line to Stephen Van Sic's Bars, and Abraham Franckes's to the Northward of said line, and it was agreed that all on the Northward of said line should be esteemed Inhabitants of Second River, and all on the Southward of the Body of Newark."

This Notch is not the "Great Notch," which is beyond the town limits, but undoubtedly the little opening in the mountain just north of the present Mountain House.

This line crossed the mountain to the upper Passaic and so recognized either the provincial division of Newark or the aspiration of the Newark settlers for further territory. The division continued until Bloomfield had received its name in 1796, and until within three months of the time when Second River took the name of Belleville, on July 4, 1797.¹

Belleville became a separate township in 1839. It took from the township of Bloomfield about one-third of its territory, and established the line between them as follows:

From the great boiling spring at the corner of the township of Orange "northerly on a straight line to a point on the northerly side of the old road leading from the village of Bloomfield to Newark, midway between the dwelling-houses of Charles R. Akers and Nicholas Coughlin; thence on a straight line to the northwest corner of the roads nearest to and north of the bridge across Randolph's pond; thence on a straight line to the northwest corner of the roads leading to Franklinville and Morris's Mill, near Peter Groshong's dwelling-house; thence along the west side of the road leading to Franklinville to the division line between said Groshong and lands late of Abraham Pake, deceased; thence, westwardly along said division line and the northern line of lands of Stephen Morris, to the centre of the Morris Canal; thence, along the middle of said canal northwardly, to the southern line of said canal of Christopher Mandeville, thence along said Mandeville's line to the western line of said road, to the corner of the road leading from Franklinville, to Stone House plains; thence northwardly on a straight course to a point in the eastern line of the road near the late dwelling-house of Garret P. Jacobus, deceased, where the line of Acquackanonck township, in the county of Passaic, crosses said road."

"Cranetown" by popular designation became after 1812, West Bloomfield, but was incorporated as Montclair in 1868. The incorporation took away another third of the original Bloomfield, on its western side. The line between Bloomfield and Montclair was located as follows:

"Beginning at a point in the centre of the stone arch bridge over the stream crossing the road west of and near to the residence of Henry Stucky, on the Orange line; thence, from said starting-point in a straight line, about north thirty-one degrees five minutes east, to a point in Passaic County line, which point is five hundred feet west, on said county line, from the centre of the road running in front of the residence of Cornelius Van Houten."

The present township of Bloomfield is four and a half miles long, by an average breadth of one and three-quarter miles.²

The township of Acquackanonck lies on the north, Belleville and Newark on the east, Newark and Orange on the south, and Montclair on the west.

Surface, Streams and Soil.—Between the natural boundary of the mountain crest on the west and the natural boundary of the Passaic River on the east lies an unusually diversified and beautiful expanse of country. Parallel waves or ridges of land run from north to south. The mountain slope descends into plain and valley, and rises again upon a wave nearly the length of the township, known now as the Ridgewood line. This territory forms the beautiful region of Montclair.

The Ridgewood eastward slope spreads out into a level plain between the Second and Third Rivers and along these little streams, and swells upwards again in knolls and crests to the brow of another eastward ridge. This territory forms the picturesque and diversified region of Bloomfield.

The eastward ridge, broken by the Third River valley at the north and by the Second River valley at the south, slopes to the Passaic, and constitutes the attractive town of Belleville.

The water system of Bloomfield is simply tributary. Only two small streams, dignified by the historical names of Second and Third Rivers, traverse the region and empty through Belleville into the Passaic. They furnish numerous sites for mills and manufactories, but their insufficient water-power has long since been supplemented by steam.

¹The division was discontinued on April 10, 1797.

The geological formation is sandstone, with trap underlying the mountain. The loamy soil was rich formerly in timbered uplands, in orchards, meadows and farm lands; but the undulating surface is so diversified in attractive sites for residences that the whole town is being rapidly occupied as a suburban home of the cities.

Indian History.—The early Indian history is connected with the general purchases of the Newark colony. Few native names have been preserved as specially connected with this portion of the tract—hardly more than Yauntakah as the name of Third River, Wachung as the mountain, and Watesson, Wattesson or Wattessing, the crooked stream. The Hackensacks continued numerous for some years. Outbreaks were sometimes feared, as in the time of King Philip's war in Connecticut in 1783, but no disturbance occurred here. As the natives were a peaceable tribe and their lands were honestly purchased, they quietly withdrew. The last one left the region for Canada in 1761.

Early History.—The period of the early history may be considered as extending from the year of settlement on the Passaic to the times of the Revolution.

THE DUTCH MOVEMENT.—The Holland colony at Bergen flowed northward to Hackensack, then westward to Acquackanonk (Passaic), and thence still westward over the mountain, and southward into the Newark colony. The strongest Dutch settlement within the region which became Bloomfield was "Second River." The northeast portion of the township was filled with Dutch farmers. That portion became known in more recent times as Franklin, and fell within the boundaries of Belleville. The north-west settlements became Stone House Plains and Speertown.

The Dutch purchase at Acquackanonk was from the Indians in 1679, and from the proprietors in 1684. The lands laid out in strips for farms ran parallel with the northern boundary of Bloomfield, and the migration swept over the boundary and possessed the northern part of the town. The northern end of Horseneck was filled almost exclusively with Holland people down to about 1800, and their reactionary southeast movement gave the township of Bloomfield some of its best citizens. At length the Holland blood was mixed with the Puritan, and the Holland families are now found in all parts of the town.

Some of the oldest names are Speer or Spier, Thomason, Arant, Vreelandt, Uriansen, Van Siles, Francisco, Kiper, Cadmus, Garrabrant, Van Kiper, Jerolesmon, Low and Kidney.

Vincent is a very old name of French Huguenot extraction, but at first was associated with the Hollanders.

Their church was established at Second River in 1727, and another Reformed Dutch Church was built at Stone House Plains on the opening of the present century, 1801.

THE PURITAN OR NEW ENGLAND COLONY.—The principal early population, however, was a portion of the Newark colony. The New England colonists were neither petty settlers of a little village nor were they great landed proprietors. They aimed at the possession of a large tract, but their purpose was a division into small plots for equal citizens. Many of those who established themselves on a "home lot" in the first village, and took up a meadow lot in the salt marshes, took up also an "out-lot" or a "mountain lot" in the northern and western part of the town. Their children found their way to these lands and became the first out settlers. Once past the swamps behind the Newark hill, they pitched on the Watesson lands or on the Second River sites, and followed the fenceless wagon tracks which forked to the mountains.

THE EARLIEST NAMES.—Owners of land are found in the southern part of the Bloomfield region within nine years after the Newark settlement.

In 1675, Stephen Davis, Robert Lyman, Hans Albert, Jonathan Sergeant and Matthew Canfield have land "in the mill-brook swamps," northwest of the Newark settlement, in the region along the present Morris Canal.

In 1679, Samuel Ward and John Gardner and Jabez Rogers have land at the mouth of the Second River.

John Ward, dish-turner, Elizabeth Ward (Ogden), Elizabeth Morris, John Ward, Sr., Samuel Harrison, Edward Ball and Thomas Pierson have land from 1675 to 1679 at or near the Second River.

Samuel Dod takes land in 1678-79 "on Watesson" and Daniel Dod, Thomas Richards and Thomas Pierson near or on "Watesson plaine" or "on Watesson Hill;" and at about the same time Benjamin Baldwin at Watesson Hill and Second River.

Jasper Craine, Thomas Huintinton, Samuel Kitchell and Aaron Blachley are owners of land "at the head of the Second River," "in the branches of the Second River," "by the first branch of the Second River." In 1775, Robert Lyman, John Baldwin, Sr., Richard Harrison, Samuel Swaine, John Catlin, Hannah Freeman, Thomas Johnson, Anthony Olib, "at the mountain," probably on the borders of the present Orange and Montclair.

Elizabeth Ward and Samuel Plum locate lands also on the Third River in 1679, and Samuel Plum "by the Orquekanunc lynce."

We do not know that there was a house built in all the region before 1695, but these were the inhabitants in the sense of land-owners who used the tracts as wild lands or woodlands or grazing lands. There are at the least about sixty of them definitely known in the general territory extending from the present Orange border to the Acquackanonk line from the mountain to the Passaic.

Towards the end of the first quarter of the new century houses begin to appear.

EARLY ROADS.—A highway is to pass through the lands of Elizabeth Ward (Ogden), and of Elizabeth Morris "near" and "by" the Second River in 1675.

There is a "third going over," supposed to be a third crossing or ford of Second River, on Thomas Pierson's land about 1678. A north and south highway bounds Matthew Camfield's land on the Third River, next to Benjamin Baldwin, in 1698.

A highway is to pass through Elizabeth Ward's (Ogden's) land "by the Third River," which land adjoins Samuel Plum's land by the "Ocequekanunclyn" by the great river, in 1679.

These points in roads indicate rough wagon tracks, during the first early years of settlement, northwest towards Watson, through the present centre of the town towards the "Morris plantation," and northwards from the Newark village through the present Belleville to the Acquackanonk line.

The road to the present centre of the town from the Newark settlement undoubtedly bent northeastward to pass around "mill brook swamp." It then found its way past "sun fish pond," over "Watson Hill" to the Second River, to the plain between that river and the Third River and to lands on the Third River farther north.

In 1675 the east and west line of Aaron Blatchley's land, "by the first branch of y^e second river," is a highway. This is, no doubt, a rough road from the Newark settlement westward to the lands of Crane, Huntington, Kitchell and Blatchley, in the upper part of the present Montclair. Surveyors are chosen in town-meeting, on Dec. 12, 1681, "to lay out highways as far as the Mountains if need be, and Passages to all Lands." An east and west highway lies along the south side of Matthew Camfield's land, "by the mountain path," next Thomas Huntington, in 1698. A road from the town to the mountain crosses "Bushie Plain Brook" near a saw-mill in 1712.

These signify, no doubt, the early road or roads from the settlement to "Newark Mountains," as Orange was at first called.

A road from Stephen Morris' mill, "up the hill," as the hill "will allow," was laid out in 1762. This is, no doubt, the Bay Lane road, and it indicates that the old Cranetown roads, from "Isaac Dodd's corner" and from the Caleb Davis house, and the road westward on Watson Plain to the mountains, were already in existence.

EARLY HOUSES.—We do not know that there was a house built in all this region before 1695. John Baldwin, Sr., in 1679, was to have one extra acre, by vote of the town, added to his "second division of upland" for "his staying on his place the first summer." This seems a special inducement for him to remain somewhere on the outlands of the Newark tract, whether within or without the present Bloomfield.

Thomas Davis had "liberty to set up a saw mill" in the summer of 1695. It has been supposed that this was the saw mill on a site near the pond above Wheeler's paper mill, in Montclair. The existence of a saw mill points to coming houses. Thomas Pierson's "fence" appears below Watson Hill in 1695. Anthony Olive's house, on the border of Orange, near Wigwam Brook, makes its appearance in 1712, and the same year a saw mill, near or on "Bushie Plain Brook," which brook crossed the road "from the town to the mountain."

The first authentic dates of dwelling-houses are two,—the house of David Dodd, afterwards occupied by his son, Amos Dodd, still bearing in the corner-stone the initials of himself and wife, "NOLM 10, 1719, D. S. D." (Nov. 10, 1719, Daniel Sarah Dodd), the present dwelling-house (1884) of Chester Gilbert; and a dwelling-house of Abraham Van Geisen, on the east bank of Third River, near "Canoe Swamp." There was also a "mill lately built" (a grist mill, probably) in 1720 on the Third River, on Capt. John Morris' plantation, and also a dwelling of one Vanneviklor, near Toney's Brook, in 1724. Among other ancient houses without authentic dates are the following: the Joseph Davis mansion, opposite the Revolution; the Abraham Cadmus house, on Montgomery Street; the Moses Farrand house, below Watson Hill, Washington's temporary quarters (now an inglorious unused elder mill, with honorable bullet scars in the old shell); the Thomas Cadmus house, on Washington Street, since known as Washington's headquarters; the old house far down on Belleville Avenue; the Ephraim Morris house, removed some years since from the grounds of Mr. Thomas; and the old Crane houses, in Montclair.

A good number of these ancient houses were built of stone, for in 1721 the freestone began to be quarried for the market. The chimney and the big oven built outside the house indicated the Holland family.

Samuel Ward's mill (a wooden mill) was in existence in 1725; and George Harrison's saw mill, at Montgomery, either in 1728 or in 1740.

With mills to saw and a mill to grind and a mill to card the wool, and abundance of field-stone or even quarry-stone, the houses multiplied henceforth.

The Revolution and its Traditions.—When the Third Battalion was called for by Congress, and by the State, in 1776, Joseph Bloomfield, then from Bridgeton, appears as the captain of the Seventh Company.

The larger part of the enlistments from the northern part of Newark were in the militia rather than in the regular service. The following officers from Essex County, in 1777, were quite likely from this territory: Lieutenant Colonels, Jacob Crane, Mathias Ward and Thomas Cadmus; Major, Caleb Dodd; Captains, Amos Dodd, Henry Joralemon, Abraham Speer and Cornelius Speer.

The following officers are without date of enlistment: James Joralemon, (wounded afterwards at Springfield,) John Kidney, Josiah Pierson, Samuel Pierson, Thomas Seigler, Isaac Smith, Henry Speer, Jonas Ward; Jesse Baldwin at first ensign, then lieutenant, then quartermaster, then quartermaster in the regular army; Second Lieutenants, John and Joseph Crane and James Spear; Sergeants, Obadiah Crane, Joseph Crowell, Samuel Jones, who lost a leg in Newark in 1782; Musicians, Benjamin and David D. Crane.

There are among the privates from the county thirty Baldwins, among them Daniel, David, Ichabod, Israel, Jabez, Jesse, Jonathan, Matthias, Lewis, Silas, Simson and Zophar, fourteen Balls, among them Daniel and Joseph; four Cadmuses, Henry, Isaac, John and Peter; twenty-nine Cranes, among them Aaron, Amos, Elias, Israel, James, John, Mathus, Moses, Nathanael and Phineas; eight Davises, among them John Jonathan Joseph and Peter; twenty-two Dodds, among them Abiel, Abijah, David, Ebenezer, Isaac, John, Joseph, Moses, Parmenas, Thomas, Timothy and Uzal; Thomas Dorenius; three Franciscos, Anthony, John and Peter; eight Freeland and three Vreelands; four Freemans; Garrabrant Garrabrants and two others of the name; fifteen Harrisons; four Jacobuses; three Joralemons, one of them Halmock; five Kings, among them Aury; six Kingslands; David and Davis Morris; seven Ogdens, among them John; thirteen Osborns, Osbornes and Osburns; Richard Powelson; Isaac and Peter Riker; six Spears and Speers; eleven Taylors; two Van Houtens; five Van-Rikers, among them Cornelius, Gerrit and Morris; four Van Winkles; John and Levi Vincent; and seventeen Wards, among them Bethuel, Caleb, Caleb, Jr., Jacob, Joseph, Nathaniel, Samuel, Timothy and Zebina.

A large share of these persons whose names are selected from the rosters were from this outlying part of Newark. They took their place, some as minute-men, some in the regular troops and many as militia, ready for an emergency, such as they were called to face in the battle of Springfield.

The Declaration of Independence, it is said, was first read in this region at the school-house on Watsessing Hill.

There were two campaigns of the Revolution which touched this region,—the retreat of Washington through New Jersey in 1776, and the attempts of the British on Washington's position at Morristown, through Connecticut Farms and Springfield, in 1780.

When, after the battle on Long Island, in September, 1776, Washington's army retreated across the Hudson to Acquackanonk, and then fell down to Newark, Newark as a township is no doubt meant. The army in rapid retreat marched, no doubt, on parallel roads, and the old road over Watsessing Hill and Plain was probably one of these roads. The tradition is that when Washington came to the Joseph Davis house he found it occupied by Gen. Knox and sick soldiers, and refused to displace them in order to make it his quarters. It is quite likely that he went on over the hill, and took temporary quarters at the Moses Farrand house. When the army swept on to Newark village, and a detachment moved through Orange, both portions of the army pursued by the enemy, the people fled over the mountains and into Stone House Plains.

The two pastors of the people, Dr. Alexander MacWhorter and Rev. Jedediah Chapman were zealous patriots, and were compelled to flee: Dr. MacWhorter in the council of Washington. The posts on the mountain crest were filled with watchmen, the rear of the mountain with refugees. The whole region was ravaged for plunder. The Hessians swept through Watseson and East Orange. When the reaction came, on Washington's return through Trenton, Princeton and Monmouth to Morristown, the people returned to their desolated fields and plundered houses. "Whiskey Lane" still remains as the name given to one of the roads where whiskey was seized by a British company, or where whiskey itself seized the raiders.

At the battles of Connecticut Farms and of Springfield, in 1780, the militia of the whole region seized firelock and sword. The captains, the major, the lieutenant-colonel from this region were among them; and Washington was delighted with the patriotism and bravery of the people. He was just then on the march from Morristown to the Hudson, but he moved slowly, and was temporarily in Bloomfield, at the Thomas Cadmus and the Stephen Fordham houses.

The Hollanders were patriots equally with the Puritans, as the names of the officers have shown. The adventure of Capt. John Kidney, Capt. Henry Joralemon, Jacob Garlon and Halmock Joralemon shows them in the raids which shot back and forth across the marshes and the sound. The story is that with fleet horses and a common wood-sled, on a wild wintry night, they crossed the marshes to Bergen, proceeded to a school-house where British officers and soldiers were making merry, surrounded and took the house, with their mighty force of four, muffled and secured an officer and a refugee, regained the meadows before the alarm-gun fired, took the prisoners to the Morristown jail, and returned the heroes of the day among their old neighbors.

The Later History from the time of the Revolution.—Patriotism, education and religion were the passions of the Puritans. Each of these passions took form in unusually bold expression in Bloomfield. The "Common," the parading-ground of citizen soldiers, was spacious and central. It was laid in front of the church lot, which was already occupied with material for the new edifice. The academy, which soon followed the church, was a massive edifice for a rural community in the early century. It included in its plan of education, in connection with neighboring pastors, missionary and theological training, and sent many young men into the ministry. It was the culmination of the excellent common schools long before established and of the catechetical instruction of the Puritans.

The stone church, far larger than their present need, with foundations and walls wisely laid for successive enlargement and for modern adornment, was the concrete symbol of their value of religion.

The Presbyterian Church was identified with the name of the town and with the larger body of the people. The Reformed Dutch Church at Stone House Plains was identified with only a section of the town.

The church at Newark village became the First Presbyterian Church of Newark in 1756. The church at Newark Mountains became the Second Presbyterian Church in Newark in 1783, afterwards, the First Presbyterian Church of Orange. The Bloomfield Church became the Third Presbyterian Church of Newark; the congregation organized in 1794, the civil society in 1796 and the ecclesiastical body in 1798.

According to the proportion of members taken from the two older churches, about two-thirds of the people had attended previously the Orange Church and about one-third the Newark Village Church.

Services had also been held a long time in the little school-house near the church site, and for some six years in the Joseph Davis house. The Rev. Jedediah Chapin, of Orange, the last clergyman of the vicinity who wore the three-cornered cocked hat as the badge of the ministry, catechised the children at the school-house.

No doubt the building of the new edifice was stimulated by the erection of neighboring churches after the Revolutionary war. Churches had been built at Elizabeth in 1785, at Newark in 1790, at Springfield in 1791, at Caldwell in 1795-96.

A parchment subscription in October, 1796, contains fifty-nine names with five subscriptions of one hundred pounds each and other subscriptions all the way down to one pound. The Baldwins, Cranes, Dodds, Morrises, Wards, Balls, and Davises constituted about three-fifths of the population in the Puritan part of the town at that time. The Vincents, Cadmuses, Cockefairs, Urianees and Garrabrants were the principal Holland names among the Puritans. The sum of the parchment subscription in 1796 was £1615 4s., or $4038.

The second subscription, in 1798, "for the use of the meeting-house" amounted to £737 12s., or $1844. It was a large enterprise, and there was little wealth. All were workmen,—Samuel Laurence Ward was the architect, and Josiah James, of Newark, also superintendent of construction; Aury King, chief mason, associated with Henry Cadmus and Henry King. The managers of the building were Simeon Baldwin, Nathaniel Crane and Joseph Davis. The trustees in 1797 were Samuel Ward, Ephraim Morris, Oliver Crane and Joseph Davis.

Gen. Bloomfield made a visit in 1797 in recognition of the honor done him in giving his name to the town, was publicly welcomed by the people, and contributed one hundred and forty dollars to help on the building. Mrs. Bloomfield presented a pulpit Bible and psalm-book. The services began in the edifice in 1799, before the windows were in or the floors were laid, and the first Sunday of the new century opened with the new pastor.

The building has since been twice enlarged. Fifteen feet were added in length in 1853, and a handsome transept Sunday-school room was completed in 1883.

The original elders and deacons in 1798 were Simeon Baldwin, Ephraim Morris, Isaac Dodd and Joseph Crane; the original membership, eighty-three persons.

The succession of pastors has been Rev. Abel Jackson, 1800-10; Rev. Cyrus Gilder-leeve, 1812-18; Rev. Gideon N. Judd, D.D., 1820-34; Rev. Ebenezer Seymour, 1834-47; Rev. George Dunfield, D.D., 1847-51; Rev. James M. Sherwood, 1852-58; Rev. Ellis J. Newlin, D.D., 1859-63; Rev. Charles E. Knox, D.D., 1864-73; Rev. Henry W. Ballantine, 1877-84.

The Reformed Church.—The Holland people in the northern part of the town were no doubt connected with the neighboring Dutch congregations at a day quite as early as the Puritans of the town with their own. The Dutch Churches were on the west at Horseneck, on the north at Totowa, on the northeast at Acquackanonk, and on the southeast at Second River. While such men as Berthoff, at Acquackanonk and Second River, were abounding in apostolic-missionary journeys, and the learned and humble-minded Meyer was at Totowa and Horseneck, and their associates or successors, Coens, Van Sanvoord, Hoeghoort, Marinus, Leydt and Schoonmaker were caring for the Holland people all the way down to 1794, the Holland farmers of the Franklin, Stone House Plain and Speertown neighborhoods found attractive churches and pastors at hand. Their natural affinity was at Acquackanonk and Second River. However early the school-house was erected, there was the preacher in an occasional service in the Dutch tongue and later in the English. It is probable that Stone House Plains was first a regular preaching-station under the Rev. Peter Stryker, who came to Second River in 1794. Under him the Reformed Church at Stone House Plain was organized in 1801. The first church edifice was erected in 1802. The present edifice, built of freestone and ten feet longer than the first, was built on the old site in 1857, the spire completed in 1860-61. The Rev. Mr. Stryker served both churches for some years. The Rev. Staats Van Sanvoord seems to have succeeded him as pastor of the two churches, and the two churches continued together until 1826. The succeeding pastors have been Rev. John G. Tarbell, 1827-28; Rev. Alexander G. Hillman, 1836-41; Rev. Eben S. Hammond, 1842-44; Rev. William Thompson, 1845-46; Rev. Robert A. Quinn, 1847-49; Rev. John A. Leiddell, 1849-50; Rev. John Wiseman, 1851-52; Rev. Peter S. Tallrage, 1853-65. During his pastorate the new church organized at Franklin in 1855 was for a time under his care. Rev. Benjamin J. Stateser, 1866-72; Rev. John Kershaw, 1873-82; Rev. William G. E. Lee.

A good number of the Holland people, such as the Cadmus, Joralemon and Kidney families, residing among the Puritan population, were also connected with the church at Second River.

Other Churches. The Presbyterian Church of West Bloomfield, a colony from the Bloomfield Church in 1838, the Methodist Episcopal Church in that part of the town, St. Luke's Church and the Church of the Immaculate Conception, which have their early history as a portion of Bloomfield, are placed in the history of Montclair.

The Reformed Church, the Episcopal Church, the Methodist Church, the Roman Catholic Church of Second River, and the Reformed Church of Franklin, although all originating in the original territory, either of the Newark colony or of Bloomfield, have their place in the history of Belleville.

The Reformed Church at Franklin sprang out of a preaching-station at which the preaching was supplied from 1849 to 1855 by the pastors both of Stone House Plain and Belleville.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH of Bloomfield was originally on the Second River circuit. Services were held at first in the house of Mrs. Naomi Cockfair, above the Morris neighborhood. A small stone church was erected there in 1822, Rev. Manning Force and Rev. Benjamin Collins officiating as early pastors. Rev. Mr. Wiggins and Rev. Isaac Winner were on the circuit in 1828 and 1830, the circuit including Belleville, Bloomfield, Cedar Grove, Caldwell, Orange, etc. James Wilde and his son, Henry Wilde, whose woolen manufacturing and print-works were in West Bloomfield added, with their English Wesleyan workmen, a strong force to the Methodist Society, so that a church was erected in 1836 between the two villages. From this central location two parts went out, one to Bloomfield and the other to West Bloomfield. The society in the "Coit neighborhood" meanwhile had become a "class." The Coit stone building was taken down, and used in 1853 in the erection of the present edifice on the park in Bloomfield. This edifice was enlarged and adorned in 1881, and a new Sunday-school room added in 1883-84. Prominent among their many pastors have been Rev. G. R. Snyder, 1853-54; Rev. Sylvester H. Oplyke, 1858-59; Rev. Joseph R. Adams, 1865-67; Rev. Stacy W. Hillard, 1868-70; Rev. Stephen L. Baldwin, D.D., 1871; Rev. Henry Spellmeyer, D.D., 1872-74; Rev. Edson W. Burr, 1875-77; Rev. Warren W. Hongland, 1878-79; Rev. Richard Harcourt, 1881; and Rev. Daniel R. Lowrie, 1882-84.

THE WATSESSING METHODIST CHURCH is an offshoot from this church, and was organized in 1872.

A PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHAPEL was erected on the "old road" from Bloomfield to Newark in 1830. It was a weak organization, and was after several years disbanded. The building became private property.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH was organized in a private house in 1851. The society secured a ritual of the old Franklin school-house in 1852, where their first preaching services were held. Their public recognition as a church took place in the lecture-room of the Presbyterian Church on Feb. 13, 1852. Their house of worship, built of brick, at the junction of Franklin and Washington Streets, at a cost of eight thousand dollars, was opened in 1853. Their five pastors have been the Rev. John D. Meeson, 1852-53; Rev. James H. Pratt, 1853-58; the Rev. Henry F. Smith, D.D., 1858-68; the Rev. William F. Stubbert, D.D., 1869-1875; and the Rev. E. D. Simon, from 1876.

THE GERMAN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH received strength and nurture from the pastor of the Presbyterian Church, the Rev. James M. Sherwood. It was organized by him on Jan. 1, 1855, and worshiped in the lecture-room of the old church for some ten years. Their first stated supply of the pulpit was the cooper-tour, Charles H. Theberath, who continued his services through the year 1858. Rev. Christian Wisner, while still an elder of the church and a theological student, was his successor, and was the first regular pastor from 1864 to 1867. Their second pastor, from 1868, who was also an elder in the church, is the Rev. John M. Ensslin. Their church edifice was dedicated on July 1, 1866; it was built at a cost of five thousand three hundred dollars, and a parsonage at a cost of three thousand dollars is in process of erection, in 1884.

THE FIRST FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH of Bloomfield had its origin in a Bible class under Mr. Volney Elliott in 1857-58. The organization was completed on July 7, 1858, in the vacant Primitive Methodist Chapel on the old road to Newark. It has not attained a public edifice nor a settled pastor, but devotional services have been held for some years at private houses.

CHRIST CHURCH was established as a mission of the Episcopal Church in 1868,—the Rev. Samuel A. Clark and the Rev. Henry B. Sherman acting for the executive committee of the Protestant Episcopal Society in the State of New Jersey. The first services were conducted by the Rev. Mr. Sherman in Union Hall. The Rev. Henry B. Barstow officiated until the Rev. Henry Marsh was appointed the stated missionary.

The church was organized as a parish on Oct. 4, 1858. A lot for a church edifice was at first purchased on the turnpike, but the site on Liberty Street on which the church now stands was deemed more desirable. The church edifice was erected during the winter of 1860-61 at a cost of two thousand five hunired dollars. It has since been enlarged and improved, and a rectory and a school building have been added. The following have been the rectors: the Rev. Henry Marsh, 1858-63; Rev. Charles Ritter, 1863-64; Rev. W. A. Maybin, 1864-65; Rev. Albert Z. Gray, D.D., now dean of Racine College, Wisconsin, 1865-68; Rev. W. H. Carter, D.D., LL.D., 1869; Rev. Mr. Martin Amstout; Rev. T. J. Danner, 1872-76; Rev. William G. Farrington, D.D., from 1877. During the rectorate of the Rev. Dr. Carter two mission organizations were begun, one in Watsessing and the other in the Franklin district of Belleville.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, at Watsessing, had its origin in a weekly service established in 1869. A chapel was soon built, and the organization was recognized as a mission of Christ Church in January, 1870. In 1875 the chapel building was removed to Dadd Street, just over the town line, and the church became St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church of East Orange. The church became independent of its mission relation in 1876, and called its first rector on May 11, 1876. The rectors have been Rev. William White Wilson, 1876-80; Rev. Daniel I. Edwards, from 1880.

THE WESTMINSTER PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH is a colony of the original Presbyterian Church. It was organized in the old church in January, 1870. The first preaching service was held in the academy building on July 11, 1869, and worship was continued there and in Eaclean Hall until the next summer. The chapel was during that time in process of erection on the church lot at the corner of Franklin and Fremont Streets, the old church assisting the new in the erection. The edifice was dedicated and the first pastor installed in September. The two pastors have been the Rev. Duncan Kennedy, D.D., 1870-81; Rev. Samuel W. Duffield, from 1881.

THE CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART is a colony of the Church of the Immaculate Conception of Montclair. The Montclair parish had previously included in its care all the Roman Catholics from Caldwell to Watsessing. The Bloomfield parish was organized on July 1, 1878, under the supervision of Rev. J. M. Nardiello, the present and only priest. The cornerstone was laid July 28, 1878, and the church was formally dedicated on November 17th of that year. The church has a handsome parochial school building, constructed of stone, trimmed with brick, and a priest's residence.

Schools and Education.—The history of schools and of education may be divided into three periods.

1. The early school period before the erection of the academy.

The school and the church were in close union among the Hollanders. We may believe, therefore, that the establishment of a Dutch Church at Second River in 1827 was either accompanied or soon followed by a school.

The Puritan settlements from 1719 onwards no doubt developed some form of instruction outside the incipient schools of Newark village.

The oldest tradition, however, does not point to a school-house earlier than 1740. The memory of the Cranetown people places their first school-house in that year.

The first authentic record is in the foundation-stone of the Watsessing Hill School-house, which announces its first construction in 1758, and its addition on the east end in 1782. Both parts were built of stone. It remained standing till 1852, when it made place for the house of Mr. Jay L. Adams.¹

At some time before 1780, Thomas Davis gave a quarter of an acre of land for a school-house site "near the house of Capt. John Ogden," which was near the present house of Mr. Jason Crane. But in 1782, Caleb and Joseph Davis, probably the grandson and the great-grandson of Thomas Davis, exchanged for the quarter-acre a new half-acre at the corner of the Newtown road. On this new lot was placed, at about 1782, a wooden building, which was soon after burned, and a small stone edifice took its place.

After sixty-seven years the half-acre was enlarged by additional purchases on the east side. The little stone school-house in 1849 gave way to a substantial brick building, located on the recent addition, and the lot of 1782 became a portion of the present school play-ground behind the Presbyterian Church.

The only person of whom we have definite knowledge as connected with the schools before 1790 was the boy Stephen Dodd, then eleven years of age, who went to school on Watsessing Hill, or, as it then probably began to be called, the Franklin School-house.

Alexander Wilson, the celebrated ornithologist, was for a time teacher in the upper school-house; tradition has it that in lively spirits he wrote the qualities of the good people of the time in doggerel verse. But the earliest teacher of whom we have full information was Mr. Amzi Armstrong, a young man about seventeen years of age, who taught on Watsessing Hill in 1788 or 1789. He came from Florida, N. Y., and twenty years later, as Dr. Amzi Armstrong, became the successful principal of the academy. He studied theology under the Rev. Jedediah Chapman, of Orange, while he was teaching in the Franklin School-house, and was called to be pastor of the Mendham Presbyterian Church in 1796. One of his successors was the son of Mr. Armstrong's former pastor in Florida, Mr. Amzi Lewis, Jr., who was teaching here in 1810. With him was associated Mr. Amos Holbrook. The two taught in the two school-houses, alternating a month or so at a time, in the year 1810.

2. The period of the Academy and of Madame Cook's school.

THE ACADEMY was projected in 1807, and sufficiently finished in 1810 for the reception of students. It was an unusual enterprise among the academies of the day. Its object was the education of young men for the ministry, and it was closely identified with the interests of the church. It seems in its highest day quite to have surpassed in reputation the academies of Newark and of Orange, whose origin preceded. It absorbed the attention of the town; and as all schools then were on the plan of the payment of the tuition, the academy first, and afterwards the academy and "Madame Cook's School," quite overshadowed the common schools.

It was built by "a society for the promotion of literature," and for the purpose of building an academy upon joint-stock subscription, in shares of twenty-five dollars each. Its massive brick walls have since been gilded with a mansard roof, and its color has been made more pleasing to the eye. The corner-stone was laid with addresses by the Rev. Abel Jackson and by the Rev. William Woodbridge, then principal of the Newark Academy.

Mr. Amzi Lewis, Jr., became the first principal, a man of pleasing address and of unimpaired abilities, who declined in health and soon died.

His successor was a graduate and a tutor from Princeton—the Rev. Humphrey Mount Pyrene. The Rev. Abner Brumage was his usher or assistant.

Rev. John Ford, who came from Princeton in 1812, followed Mr. Pyrene, and added French to the preceding attractions, assisted by his brother, Rev. Marcus Ford.

The students of the classical department were from thirty to forty in number, young men of mature age, who assisted the principal in conducting the morning and evening devotions. The primary department in the front basement numbered at that time about seventy-five pupils.

Rev. Abner Brumage, who was a student among them, could recall in his old age twenty-two of his fellow-students who became professional men. Among them were Rev. Jacob Tuttle, father of Rev. Joseph F. Tuttle, D.D., (president of Wabash College, Indiana), Rev. John M. Baldwin, Rev. Stephen Saunders, Rev. Elias Harrison, D.D., Rev. Samuel H. Cox, D.D., LL.D., Rev. Enos A. Osborne, Rev. Backus Wilbur, Rev. Ezra H. Day, Rev. Robert Condit, D.D., Rev. William J. Armstrong, D.D., Rev. Edwin E. Downer, Rev. Stephen Dodd Ward, Albert Pierson (afterward principal of the academy), Hon. William B. Kinney, Hon. William Pennington, Dr. Samuel Lawrence Ward, Dr. Charles Davis, Dr. Joseph Smith Dodd and his brother, Amzi Dodd, Esq., William Miller and Ira Whitehead. The institution gained celebrity, and became the principal seminary of learning in this part of the State.

Rev. Amzi Armstrong, D.D., became principal from 1816 to 1826. He came from Mendham, and conducted the institution with signal ability. His disposition was happy, his wit was keen, his judgment clear, and his mind was penetrating and commanding. He was assisted by his son, Rev. Dr. William J. Armstrong, by Mr. Albert Pierson, who afterward became his son-in-law by his second son, afterward Hon. Amzi Armstrong, by Rev. Dr. Philip C. Hay, and Rev. Stephen D. Ward, then young men.

Most of the students intending to enter the ministry entered the junior class at college and then the Theological Seminary; but in some instances the whole course, academic and theological, was taken under Dr. Armstrong.

Albert Pierson was principal from 1826 to 1830 or 1831, with Zophar B. Dodd and afterward John A. Nash as supervisor of the board and labor of the students. Mr. Pierson was the first scholar of his class in college, a skillful teacher, "a grave, efficient, exact, and exacting master of latinity" as one of his diligent students remembers him. Among the students of that time were the Rev. Joseph Vance, Rev. Nathan Shotwell, Rev. Obadiah W. Johnson, Rev. Thomas Cochran, Rev. Ebenezer T. Ball, Rev. Aaron Beach, Rev. Lewis Hamilton, Rev. H. L. Hequembourg, Rev. Arthur Granger, Rev. Jacob Ewins, Rev. Abraham De Witt, Rev. — Thomson, Rev. Joseph Clark, Rev. George D. Young, Rev. Alanson Scofield, Rev. Nathan H. Gale, Rev. Nicholas W. Chevalier, Rev. William C. Munroe, Herman Mead, John A. Brevant, and later Rev. Robert R. Kellogg, Rev. Peter Dougherty, Rev. J. H. Sherwood, Rev. Elias T. Richards, D.D., Rev. John H. Morrison, D.D., of the Lodianna Mission, India, (with whom originated the "Week of Prayer" now observed by the Evangelical Alliance throughout the world), Rev. George D. Armstrong, D.D., Rev. Melancthon W. Jacobus, D.D., Rev. Joseph F. Tuttle, D.D., Rev. Samuel Paine, Rev. Nathaniel Beach, Rev. Marcus Crane, David A. Frame, John Provost, I. M. Ward, M.D., Joseph A. Davis, M.D., Moses W. Dodd and others.

Under Dr. Armstrong the academy was conducted as his own private school. Before he left Bloomfield the property was conveyed to the Presbyterian Education Society. The original stock in the building was lost, but fifteen hundred dollars were subscribed in Bloomfield to the society to aid them in making the purchase.

Mr. Edwin Hall, late a tutor in Middlebury College, was the principal in 1831-32. This was the Rev. Dr. Edwin Hall, afterwards professor of theology in the Auburn Theological Seminary. He was principal but a single year, but he left on his departure the reputation of a stimulating and commanding teacher. Twenty-five or thirty beneficiaries were sustained by the Education Society. His administration was promising a new career of success in the history of the institution, when the smallpox broke out among the students, and a second attack followed. This unexpected interruption and certain other complications were the occasion of the termination of the academic and theological period of the institution. It had had a successful career of twenty-two years.

Among the students under Rev. Dr. Hall were Hon. Edward W. Whelpley, Edward A. Lambert, Rev. Melancthon W. Jacobs, D.D., Rev. Jurtis C. Megie and his brother, Rev. Daniel E. Megie, Rev. Thomas Sydenham Ward and his brother, Rev. John Ward, Rev. Charles E. Mills, Rev. Samuel Laurence Tuttle, Rev. Alexander O. Peloubet, Rev. William Purcell, Rev. J. H. Howe, and Rev. John Knox.

The principals who afterwards conducted the academy as a private school were Egbert W. Wheeler, 1822-33; Franklin W. Sherrill, with Marshal Warner, assistant, 1833-37; William K. McDonald, 1838-1843; David A. Frame, with Amzi Dodd, Joseph Riggs and Thomas C. Dodd, assistants, 1842-44; Warren S. Holt and James H. Rundall, 1844-45; James H. Rundall, 1845-66.

The property passed through a number of changes, and was finally bought from James H. Rundall by the board of directors of the German Theological School. It is now occupied by them as a seminary, with academic and theological departments.

MADAME COOKE'S SCHOOL.—During the latter part of the academy period the Bloomfield Female Seminary was organized. A building was prepared facing "the common," in 1836, by an association of gentlemen, at a cost of six thousand dollars. Madame Cooke's School, as it was familiarly called, was for the young ladies of the place what the academy had been for the young men.

Mrs. Harriet B. Cooke had taught in Vergennes, Middleburg and Woodstock, Vt., and in Augusta, Ga. For eighteen years her seminary in Bloomfield was the centre of a powerful intellectual and religious influence. She was a woman of powerful and penetrating mind. With great decision of character, her quick insight, profound sympathy and deep piety swayed teachers, scholars and families in the town. The celebrity of her school became established. Her rooms were filled with incomers and her day-desks with the girls and young ladies of the vicinity.

Her son, Mr. Robert L. Cooke, in 1837 became associated with her, and continued the school after his mother had withdrawn. The religious life was the ruling object of Mrs. Cooke, but the instruction commanded high esteem. She wrote, late in life, a book entitled "Memories of My Life Work," and died at her son's residence, adjacent to the seminary building, in 1861. She enumerated eighteen hundred and fifty pupils, sixteen teachers and students who became foreign missionaries and many others who became teachers and home missionaries during her life as a teacher.

At the end of the flourishing period of the academy the interest in the common district schools revived. Although overshadowed by the more commanding institutions, and although no public school was accessible except on the payment of tuition, the interest in them had not ceased. Rev. Samuel Fisher, D.D., residing at West Bloomfield, father of Rev. Samuel W. Fisher, D.D., then pastor of the West Bloomfield Church, Chabrier Peloubet, David A. Frame and Dr. I. D. Dodd were prominent members of the school committee of the town. Dr. J. A. Davis was the first town superintendent. The Rev. Ebenezer Seymour succeeded him in the office.

Rev. Calvin Lathrop was a teacher in the Central School.

3. The period of the free school system. The beginning of this period is distinctly marked by the enactment of a special school law for the township of Bloomfield. The town has the honor of seeking and securing the first free school town law in the State.¹ The law was enacted in 1849, and a period of concentration and more thorough gradation began.

There had been seven school districts in the township,—the Franklin, Central, Union and Stone House Plain, belonging at the present time to Bloomfield; the Speertown, West Bloomfield and the Washington, belonging afterwards to Montclair.

The Central and the Union were united in a strong district, since known as the Central Union School District. The Franklin District was soon absorbed. The two school-houses were sold or removed, the lot in the rear of the church was doubled in size, the double-sized space appropriated as a play-ground, an adjoining lot made the school site, and a new school building was erected. The new central building was three stories in height, sixty-four feet long and thirty-two feet broad, and cost two thousand five hundred dollars. It was afterwards enlarged and stood for twenty-one years. During these twenty-one years, and especially in the latter portion of that time, the modern graded system of instruction was developed, which culminated in a High School.

The principals up to the time of the High School were Lewis B. Hardenstle, Warren Holden, E. H. Hallock, Mr. Purrington, Henry A. Ventres, John R. McDevitt, John H. West and F. H. Morrell.

The grammar, intermediate and primary departments had now taken form and a system of branch primaries began to be developed. The Berkeley Primary was established in 1868. The Brookside Primary was opened in 1870.

A second advance in the free school period now took place in the establishment of the High School and in the further elaboration of the whole system.

¹ Plainfield had a special district law enacted in a preceding year. The free school law for Newark was enacted in 1850.

The High School aims to secure for its teacher a college graduate, and to include in its instruction the classic languages, the advanced preparatory mathematics, outlines of natural science, and the higher English subjects.

By an exchange of land with the church, in 1871, the school lot was better adjusted to the school needs. The present large edifice, faced with Philadelphia brick, three stories in height, forty-eight feet broad, ninety-two feet long, with towers for stairways, was erected at a cost of twenty-nine thousand dollars, and was ready for occupation in 1872.

The principals have been J. Henry Root, 1871-80, with from twelve to twenty assistants in the three school-houses; Benjamin Mason 1880-81, with seventeen assistants, and John B. Dunbar, from 1881 to the present time, with eighteen assistants.

The High School instructors have been Everett S. Stockpole, 1872-74; W. V. Louderbough, 1875-76; E. C. Adams, 1876-78; S. W. Clary, 1878-79; John F. Woodhull, 1881-82; and Edward K. Alden, in 1882.

The first assistants to the principal have been Miss Eliza B. Whipple and Miss Helen Adelaide Shibley.

A library was begun in 1875, and has advanced to seven hundred volumes in the three school-houses.

The first class was graduated from the High School in 1876.

A new branch primary building, to be known as the Central Primary, is now in process of construction. It is located on Liberty Street, near the centre of the town, is two stories in height, is built of pressed brick, trimmed with brown stone, contains six classrooms and two play-rooms, and is estimated to cost $100,000. The central building will hereafter be occupied only by the grammar and High School departments.

The whole system of popular education, under a careful and attentive board of trustees, with the assistance of the resident county superintendent, Mr. Charles M. Davis, is attaining a high degree of efficiency.

The trustees of 1840 were David Oakes, Warren S. Baldwin, Artmas N. Baldwin, James Morris and Robert L. Cooke, acting for the Central Union; and Dr. Joseph A. Davis, Eliphalet Hall, Abraham H. Cadmus, Chabrier Peloubet and Albert Matthews, acting for the Franklin District during the process of consolidation. The trustees in 1871 were Warren S. Baldwin, Chabrier Peloubet, Samuel Carl, Rev. Daniel H. Temple and E. W. Page. The trustees of 1884 are Chabrier Peloubet, Edmund A. Smith, Dr. William H. White, Thomas Oakes, John Sherman, and William A. Baldwin.

The enrollment of scholars for 1871 was five hundred and seventy-two, and for 1883-84 nine hundred and five. There are forty-three students in the High School, three hundred and forty-six in the grammar school and five hundred and seventeen in the three primaries.

The amount paid for the salaries of teachers in 1850-51 was $1085; in 1871-72, $5796, in 1883-84, $11,013.

Private Schools. The inspiration communicated by the academy and the Young Ladies' Seminary gave rise to several private institutions, which, for a number of years had a marked influence on the town.

The four which were the most attractive were those of Rev. Ebenezer Seymour and of Charles M. Davis, in Bloomfield, and those of David A. Frame and of Warren S. Holt, in West Bloomfield.

THE BLOOMFIELD INSTITUTE was established by the Rev. Ebenezer Seymour after his retirement from the pastorate of the church. It was opened in 1847, and for thirteen years was a successful school. It had at one time two departments, one for young men and one for young ladies, and attracted students from abroad. Rev. Mr. Seymour was sunny in disposition, genial in manners and unflinching in kindness of heart. Fond of music, an enthusiast in natural science, attentive to the religious culture of his students, he united the "home" and the "school" in a high order of social and intellectual discipline. Many of his students found their way to the college and to the ministry.

After the period of his school was ended he established a Mineralogical Exchange in New York, and was widely known among the mineralogists of this country as well as in Europe.

THE BLOOMFIELD CLASSICAL SCHOOL was opened as a boarding-school for boys, in 1851, by Charles M. Davis and Robert Foster, both graduates of the College of New Jersey. Mr. Foster withdrew after two years, and soon after became the principal of the collegiate department of the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute, which position he still holds. The school was limited to twenty-five boarders, and was continued under Mr. Davis' care until 1868. Many of his boys became active and influential men, and not a few of them died fighting for their country. Mr. Davis was afterwards principal of the Newark Academy. He has now been for some years superintendent of the public schools in Essex County. His residence is the old Joseph Davis house.

The schools of David A. Frame and of Warren S. Holt were in West Bloomfield, but both gentlemen were for a short time in the succession of teachers at the academy.

Private schools of shorter duration and of lesser note, as day-schools for girls and young ladies, have been numerous in more recent years, but the rising excellence of the graded free-school system has limited the opportunity for largeness in such a form of instruction. The latest school of the kind has been established recently by Miss Henrietta B. Northall in the former parsonage, and is commending itself to the confidence of the people.

Other Literary Organizations. The earliest literary organization was the Wardensson Library Company, which existed as early as 1795. It was at the period of the school activity, when young Amzi Armstrong was at the Franklin School-house. It was to this association that Gen. Bloomfield made his gift of one hundred volumes as an addition in 1797. Adam Smith on the "Wealth of Nations," "The Spectator," Russell's "Ancient Europe," Mosheim's "Ecclesiastical History" and Crevier's "Roman History" are still preserved as relics of the old library.

THE YOUNG MEN'S LYCEUM represented another literary influence outside the school history. It was organized in 1838, at a large and enthusiastic meeting held in the church, but held its ordinary meetings in the little school-house. William R. McDonald, principal of the academy, and afterwards professor of literature in Washington College, Pa., and Mr. Robert L. Cooke, then assistant in Madame Cooke's school, were leading minds in discussion and in lectures on literary and scientific subjects. They were supported by such persons as the physicians of the town—Drs. Isaac D. Dodd, Joseph Smith Dodd and Joseph A. Davis—Chabrier Peloubet and Robert N. Foster.

One of the principal effects of this lyceum was the building of the old lecture-room of the church, which was erected to serve the church for religious meetings, the lyceum for its literary occasions and the town for its elections. The proper successor of the Lyceum was the Young Men's Literary Union, organized in 1865, and transformed into the Euclidian Society in 1867. Although not large in number, the society was vigorous and alert in discussions, in debating contests with lyceums of neighboring cities, in maintaining several courses of public literary lectures. It maintained a reading-room in its hall, and originated measures which led to the formation of a library association.

THE BLOOMFIELD LIBRARY ASSOCIATION was an effort to re-establish a library. A plan was projected in 1871 which promised success. Two conceptions, that of a public hall and that of a library, were united. A charter was obtained which gave the name and the idea of a library a prominent place, but which aimed also to secure every advantage of a commodious and attractive audience-room. The result was that the library hall absorbed the library itself, and that financial embarrassments which overtook the edifice left the small library gathered in inglorious retirement. The library building and lot were obtained at an expense of thirty-one thousand dollars, but only one of the two sections of the projected building was erected. Some two hundred and fifty volumes of the original Wardsession Library were transferred to the Young Men's Lyceum. A number of these volumes descended to the Euclidian Society and afterwards to the Library Association.

THE GERMAN THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.—The German Theological School of Newark, N. J., located in Bloomfield, has its origin in successful church-work among the German people of Newark and vicinity.

The Presbyterian Churches of the vicinity had become interested, from 1848 to 1869, in the increasing German population. To supply their German churches with a ministry, and to supply a further educated ministry to the Germans of America, this institution was founded in 1869.

The first beginnings were in the city of Newark, where instruction was given to the first class on Sept. 20, 1864, and where German and American pastors were the instructors until 1872. During that year and the following the plans were enlarged. A faculty was chosen, a curriculum of study was fully formed and the property in Bloomfield was purchased.

The property consists of the original Bloomfield Academy building and a lot of land about an acre in extent. The building is a solid parallelogram, with a mansard roof, has four stories and a basement, and fronts the southern end of the park. It is occupied by the students as a dormitory, and contains also the lecture-rooms and apartments for the family of a "house-father."

The number of the students is limited by the special religious design of the institution. From twenty to twenty-five have been usually in attendance. The first class graduated in 1874. The present attendance, in 1884, is twenty-seven.

The course of study is divided into two departments,—the theological department, which has a three years course; and the academic course of four years, which conforms in good part to the character of a German gymnasium. The instruction is both in English and in German. The education is designed to include a compacted discipline in the essentials of the American academy, college and seminary. The student's mind is formed both in the German and the English mode of thinking. The theological professors devote at least one hour a day to the academic or gymnasium department. The gymnasium is now open for the admission of other students than those studying theology, and a separate "testimonial" is given to those who complete the gymnasial course.

The theological faculty in 1884 consists of Rev. Charles E. Knox, D.D., president and professor of homiletics, church government and pastoral theology; Rev. George C. Schert, Ph.D., D.D., professor of Biblical exegesis and theology; Rev. Immanuel Casanowicz, instructor in Hebrew and church history.

The additional instructors in the gymnasium are Harry E. Richards, M.D., professor of mathematics and natural science; Hermann L. Ebeling, A.B. (Johns Hopkins), classical instructor; Rev. William C. Piderit, assistant instructor.

The board of directors is elected by the Presbytery of Newark; Rev. Jonathan F. Stearns is president, Samuel L. Pinneo is secretary and F. Wolcott Jackson treasurer. Both directors and professors are subject to the approval of the General Assembly, the highest body of the Presbyterian Church.

The endowment amounts to $40,000, which includes building and grounds, $14,500; Newark professorship, $22,000; scholarship, $4000.

The current expenses are provided in large part from individual and church contributions.

Inasmuch as the institution was first located in the city of Newark, is under the care of the Presbytery of Newark, is associated intimately with the city of Newark, and its present location is but a mile and a half outside the city limits, the corporate name is still retained.—The German Theological School of Newark, N. J.

Public Communications.—The movement which separated the township of Orange from the township of Newark was a movement which pervaded the mind of the wider community. It was a quickening of enterprise and of facilities for commerce for manufacture, for agriculture.

During that year of 1806 four important public roads were made. The crooked was made straight, the wet was made dry, the rough was made smooth, the steep ascent was made gradual, and the tide of wheeled movement at once increased. This was the construction by the act of the State of four turnpikes, radiating from Newark,—the Newark and Pompton road through Bloomfield; the Newark and Mount Pleasant road, through Orange, the Springfield and Newark road; the Essex and Middlesex pike from Newark to New Brunswick. These wide avenues penetrated a wide circuit of country. Distant roads, farms and mills felt their power. New mills, stores and residences, and all forms of internal commercial life were created. That portion of the Pompton pike which was within the township of Newark—that is, east of the mountain crest—was commonly known as the Bloomfield turnpike. The Newark and Pompton turnpike was constructed from Robert Cadfax's corner, at Pompton, to Broad Street in Newark, near or at the stone bridge which covered the old "Mill Brook." It was to cross the Passaic River near the Little Falls, and to pass through the "most convenient gap in the mountain near Cranetown." The capital stock was four thousand dollars a mile, the shares twenty-five dollars, the three toll-gates, six miles apart, situated near the Morris Canal, at the top of the mountain, and at Syngack, near the upper Passaic.

The incorporators were John N. Cumming, John Dodd, Israel Crane, Noah Sayre, Isaac Mend, Robert Gould and Nathaniel Douglas; the commissioners, Andrew Wilson, Nathaniel Camp and Richard Edsall. There was no little opposition, for it cut a diagonal through the farms to the mountain top. But the excitement was allayed. The constructed road attracted distant wheels from towards the Delaware over its broad and hard bed. Israel Crane was a leading director, and from his busy wholesale and retail store at Cranetown the great wagons went even beyond the borders of the State.

The road became indebted to Mr. Crane, who cared for its condition, and at length passed into his possession. It was finally sold after his death by his heirs to the Essex Public Road Board. Within a few years that board has further widened and graded the old pike, and now the Bloomfield Avenue, to the top of the mountain, is one of a system of broad and beautiful streets which radiate from the city through great reaches of suburban population.

THE MORRIS CANAL passes through the entire length of old Bloomfield, and was completed some years before the township of Belleville was formed. It was valuable to Bloomfield in the introduction of coal and in the transportation of wood and of general merchandize. Two packet-boats also, at one time, plied for some years between Paterson and Newark. The inclined plane at Bloomfield, fifty-seven feet in vertical height, represents what is termed "the summit plane," an invention for raising boats from level to level, peculiar to this canal. The upper level terminates at a solid bank across the canal, and high above the water, over this bank, pass the tracks of the inclined plane, which descend beneath the water of the level below. The boat is made in two half-hull boxes, joined with a hinge; the boat carriage has also a corresponding joint, and so boat and carriage climb the summit bank, and descend from it, without disturbance of the cargo.

From the upper end of the Bloomfield plane stretches "the long level" for seventeen miles, and from the lower end the canal reaches to Newark with but a single lock.

The canal was completed from the Delaware to the Passaic, at Newark, in 1831, and five years later it was extended from Newark to Jersey City.

Jacob F. Randolph, a resident of Bloomfield, became president of the company in 1839, which office he still holds. The canal was transferred in 1871, under a perpetual lease, to the Lehigh Valley Railroad, and is now one of the great coal carriers of that company. The lease yields to the canal company six per cent. on its stocks and indebtedness.

THE NEWARK AND BLOOMFIELD RAILROAD was opened for passengers from Bloomfield on Dec. 20, 1855, and some six months later from West Bloomfield. Negotiations were at first made with the New Jersey Railroad Company, but the final arrangement for building the road was completed with the Morris and Essex Company. When first opened to West Bloomfield, the same person sold the tickets at the station and was the brakeman on the train. One train at one car, with an engine furnished by the Morris and Essex Company ran up and down the six trips demanded by the time-table. A bell was rung at the station to notify the people of the approaching train.

The first incorporators, when the charter was obtained in 1852, were Zenas S. Crane, Joseph S. Davis, Ira Dodd, Grant J. Wheeler, Robert C. Cook, David Oakes, David Conger, William S. Morris and Warren S. Baldwin; but the direction had much changed before the road was opened. Dr. Joseph A. Davis was the first president, and was most efficient in procuring the construction of the road. Ira Dodd was afterwards superintendent. The actual capital stock in 1856 was $105,000, of which $55,000 was held by the Morris and Essex Company and $50,000 taken by subscribers, mostly in Bloomfield. The bridge across the Passaic just east of the station, in Newark, was built by the Bloomfield company. When work was begun, Dr. Davis took up the first spadeful of earth near the present Clark Street, and the Rev. Job Halsey, of West Bloomfield, made an address. The number of passengers in January, 1856, was 3843, besides commuters, and in July, 10,642, 660 of whom were between Bloomfield and West Bloomfield, and 355 between Roseville and Newark. At the end of the first seven months there was a deficit of $330.53.

"Doddtown" was first called by the conductor as the homeless station next below Bloomfield, but the old historic Indian name Watsessing soon took its place. A fourth station in the old town was opened about 1860, which was named Ridgewood, but has since been changed to Glen Ridge. Through trains were run to New York from about 1865, under the Morris and Essex Company, which controlled the branch road. Subsequently, when the Morris and Essex Railroad was leased to the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, the Bloomfield Branch passed under the controlling management as one of the auxiliaries.

The Bloomfield Branch has now seventeen trains a day each way between Montclair and New York. The fastest time now from Montclair to New York is forty-two minutes.

THE NEW YORK, MONTCLAIR AND GREENWOOD LAKE RAILWAY grew out of some dissatisfaction with the time and the accommodations given by the Bloomfield road. The incorporation was in 1867, and the incorporators were Albert Pearce, Henry C. Spalding, Samuel Wilde, Joseph B. Beadle and Julius H. Pratt. The proposal to bond the towns along the line of the road was resisted by Bloomfield, whose people were more naturally interested in their own road. As the two strong centres of population at West Bloomfield and Bloomfield were now ripe for separate organization, the disagreement in respect to the railroad was the occasion of the erection of the township of Montclair. The new township was erected the next year, the bonds were issued, Bloomfield having been exempted in the act which authorized them.

The terminus was at first fixed at Montclair, but the road was afterwards extended to Greenwood Lake. The road was completed in 1872, and its good effect was at once seen in the rapid development of the northern part of the new township, and in the improvement of the old road, in its better facilities and quicker time.

The road has come recently into the possession of the Lake Erie and Great Western Railway, and now has two stations in Belleville, one in Bloomfield and three in Montclair.

Since the completion of this railway the passenger transit on both the roads has greatly increased and the sparsely settled lands of both towns are rapidly becoming filled with avenues of tasteful suburban houses.

THE NEWARK, BLOOMFIELD AND MONTCLAIR HORSE CAR RAILROAD obtained its charter in 1867. It was originally built from the Bloomfield Cemetery along the west side of the Park, down the old road, or Franklin Street, and passed into a new avenue opened by the road to the north end of Mount Prospect Avenue, in Newark. The route proved too crooked and the time too long, and the rails have been since laid from Mount Prospect Avenue, directly up Bloomfield Avenue, to the west end of Liberty Street. David Oakes, Warren S. Baldwin, Robert M. Henning, James H. Clark, G. Lee Stout, Charles Akers, William Harris, Edward S. Wilde, Philip Weaver and Julius H. Pratt were the original corporators from Bloomfield.

The extension to Montclair has not been undertaken.

THE WASHINGTON BRANCH of the New York, Montclair and Greenwood Lake Railway passes through the southern part of the township. It connects the west end of the city of Orange, with the main road at extreme northern end of Newark.

THE MONTCLAIR GAS COMPANY has the gasometer in the lower part of Bloomfield. The gas lamps have been introduced into the streets of the two towns.

THE WATER SYSTEM of Bloomfield was laid, with hydrants, in the year 1884. It is connected with the Orange water-works, near the ancient "boiling springs," which divides the towns.

THE POST OFFICES of the town now are four,—Bloomfield, Brookdale, which is the ancient Stone House Plain, Watsessing and Glen Ridge.

CENTRES OF POPULATION.—Besides the principal centres of residence around the Park several subordinate centres have a special interest.

BROOKDALE OR STONE HOUSE PLAIN still continues to be the staid home of the Holland descendants.

THE MORRIS NEIGHBORHOOD is, as it has been from the beginning, a family cluster of houses, and may be said to include the store of James W. Baldwin & Brothers, and its adjoining residences on the ancient Baldwin tract.

WATSESSING has grown into a distinct settlement, with its two small churches and post-office, and with the extensive manufacturing of organs by Peloubet & Co., and the manufacturing of hardware goods by R. S. Grummon, touching its northern border.

In 1867 Mr. Robert Pale purchased fifty-six acres of field land, in the northwest portion of the town, on which he has since erected twenty-seven dwellings on four new streets. This development of an unoccupied portion of the town has stimulated additional building, and a wide tract of residences now extend upwards to the Ridgewood Avenue.

GLENRIDGE occupies the slope and crest of the wooded ridge on the west border of the town. The ridge itself has also an avenue running a mile northward, with beautiful sites and tasteful residences. From the crest, the houses look down upon both the village of Bloomfield and the valleys of Montclair, and enow to the Montclair Mountain. The spires of the city and the waters of the bay of New York may be seen.

The original attractions of this portion of the town are much enhanced by the tasteful residences which are rapidly increasing.

STATISTICS.—Relative Areas of the towns in the original Bloomfield:

	Square Miles.	Square Acres.
Bloomfield	1868-1874	3,092
Montclair	1868-1881	4,078
Bellville	1869-1871	1,062
The original Bloomfield	1712-1839	13,192

The original Bloomfield comprised about two-fifths of the original Newark tract.

THE PROGRESS OF POPULATION.—The county of Essex was formed in 1682. Three years later, George Spots, in his "Model of the Government of the Province of East New Jersey," estimated Elizabethtown and plantations at four thousand acres, and Newark and plantations at five thousand acres. This could have been only the limited territory around the two settlements, but this territory contained most of the population of the ancient Essex County. The population was reckoned at one hundred families for Newark and one hundred and fifty for Elizabeth, which gave three thousand five hundred people.

One hundred years later in 1790, the population of Essex County was seventeen thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and Essex was the fourth county of the State. The population of the original territory of Bloomfield was, in 1880, fifteen thousand five hundred and sixteen, nearly the county population of one hundred years ago.

In twenty years from 1790 Essex had become the first county of the State. The movement of population was in the four leading counties.

Bloomfield became a township in 1812. The population within the original boundary from 1820 has moved as follows:

Societies.—BLOOMFIELD LODGE, No. 49 E and A. M.—Over sixty years ago a number of Masonic brethren met at the house of Joseph Munn, at West Bloomfield (now Montclair), for the purpose of forming a Masonic lodge. Capt. Simon Baldwin was appointed moderator and Ephraim P. Stiles secretary. This was on July 20, 1824. A lodge was established, which was known as Bloomfield Lodge and a committee was appointed to procure a suitable room and furniture. A room in the house of Joseph Munn was obtained at a rental of twenty dollars a year, and the furniture of Chatham Lodge (then suspended) was secured. A committee was appointed to make application for a dispensation from the Most Worshipful Grand Master until the meeting of the Grand Lodge, and the following officers were elected: Simon Baldwin, W. M.; Daniel D. Beach, S. W.; Joshua Smith, J. W.; Ephraim P. Stiles, Sec.; Zenas S. Crane, Treas.; Matthias Taylor, S. D.; John Robinson, J. D.; Linus Baldwin, Tyler; William France, M. of C.

The following names appear upon the minutes of that date as the charter members: Matthias Smith, D. D. Beach, John Robinson, Joshua Smith, Jonathan Stephens, Linus Baldwin, Benjamin Reynolds, Matthias Taylor, Christopher Garrabrant, William France, John Munn, Thomas Speer Jr., Simon Baldwin, Zenas S. Crane, L. F. Lewis Mitchell, Joseph Munn, Nathaniel H. Baldwin, John Aikins, Aaron Ballard, Robert Aikins, Peter Forems, Thomas Ryland, William Young, John Moore, Hugh Boggs, Henry Stanley, Ephraim P. Stiles.

By-laws were at once adopted, and here it may be observed, in inculcating every moral and social virtue among the brethren, the originators framed a law which, if generally adopted now, would prevent many a domestic broil for which the lodge is often made to bear the blame. It was laid down in these by-laws that the lodge meet once a month, and be opened at seven o'clock from the vernal to the autumnal equinox, and at six o'clock from the autumnal to the vernal equinox, and shall at all times close at ten o'clock. The first regular communication was held on the 15th of September, 1824, when Most Worshipful Grand Master Jephtha B. Munn installed the officers named above, and at the close of the ceremonies addressed the brethren in very complimentary terms on the material of their lodge.

The lodge was duly warranted, and was designated as No. 48. It prospered and increased in membership until the cold wave of the anti-Masonic excitement struck New Jersey, when Bloomfield Lodge wisely determined to surrender their charter, regalia, etc., until more auspicious times. This action was taken Aug. 26, 1828, and in December of the same year it was resolved to sell the furniture and divide the funds among the members.

The lodge lay dormant for twenty-eight years. On

Feb. 19, 1856, many of the old brethren met again at Odd-Fellows' Hall, and resuscitated it under the title of Bloomfield Lodge, No. 30, the old warrant being returned to them by Grand Master Stewart, with the new decree of authority indorsed on its back by the Grand Lodge officers in the preceding January.

The officers of the revived lodge were installed by Past Grand Master Jephtha B. Munn, April 1, 1856, as follows: Simeon Baldwin (the first master), W. M.; John H. Ehlers, S. W.; Charles Smith, J. Regular communications are held on the first and Third Tuesdays of each month.

From its organization, Sept. 14, 1824, to its dissolution, Dec. 2, 1828, the Past Masters were Simeon Baldwin, 1824-26; Daniel D. Beach, 1827; Simeon Baldwin, 1828. BLOOMFIELD LODGE, No. 2908, KNIGHTS OF HONOR, was instituted Feb. 8, 1883. This is a German organization numbering twenty-seven members, and works in the German language. At its organization it was composed of twenty members, with Adam Metz as Past Dictator, and Henry Meuser Dictator. THE FREUNDSCHAFTS BUND, or sick benefit society, is a popular institution among the German residents of Bloomfield. It gives a weekly sum to its members in case of sickness, and on the decease of one of the society each surviving member is assessed two dollars for the widows' and orphans' fund, or one dollar on the death of a member's wife. The society was organized Nov. 5, 1870, in the lecture-room of the German Presbyterian Church, and was then composed of fourteen members.

OLIVE BRANCH LODGE, No. 51, I. O. of O. F., was chartered Feb. 5, 1847, and first met in a room on the corner of Bloomfield Avenue and Fulton street, West Bloomfield (now Montclair). Its first officers and charter members were as follows: John Hall, S. G.; John I. Robinson, V. G.; Edward Doremus, Warden; John G. Stanley, Rec. Sec.; Joseph B. Ball, Perm. Sec.; John N. Biddulph, Treas.; Joseph Wilde, R. S. N. G.; D. N. Smith, L. S. N. G.; Abraham Zeck, R. S. V. G.; J. Coomic, L. S. V. G.; S. Carle, Jr., I. G.; Uzal D. Corby, O. G.; John C. Doremus and M. W. Smith, S. S.

After working for a period of ten or twelve years the lodge became weak both in membership and finances, and it was decided to close its career in West Bloomfield. The lodge furniture and effects were sold to the Masonic lodge then meeting in the same room. About a dozen members retained the charter and removed the lodge to Bloomfield, meeting in the house of Frederick Gilbert, one of the members, and there then elected officers and so kept the lodge alive under its old charter. Three months later a room was secured in a building adjoining Archdeacon's Hotel, where the brethren held their meetings for several years. Subsequently they removed to Baxter's building, near the corner of Bloomfield and Washington Avenues, but here they were disturbed by the Essex County Road Board, who, in the widening of Bloomfield Avenue, unceremoniously cut the lodge-room in two, and it was found absolutely necessary to vacate the premises, although they had a five years' lease of the same. They then located (1873) in the present lodge-room, on Glenwood Avenue, where they have neat and finely-furnished rooms.

The list of Past Grand includes the following names: John Hall, Edmund Doremus, S. L. Robinson, H. B. Robinson, John I. Robinson, John G. Stanley, Joseph Martin Baldwin, John N. Biddulph, John D. KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS.—During the summer of 1884 a few members of the order residing in Bloomfield determined upon organizing a lodge in the town, and having secured the necessary number of members and the lodge paraphernalia, a charter was granted, and on the 30th of September Eureka Lodge, No. 46, was duly instituted, with the following officers and charter members: John H. Lockwood, Jr., C. C.; William Linder, P. C.; Lewis Johnson, V. C.; Arthur Spragg, Prelate; Charles M. Lockwood, M. of E.; Charles H. The lodge has a membership of twenty-one, and meets every Tuesday evening in the Knights of Honor Hall, Glenwood Avenue.

Bloomfield Fire Department.—The citizens of Bloomfield were awakened to the necessity of doing something for themselves in the way of protection against fire by the disastrous conflagrations near the centre of the town in the early part of 1883. The destruction of the old Archdeacon Hotel, Dodd's livery stables and other property in the "Centre" led to a private meeting of citizens about the middle of March in that year for the purpose of taking steps for the formation of an organization for protection of life and property from fire. Twenty citizens attended and formed the temporary organization known as the Bloomfield Fire Protective Association. A canvass of the town was made for subscriptions to a fund for the purchase of fire apparatus, and in about three months the sum of $1478.55 had been placed in the hands of the treasurer.

On May 7th the temporary organization was dissolved, and a permanent organization of the Bloomfield Fire Association was elected, with W. R. Weeks as president; A. R. Brewer, vice-president; F. G.

Tower, secretary; W. B. Chambers, treasurer; A. J. Marsh, fire marshal; and a board of trustees which should include two members of the township committee. A contract was made with a Baltimore firm for a hook-and-ladder truck, and in the meantime an association purchased the land near the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad depot and erected the building now in use, which the trustees leased for a period of ten years at the annual rental of two hundred dollars. While the truck was building the Hook-and-Ladder Company, No. 1, was organized, its members all being connected with the Fire Association. At one of the first meetings held by them the name of Essex, No. 1, was adopted. The truck arrived Aug. 19, 1883, and a grand celebration took place, in which the Montclair firemen participated. The occasion was one of great enthusiasm, and it was really the dawn of a new era for Bloomfield.

No sooner had the efforts for a fire department taken practical shape than a demand was made for a supply of water. The town committee responded with alacrity, and after a thorough examination into the subject, effected a contract with the Orange Water Company for a supply from their works, at East Orange. The mains have all been laid and nearly one hundred hydrants have been erected, so that all the populous parts of the town are well protected.

A bell-tower sixty-four feet high has been erected in the rear of the truck-house, and a bell weighing two thousand and sixty-eight pounds, costing five hundred dollars, has been hung for fire-signals.

The Bloomfield Fire Association has the following officers: President, G. T. Moore; Vice-President, T. R. Gillman; Secretary, J. B. Reford; Treasurer, W. B. Chambers. Of the active fire department A. T. Marsh is the chief engineer, and S. W. Sabin and W. L. Porter his assistants. The companies are officered as follows:

Essex Hook-and-Ladder Company, No. 1: Foreman, F. G. Tower; Assistant Foreman, T. H. Johnson; Clerk, H. B. Davis. The truck is a fine specimen of workmanship, complete in its equipments, and cost sixteen hundred dollars.

PHOENIX HOSE COMPANY, No. 1.—Foreman, Egbert Ward; First Assistant, W. B. Corby; Second Assistant, J. Emmons Freeman; Secretary, J. R. Gillman; Treasurer, W. T. Spencer; Executive Committee, J. S. Jarvie, Joseph Carter, Theodore Cadman. The company was organized in the summer of 1884, and used for a while a small jumper furnished by the town. In September they secured a very handsome hose-carriage, purchased in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., at a cost of five hundred dollars, which was raised by the personal efforts of the members. On the 22d of September the hose-carriage was received, and the largest demonstration of the kind ever witnessed in Bloomfield took place. All the uniformed political clubs joined in the parade with the firemen from Montclair, East Orange and Bloomfield.

The carriage is housed in convenient quarters on Bloomfield Avenue, opposite Liberty Street, where an office for the chief engineer is also located. The hose-house and the truck-house are connected with a fire-alarm telegraph. The township is divided into five fire districts.

The company have one thousand feet of new hose, besides which, there are two hundred and fifty feet located in Watessing, in which village it is intended to locate the jumper.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

DAVID OAKES.

Mr. Oakes was descended from English stock, his grandfather, John Oakes, having been a resident of Ellastone Mills, Staffordshire, England. The latter had two sons, David and Thomas, of whom Thomas emigrated to America in 1802, and pursued his vocation, that of a consulting engineer and millwright, having acted in the former capacity for the Philadelphia Board of Water-Works and later been made superintendent of the Schuylkill Navigation Company. He married Rachel Kingsland, whose children were David, Joseph, Sarah, John, and Mary. Mr. Oakes, in connection with his duties as an official of the Schuylkill Canal, removed to Reading, where his death occurred in 1823. His son David was born Jan. 13, 1809, in that portion of Bloomfield now known as Franklin township, where he lived until nearly two years of age, when his parents removed to the present site of Bloomfield, and he, until the age of seventeen, pursued his studies at the school adjacent to his home. In 1826 he removed to Orange, N. J., for the purpose of acquiring the trade of a finisher of woolen goods. Soon after completing his apprenticeship he located in the village of Bloomfield, and at once erected a frame building, which, having equipped with the necessary machinery and stock, he began the manufacture of woolen goods. After a successful business had been established the structure was, in 1836, destroyed by fire. The enterprise of Mr. Oakes was manifested in the immediate erection of a new building, which was devoted to the exclusive manufacture of flannels and yarn. Again, in 1842, the products of the mill were varied, tweeds becoming the staple article, which, by their superior quality, gained a wide reputation. The mills were enlarged in 1849, and in 1860 the first brick building erected, which was followed by various additions in 1873 and again in 1879, 1880 and 1882 respectively. Mr. Oakes' son Thomas having succeeded him as general manager.

Mr. Oakes was married to Abigail H., daughter of Simeon Baldwin, of Bloomfield. Their children are Sarah (Mrs. Cornelius Van Lieo), deceased; George A., deceased; and Th. mas. Mr. Oakes continued in active business during his life-time, having established a reputation not less as a master in his special department of industry than for integrity and uprightness in all commercial transactions. He was in politics early a Whig, later a Republican, and always strongly Anti-Slavery in his proclivities. In 1860 and 1861 he was a member of the State Legislature, and filled at various times the important offices connected with his county and township. He was a director of the National Newark Banking Company and a member of the board of managers of the Howard Savings Institution. He was for years one of the board of trustees of the Bloomfield Presbyterian Church and a member of this church at the time of his death, which occurred July 26, 1878.

EPHRAIM MORRIS.

The Morris family were originally residents of the north of England, from whence four brothers emigrated to America. Ephraim, the grandfather of the subject of this biographical sketch, a descendant of one of these brothers, resided in Bloomfield upon land acquired by his father, and a portion of which is still in possession of the family. Among his sons was Stephen, born on the ancestral estate, who married Katherine Smith, and had children,—Ephraim, Jacob, James, Joseph, Mary, Emeline, (Mrs. George Hulin) and Albert, of whom Albert and Emeline are the only survivors. Ephraim was born Aug. 27, 1800, in Bloomfield, where he received such educational advantages as were obtainable in the country schools, after which he became associated with his father in the management of a saw mill. While thus engaged his genius was first manifested in the invention of a logwood cutter for the cutting of dyewood on which a patent was obtained and the machine successfully used for many years. During the construction of the Morris Canal a premium was offered for the best ideas with reference to an inclined plane for transferring boats. The plan of Mr. Morris was accepted as the most practical one offered, and in use for many years after its introduction. He soon after became the general manager of this canal, and filled the position from 1832 until about 1843. He then became associated with George Law in the construction of the foundations for the coffer dam in connection with the Croton Aqueduct at High Bridge, and also engaged in a similar undertaking on the occasion of the building of the Stevens Battery at Hoboken. After this Mr. Morris established the firm of Morris & Cumings, and turned his attention almost exclusively to dredging, meanwhile securing patents on many valuable inventions in connection with the business. The clam-shell bucket, for digging and dredging channels and removing submarine obstructions, is the product of his inventive genius, as is also a machine for yarding coal, which has for many years been in use by the coal yards of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company. He invented an automatic weighing-machine for weighing coal in vessels, and later obtained patents on many simpler appliances. Mr. Morris was married in the fall of 1818, to Miss Martha Vandel, daughter of Daniel Vandel, to whom were born children,—Mary (Mrs. Webster Collins), Augustus T., John, Stephen S., and Charles, of whom Augustus T. is the only survivor. Mr. Morris' extensive business interests so absorbed his time as to preclude active participation in affairs of a political nature, though he was early an ardent Whig and later a Republican. He was reared in the faith of the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a firm supporter. The death of Mr. Morris occurred on the 26th of June, 1878, in his sixty fifth year.

WARREN S. BALDWIN.

The Baldwin family is one of the old families of the Newark colony. As early as 1674 the town-meeting "agreed that the weavers, Thomas Pierson and Benjamin Baldwin, shall be considered by the surveyors to make their out-lots on the hill shorter." From this Benjamin Baldwin sprang the Baldwin family, which for many years has extended along the main street of Bloomfield from the Presbyterian Church to the Morris Neighborhood. He was one of those "chosen to collect the money that is gathered by the subscription in Newark for the maintenance of the ministry in the year 1692," a readiness for which kindly work was manifested in his descendant a century and three-quarters later in connection with his church in Bloomfield. Benjamin Baldwin made his will in 1726, and died probably soon after in the Newark settlement. Benjamin Baldwin, Jr., the son, died before any division of his father's property had taken place, and his brother Joseph, in 1732, became owner of "the plantation at Watsession, where he now lives," on the south side of the Second River, as far as the old road and Harrison Street. David, the son of Benjamin, Jr., married Eunice, the daughter of Daniel Dodd, settled on the one hundred acres of land on the west side of Third River, and became the founder of a numerous family. Shortly after the Revolution the Baldwin family became the most numerous of the early families in this part of the Newark colony. Jesse, the son of David, and grandfather of Warren S. Baldwin, was a well-known soldier and officer in the army. He was first ensign, then lieutenant, then quartermaster, and then transferred as quartermaster to the regular army. Samuel Baldwin, the son of Jesse, was the father of Warren S. Baldwin. Mr. Baldwin was born on the 7th of June, 1812. His father died at the early age of thirty-five. His only brother died a year later, in 1818, and Warren, at the early age of six, was the only child of his mother. Left with inadequate means of livelihood, she found in him a dutiful son and a growing support. At the age of twenty he began business as a merchant, and continued it throughout his life. His early bereavement and the good counsels of his home disciplined him in habits of prudence, sagacity and diligence. His business habits were soon recognized, and a steady and growing success followed. His integrity and good judgment soon led him to posts of trust and of honor in and beyond his native community. As a member of the Presbyterian Church, he was made a member of its Session, for thirty-five years was a member of its board of trustees, and discharged his service for a long period as secretary or treasurer or president of that body.

In thoughtful attention to public education he became also a valuable citizen. He aided in procuring the school law of 1849. He was also treasurer of the school district for the long period of twenty-four years, and had the satisfaction of seeing the school system and the school buildings make a decided advance. So also as a citizen he rendered valuable service as a town officer. He was repeatedly a member of the township committee, and during the twenty years from 1851 to 1871 was nine times one of the commissioners of appeals. He was a member of the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the county, and was chosen in 1856 to represent the people in the house of the Assembly of the State. On his death, on Aug. 30, 1873, he left a bequest of one thousand dollars to the church which he had served with such affection and fidelity.

His life was full of modest usefulness, active, industrious, efficient. His character was without disguise, his action was direct, his habit prompt and kindly, his ambition to be useful and to be honorably esteemed. The purity of his motives, the constancy of his principles, the inviolability of his trusts were observed and relied upon by the entire community. In the best and highest sense, in his early home, in his domestic attachments, in his commercial advance, in his moral and in his religious character, his career was an inspiration to the young and a satisfaction to his wide circle of friends and acquaintances.

Mr. Baldwin married, on Dec. 16, 1841, Elizabeth Wilde, daughter of James Wilde, of Bloomfield. His children were four sons and three daughters. Five of his children survive him, the three sons perpetuating his varied pursuits in the store, the school, the town and the church.

FRANCIS DE GRESS.

Francis De Gress was born on the 4th day of February, 1841, at Cologne, Prussia, and when nine years old entered the Royal Military Academy at Bensberg, Prussia, where he remained until 1854. During that year he left the academy for the United States, and joined his father in New York. In 1856 he removed to Cape Girardeau, Mo., and learned watch-making in all its branches. At the breaking out of the civil war he responded to the first call for three months' men, at the close of which time he joined, in January, 1862, as senior second lieutenant, Battery H, First Illinois Light Artillery, at Camp

Douglas. On the 28th of February the battery arrived at Benton Barracks, St. Louis, to be equipped, and left for Pittsburg Landing April 3, 1862, having been attached to Gen. W. T. Sherman's division. With his battery he took part in the battles of Pittsburg Landing and Shiloh, from thence in the siege of Corinth, the capture of Holly Springs, the battles of Chickasaw Bayou and Arkansas Post, participating in the siege of Vicksburg and all its battles. After the capture of Vicksburg he, on the 14th of July, 1863, took part in the siege and capture of Jackson, Miss. Capt. Hart, meanwhile, resigned and left the battery in command of Second Lieut. F. De Gress, the only officer with it, who commanded it ever afterwards. With his battery he participated in the campaign from Memphis to Chattanooga, and in the battles of Tusculum, Ala., and Mission Ridge or Lookout Mountain. Lieut. F. De Gress, whose term of enlistment had expired, was mustered into the service again as captain of his battery, every man re-enlisting as a veteran. On their arrival in Chicago a complimentary supper was given to the captain and his battery, at which Adjt. Gen. Fuller, in highly complimentary terms, presented Capt. F. De Gress with a very handsome sword as a token of esteem from the members of his battery, alluding to their various engagements and to the youthful commander. After predicting to Capt. De Gress a proud future, he presented the sword, as a token of esteem and confidence from the brave boys he had the honor and pleasure of commanding. Upon gold plates on the scabbard of the sword was an appropriate inscription, with the names of the battles and sieges in which he and the battery had been engaged. Capt. De Gress, in a soldier-like speech, brief and pertinent, acknowledged the unexpected present. At the expiration of their furlough Capt. De Gress and his battery returned to the seat of war, and were May 1, 1864, assigned to the Second Division of Gen. Morgan L. Smith's Fifteenth Army Corps, commanded by Maj. Gen. John A. Logan. They participated in the battles of Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, Nikajack Creek, Chatahoocnee and all the battles of Atlanta, the battery being finally captured, the ensuing account of which appeared in Harper's Weekly, Sept. 3, 1864: "Capt. De Gress, whose portrait is given on page 564, commands Battery H, First Illinois Artillery. The following gallant action is thus recorded by our correspondent: 'On the 22d of July the battery of Capt. De Gress was placed, by order of Gen. Sherman, in such a position as to throw shells from his twenty-pounders into Atlanta. The rebels came charging through the railroad cut to the left of the battery. The supports gave way. De Gress saw at once that his guns were gone. He directly ordered his guns pointed left-oblique, and gave the charging rebels double canister, at the rate of four rounds per minute. Soon he had two of his guns spiked, and ordered his men to get away, remaining himself with one sergeant (Peter Wyman), using one gun as rapidly as possible. Still the enemy came on, and when within less than twenty steps an officer called to him to surrender. De Gress, who stood with the lanyard of either gun in his hands, shouted, "Certainly, come on!" at the same moment discharging his two guns, and called to Wyman who stood with pincers and spikes, to spike under cover of the smoke and get away. De Gress saw the spike driven into the last gun, and as he started a storm of shot was sent after him. The sergeant was killed, but De Gress escaped uninjured. Gen. Logan, who was coming up at the head of Col. Martin's brigade, was met by De Gress, who told the general that his guns were lost. "Oh, no, Captain," said the general, "Wood's guns have been turned upon the horses of your battery, and I think those chaps will hardly get them away before I have this brigade charging clear over them." In less than a quarter of an hour De Gress, who had gone up with the charging column, was busy drawing the spike of one of his guns, which was very soon sending canister into the retreating rebels, the infantry officers near acting as cannoniers under the direction of Capt. De Gress, who has met with the sincere applause of the general officers who witnessed his gallantry.

Capt. De Gress participated in the battle at Ezra Church, after which he was strongly recommended by Gens. Logan, Howard, Barry and others to the Governor of Illinois as colonel of the First Illinois Artillery, vide E. Taylor, who had resigned which recommendation is now in the office of the Adjutant-General of Illinois. He also took part in battles of Jonesboro' and the capture of Atlanta.

At Gaylesville the army prepared for the grand march to the sea, Battery H, First Illinois Light Artillery being the only twenty-pounder. Parrott battery allowed to participate, according to a special order of Gen. Sherman. Capt. De Gress was at the capture of Fort McAllister and Savannah, the battle and capture of Columbia, Bentonville, and arrived at Goldsboro', N. C., March 25, 1865. He was present at the surrender of Johnston's army at Raleigh, April 15, 1864, and from thence to Richmond, passed in review in Washington, and was mustered out in Springfield Ill., July 1, 1865, with the rank of major.

Immediately after his retirement from the service Maj. De Gress formed a copartnership with several others and organized the firm of Wexel, De Gress & Co. They established themselves in Texas, with houses in Galveston, Brazos Santiago, Brownsville, and agencies in several other towns on the frontier, and also in Monterey, Mexico. Maj. De Gress remained in Brownsville until the spring of 1868, and while there married Miss Isabella Greene, on the 26th of September, 1866. In the spring of 1868 he removed to the city of Mexico, whither his partner, Mr. Wexel, had preceded him, and established the first American arm-store, under the name of "Armeria Americana," by which name the firm was known all through Mexico. In 1869 he moved with his family to New York, leaving his partner in charge of the Mexican branches where an office was opened. While in New York he established branches also in Central and South America. These he finally withdrew, wishing to concentrate all his capital in the Mexican trade. In 1872 he erected a house for his family on Chestnut Hill, between Bloomfield and Montclair, and resided there. In 1875 he exchanged places with Mr. Wexel, Maj. De Gress going to Mexico and Mr. Wexel to New York. On Maj. De Gress' arrival business improved in Mexico, he taking advantage of every opportunity to extend the scope of his enterprise, confining himself not alone to arms and ammunition, but also to all kinds of machinery. He contracted to build docks for the government, as also arsenals, electric lights, telegraph lines, etc. In January, 1882, he effected a contract with the Mexican government to supply it with four million dollars in nickel coin. The business of this contract took him to Europe, accompanied by his wife and two of his children, the latter of whom he left at school in Bonn, Germany. After successfully arranging his affairs he returned to New York, and later to Mexico.

Until this date he had been in good health, though soon after his return to Mexico he complained of indisposition, and finally departed for Vera Cruz, seeking there a change of air, from thence he repaired to Rimouala, where he peacefully passed away. His death was deplored by many; at the funeral, the Governor of the federal district of Mexico, the Minister of Finance, the Assistant Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy of Mexico being among his pall-bearers.

Maj. De Gress joined the Masonic fraternity early in life, and at his death was a member of Bloomfield Lodge, No. 40, F. and A. M., Union Chapter, No. 7, Newark, and Damascus Commandery, No. 5, also of Newark, N. J. He was a member of Olive Branch Lodge, No. 51, I. O. O. F., at Bloomfield, N. J., and of the Grand Army of the Republic. His name is also mentioned a number of times in Gen. Sherman's "Memoirs." He was one of the first vice-presidents of the Creedmoor Rifle Association. At the time of his death he was vice-president of the Mexican Oriental Railroad Company, known as the Gould-De Gress road. The remains of Maj. De Gress were buried in the American Cemetery, near the city of Mexico.

CHAPTER LXIX.

BELLEVILLE TOWNSHIP. 1

Passaic River, having for a southerly boundary Second River, a stream averaging forty feet in width, irregular in its course, emptying into the Passaic, and furnishing within the limits of the township a manufacturing motor of five hundred horse-power. This stream also forms the northern boundary of the city of Newark. The western boundary of the township is the township of Bloomfield, from which it was set off in 1820. Franklin township forms its northerly boundary, and was set off from Belleville Feb. 18, 1874; the township has a population of three thousand and four.

Its settlement was contemporaneous with the settlement of the old township of Newark, of which it was originally a part. Bloomfield township was set off in 1812, and included within its boundaries Belleville. The village centre is three and a half miles distant northerly from Market Street, Newark, and nine miles westerly from the City Hall, New York.

That it is all that its name, "Belle Ville" (beautiful village) signifies there is none who seek to controvert. The river furnishes navigable communication of considerable magnitude with the city of New York.

Belleville Bridge.—A charter for a bridge at Belleville was obtained in the year 1790, and soon after a bridge of great strength was built by a stock company, which, with the bridge built across the Hackensack about this time and the construction of a turnpike road through the cedar swamps, gave to the citizens of Belleville and the surrounding country the first direct communication with the city of New York by means of a wagon-road at all accessible. This road was what is called a corduroy road, and was made of cedar logs from the swamp through which it passed. The logs were laid close together, and formed the foundation of the present road. The old bridge was destroyed by a great freshet occurring on the 4th day of January 1841, being the greatest in this river since 1806, when the water rose not less than six or seven feet above its usual height, destroying much property on the river-banks, the people, in some instances, escaping from the windows of their houses in boats. At the time of the destruction of the bridge it was owned by the widow of the late Anthony Rutgers. The draw for the passage of vessels was near the western shore, and was moved by means of cog-wheels and crank. After its destruction the franchise was purchased by Nicholas Joralemon, who maintained a ferry, by means of which horses and vehicles, as well as people, were ferried across, and as soon as might be he constructed a new bridge similar to the original and retaining the ownership for several years, he finally, in December, 1851, sold it to a stock company. It was by them sold to the three counties, Essex, Hudson and Bergen, and made a free bridge. In 1873 it was removed and a new one of iron substituted, symmetrical in construction and beautiful in appearance.

Indian History.—There is no well-established Indian history in connection with Belleville proper. It is, however, a matter of record that Capt. William Sandford purchased, on the 20th day of July, 1668, all the meadows lying south of a line drawn from the Hackensack to the Passaic River, seven miles north of their intersection, for "one hundred and seventy fathoms of black wampum, two hundred fathoms of white wampum, nineteen match coats, sixteen guns, sixty double hands of powder, ten pair of breeches, sixty knives, sixty-seven bars of lead, one anchor of brandy, three half fats of beer, eleven blankets, thirty axes, twenty hoes and two cooks of dozens," this last-named article being probably transposed, and should have been two dozen cooks, meaning pan, pot or the like, they reserving the right to fish and hunt. This purchase from the Indians by Sandford was for their claim to fifteen thousand three hundred and eighty acres divided from Second River, (now Belleville) only by the Passaic. It is therefore fair to assume that they claim to have similar rights to dispose of here, for which a similar treaty must be made with them and like payment given. Tradition, however, fixes Second River as a much-valued abode of the Indians prior to its settlement by the whites.

Religious—DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.—No one thing in the history of Second River (now Belleville) has better title to consideration than the antiquity of her church organization. Belleville has four churches, namely: Reformed Dutch, Episcopal, Methodist and Catholic. As to the former, the Reformed Dutch (now Reformed Church), we cannot fix the exact date of its organization;¹ from the records of the church, however, it appears that in 1725, Garrit Wouterse Frans Van Dyck Gideon Van Winkle and Johannes Kening were appointed a building committee for the erection of "a new church," and certain rules were adopted that gave evidence of a disposition to provide, not only for the residents of ² There appears to be some conflict of authority relative to the place of meeting of this denomination in its early history. In Dr. Taylor's "Annals of the Classis of Bergen, of the Reformed Church," page 399, July 29, 1733, referring to the consoling of the congregation by Col. John Schuyler, it is not made apparent that Col. Schuyler absolutely secured the use of the church, according to his wishes and the note of toleration, except so far as may be inferred from what is there said, viz.: that Dominic Haughhoort and the Consistory passed a resolution demanding back the "note of toleration," and required that the Episcopal services be discontinued.

It does appear that Mr. Haughhoort was, as there shown, locked out of the church; that he preached upon the steps of the same from which the possibility of the use of the church in accordance with Col. Schuyler's wishes and his note of toleration for a time is made possible, if not probable. Again in Nelson's "History of Josiah Hornblower," etc. on page 27, it is mentioned that in 1792, owing to the same difficulties before referred to, an Episcopalian congregation was gathered together, and, as a concession to Col. Schuyler, the right to worship in the Dutch Church was granted, and that they worshipped there for some time; either of which accounts would admit of a different place of meeting than that referred to in authority of the records of Christ Church.

its immediate vicinity, then known as Second River, but also for the residents of the adjacent settlements of Newark and Acquackanonk, and Arent Schuyler, a native of Holland, who came here in early life, than whom there was none more prominent or liberal in his contributions, was to have a pew or sittings for himself and wife in the southwest corner of the church to be erected, the same as he had in the "old church," thus making apparent the existence of a church here prior to this time.

The lot on which stood these ancient churches and their successors, hereafter described, was beautifully and centrally located on the west side of the Main, then the only street or thoroughfare, was conveyed by Francis Speer and Catryna, his wife, to Aaron Schuyler, John Stoutenburgh, Garrit Wouterse, Thomas Van Dyck, Cornelius, Thomas and Abraham Vreeland, in the limits of Newark, in the county of Essex (the township of Newark then embracing what is now Belleville, with other townships since set off), for the purpose of erecting a church thereon.

This deed is dated July 13, 1729. (See records for Essex County, Book R 2 of deeds, 176.) Soon after this deed was given the work of the erection of the church was commenced and prosecuted with energy. It was of stone. Of its dimensions there seemed to be no mention; it was, however, of the usual style of churches of that day, with a belfry in the centre, a rope from which hung in the middle of the church, furnishing the means of ringing the bell. Subsequently a change was made in this particular, and a stone tower was erected at the north end of the church, surmounted by a belfry, this structure standing longwise to the road.

In December, 1726, the Rev. Henricus Coens became pastor, serving in that capacity other churches at the same time. His labors here terminated in 1730. Eighty-seven persons were added to the church during his ministry; he was succeeded, in 1739, by the Rev. Cornelius Van Santvoord.

About this time Mr. Schuyler added to his contributions in aid of the church, and later, in 1734, his widow and children contributed each fifty pounds.

Col. John Schuyler contributed one hundred pounds when, in view of his liberal contributions to the church, he was, by a vote of the Consistory, awarded the special right to cast a vote as a member of the Consistory in the selection of a minister, with the right to sign the call.

Mr. Van Santvoord resigned his pastorate in 1755, and was succeeded by Gerardus Haughhoort, who was installed Aug. 31, 1755, and continued his ministrations (nothing seeming to mar the union) until 1753, when, Col. Schuyler being displeased with Mr. Haughhoort, the harmony of the church was disturbed.

The services of Mr. Haughhoort were discontinued about the year 1756. During his ministry one hundred and eleven persons were added to the church.

From 1777 to 1779 this church appears to have been without a pastor, and John Sayer and a Mr. Canfield during this time conducted the services as visitors, or clerks of the church, acceptably.

In 1779, Rev. Matthew Laydt was installed, and the following year this relation was dissolved. There again appears to have been a period when the church was without a pastor, and suffered much from the effects of the Revolution. In 1784 the Rev. Henricus Schoemaker, then pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church at Acquackanonk, made arrangements for the partial supply of the pulpit of this church, which he continued to do for eight or ten years.

In 1790 they seem to have been awakened to more energetic efforts in behalf of the church. On the 5th of June of this year the church became incorporated as the Reformed Dutch Church of Second River. In 1792 they built a school-house on the church lot and conducted a parochial school.

On the 5th of September, 1794, the Rev. Peter Stryker accepted a call and was soon after installed, and continued his ministrations till 1809. During his pastorate, and in 1797, extensive repairs were made upon the church.

The old parsonage property, up to this time occupied by the Rev. H. Haughhoort, was sold, and a tract containing about fourteen acres of land was conveyed to the church by Col. Thomas Cadmus, and Peterch, his wife, by deed dated April 25, 1795,—the same tract on which the present parsonage stands, the original of which was built about this time. This appears to have been a period of great prosperity to the church, and they encouraged the extension of a church, in answer to the request of the people of the northern portion of the congregation (Stone House Plains); they aided them in the establishment of a new congregation and in building a church there. On the 22d of May, 1804, this section was visited by a violent tornado, by which the steeple was demolished. June 4th following the congregation set about rebuilding it.

In 1804 the church at Stone House Plains made a request for some share of Mr. Stryker's attention, which was granted them. During this same year the church at Second River was quite extensively repaired. In 1807 a new stone church was erected. On Jan. 12, 1808, this church was dedicated, and a vote of thanks was tendered the rector, church wardens and vestrymen of Trinity Church, Newark, for the use of their church while this new church was being built.

In 1809 the Rev. Mr. Stryker's pastoral relations were dissolved. It would appear that the services of ministers of different denominations were secured to fill the pulpit for a time. In 1810 he was recalled, and again, in 1812, resigned,—possibly the result of impaired health.

In 1814 the Rev. Stat' Van Santvoord accepted a call tendered him for two-thirds of his time.

In 1815 the congregation erected a new parsonage house, which has been occupied by the successive ministers to this time. Mr. Van Santvoord continued to labor here nearly fourteen years acceptably.

In 1827 subscriptions to the Theological Seminary of New Brunswick were made by the pastor, Mr. Van Santvoord, Stephen Van Cortlandt, Jane Van Cortlandt, Girard Rutgers, Abraham Jorolomon, amounting to two hundred and forty dollars.

The Rev. Gustavus Abel at this time received and accepted a call from this church, was installed and continued to labor here until 1834, when Isaac S. Demund was called, but declined to accept. The Rev. Enoch Van Aken was called, and also declined. This vacancy was not filled until the latter part of 1835, when Abraham H. Meyers was called and installed pastor.

The Episcopal congregation in this place having organized distinct from Trinity Church, Newark, requested the use of this (the Reformed Dutch Church) as a place of holding service while they built a new church. This request was granted. Mr. Meyers remained here only two years.

In 1837 the Rev. John Garretson became pastor of this church, and continued its pastor for over eleven years. During his pastorate the venerable Stephen Van Cortland, Esq., so long the munificent supporter of this church, died, and the church sustained a great loss.

Mr. John Renselaer about this time donated the church one thousand dollars, and soon after added to it another thousand dollars.

Mr. Garretson, at the close of his ministration here, was appointed corresponding secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions.

In 1849 and 1850 calls were tendered to Abraham Polhemus and the Rev. James Romeyne, both of whom declined to accept. In March, 1850, the Rev. Isaac S. Demund was again called, and, accepting, was installed pastor. A desire to build a new church manifesting itself at this time, the repairing of the old church having some adherents, and six thousand three hundred and fifty-five dollars having been subscribed for the purpose, on the 15th of June, 1852, they resolved to build a new church. Messrs. John Van Renselaer, John N. Jorolomon, Nicholas N. Jorolomon, John C. Lloyd, James Browe, Sebastian Duncan and Samuel L. Ward, M.D., were appointed a building committee. A contract was entered into with William H. Kirk & Co. and Mr. Van Ness for its building, and the use of the Methodist Church was granted to them a portion of the Sabbath for the holding of services till the new church was built.

On the 8th of December, 1853, it was dedicated, the surviving former pastors all being present except the Rev. Mr. Meyers. A deficiency of funds was found to exist to pay in full for its erection. John Van Renselaer again came to their aid, with a proposition to give one thousand dollars, provided the remaining thousand dollars necessary to place the church out of debt was raised by the congregation. This was promptly accomplished, and the entire church debt paid, and the hearts of all were gladdened.

Several individuals having removed from Belleville to Newark, being members of this church, with strong attachments denominationally, and finding no Reformed Church there, soon set about and were instrumental, through their application to the Classis of Bergen, in the organization of the First Reformed Church of Newark; and on the 26th day of September, 1833, they elected as elders of this church Stephen M. Conger and Thomas Ullington (Mr. Ullington at the time being a resident of Belleville), and Peter Vandervort and Charles Hall as deacons, and they were ordained to their respective offices on the 6th of October, 1833, by the Rev. Isaac S. Demund, of Pompton. Among those making this application and being former members of this congregation were Magdalene Davis, Samuel Davis (her husband), Thomas Ullington, Maria Van Emburgh, Hetty Francisco and others. To this church, therefore, is traced the organization of the First Reformed Dutch Church of Newark.

Franklin was now sharing a part of the services of the pastor of this church, one service a Sabbath being held there. Mr. Demund continued his services here till the 26th of March, 1856. The following June, T. De Witt Talmage, then a young man, became their pastor. On the 29th of July, 1856, he was ordained and installed. The Rev. J. Paschal Strong, afterwards pastor in charge of this church, on that occasion delivered the charge to the congregation.

Mr. Talmage remained until 1859, and was succeeded the same year by the Rev. Peter P. Studdiford, who remained till 1866. He was followed in 1867 by the Rev. William W. Halloway, Jr., who remained till 1871, and was succeeded by the Rev. J. Paschal Strong in that year. He remained till 1879, and was followed by the Rev. H. M. Voorhees, who remained but a short time and was followed, in June, 1882, by Rev. Ralph W. Brokaw, who is now the minister in charge. His wife is the daughter of the Rev. S. L. Mershon and Mary Talmage, youngest sister of a former pastor, the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage. Mr. Brokaw has a congregation of about two hundred and twenty persons, thirty-five of whom are Chinamen.

Beside the church there is a parsonage, which was thoroughly rebuilt, enlarged and modernized in style during the year, and is now in good condition and among the finest residences on Main Street. The society has a lecture room adjacent to the church, probably thirty by fifty feet, besides several detached parcels of land, the total value of which is about forty thousand dollars.

For the greater part of the past century the church has continuously maintained, with remarkable success, a Sabbath-school, the attendance upon which has the greater part of the time been large. It is now in a very prosperous condition and numbers about one hundred and fifty members, thirty-five of whom are Chinamen engaged in the laundry of Geo. T. Casebolt. Of the many superintendent during this period, we mention Fred A. Dimars, Wm H. Stephens and Andrew Little (deceased), James Browe, J. P. Bullard. Mr Pierce Brett is at present serving in that capacity most successfully and acceptably. Among those who during these years have been called to the pastorate of this church there have been many of marked ability, energetic speakers, liberal-minded, deep thinkers; indeed, it would be difficult to make the exception to this rule. Many of them have received the degree of D.D. All of them were called to more acceptable fields of labor.

CHRIST CHURCH traces its charter and subsequent organization as a church to kingly origin, since, on the 10th day of February, A.D., 1746, a charter was granted by George II., King of Great Britain, for this church, in conjunction with the charter of Trinity Church, Newark, of which it formed a constituent part, the charter requiring that one vestryman and five wardens be chosen from that part of the parish north of Second River, of which Belleville (then called Second River) was, so to speak, the centre.

Services were held at Second River by them as early as 1751 or 1752, and mention is made of their place of meeting at this time, being a store-house on the bank of the river. The late Rev. Isaac Brown, rector of Trinity Church, Newark (the alliance between which and this chapel is apparent in the charter referred to), speaks of having good congregations here.

The only building that might in that day be referred to as a store-house on the bank of the river, at all commodious, with any probability of being as ancient in date as this, was a building standing on the river edge, in the south end of the village, just south of the rear of the present residence of John Eastwood, Esq., by the side of which building vessels might land, and from them one could step in the doors. It was a building probably sixty feet in length by thirty feet in width, two full stories high. The frame was of massive oak timber, well built, shingled on the sides as well as the roof. It was then, or soon after, used in part as a store-house for flour and grain, in connection with Bennett's (afterwards Scott's) grist-mill.

Many old citizens recollect this building and its destruction by fire about forty years ago. This was, no doubt, their place of meeting at that time, and they there continued to hold services upwards of twenty years, and up to 1774, at which time we find that they were about to engage in fitting up a building, the capacity of which was about equal to the seating of three hundred persons (this building is not so located in the record as to make it certain, but was doubtless the academy, so-called), which they did fit up and commenced to occupy. The academy was of stone-ancient in architecture, and was located on the southerly portion of the lot occupied by the present church edifice. The building was probably thirty by fifty-five feet on the ground, and stood lengthwise north and south, the north end being about in line with a continuation of the southerly line of their church lot fronting on the street, the front less than twenty-five feet west of the front of the present church. Col. John Schuyler was disposed to give prominence to this church organization, owing to differences between him and the ministers and authorities of the Dutch church, with which he had previously been connected, and towards which he had been a liberal supporter. It is even said that he furnished Dutch and English copies of the book of common prayer at his own expense, for their use, a large portion of the then church attendants speaking the old Dutch language.

In the earliest history of this chapel, and while yet connected with Trinity Church, a goodly portion of the early settlers were to be found among its worshippers, among them, the Kingslands, Dows, Sanfords, Ozdens, Leslies, later the Schuylers, Rutherfords and others; most of whose descendants still adhere to the present church, while others, with the deepest veneration and respect for this, the church of their fathers, whose last resting-place is by the side of its walls, have from time to time, in answer to convictions, connected themselves with other churches.

In the year 1811 the first step was taken in the line of a separation of the congregation at Belleville from Newark in the mutual agreement that each congregation should supply themselves with religious services independent of the other. In 1835 measures were taken for the separation into two parishes, the difficulty presented being that half of the governing body being from each locality worked to the disadvantage of both. Christ Church, therefore, as a legal corporation and as a separate parochial organization, dates from 1835. On the 11th day of July, 1836, the corner-stone of the new church was laid, which, before its completion, was destroyed by fire, supposed to be the work of an incendiary. The academy, so-called, was at this time taken down, and the material used in the construction of a new edifice. In 1841 the present church was finished, and on June 2, 1842, it was consecrated by the Right Rev. G. W. Doane, D.D., LL.D., bishop of the diocese. It is second to none in point of size or symmetrical Gothic architecture; is of stone, with porch in front carried up several feet above the peak, serving as a bell-tower, is most eligibly situated on an eminence probably thirty-five feet above the level of the road and one hundred and fifty feet distant therefrom, with carriage approaches on either side terminating in a circle connecting them, the centre of which is found at the porch.

The grounds are somewhat spacious, and studded with a growth of beautiful trees artistically placed on either side of this church edifice, but not extending beyond its front (as ancient in origin as their early church organization), is the burial-place of its founders and adherents, whose dust renders sacred these surroundings, and the tombstones that line either side of the building, on which are inscribed words sacred to their memory, seem to stand guard in its protection.

In reviewing the history of this church, covering a century, among others, the Older Kingslands and Schuylers, John Rutherford, Sr., and many more present themselves as worthy of mention for their devotion to and liberal support of the church. Later, and since the occupancy of the present edifice, the progress of the society has been marked by regularity of service, succession of able ministers and by fair attendance. It has, however, suffered much in the death of its old and devoted members and their descendants, as Gen. George Kingsland, the Misses Louisa and Mary Rutherford, John Rutherford, Aarent Schuyler, Joseph Kingsland, Sr., nearly all of whom departed this life at an age far beyond the allotted time of man, their associates mourning their loss. They have also felt the loss sustained in membership by them, as well as in substantial aid, by the establishment of churches (the outgrowth of this church) in Franklin and Rutherford within the past few years, drawing upon the membership of this organization, by which they also suffer financially.

During the existence of this church, besides those already mentioned, we give the names of the following ministers who have officiated here: In 1810, William Berrian, D.D., afterwards rector of Trinity Church, New York; in 1816, the Rev. George Moore; in 1819, the Rev. Augustus Fitch; in 1821, the Rev. Lawson Carter; in 1823, the Rev. John Griggs; in 1825, the Rev. Matthew Matthews; in 1831, the Rev. Ralph Williston; in 1832, the Revs. Holmes and Whittingham; in 1831, the Rev. Robert Davies.

Here ends the list of officiating clergymen prior to the separation from Trinity Church, Newark. Commencing with their independent organization in 1841, the list is as follows: The Rev. Dr. Chapman; from 1842 to 1844, Samuel L. Southard; 1845 to 1860, Rev. H. B. Sherman; 1862 and 1863, Rev. J. F. Blake; 1864 to 1875, Rev. S. W. Sayres, at which latter date commenced the rectorship of the Rev. C. S. Abbett, which has continued to this time.

The first warden from this part of the parish, and while connected with Trinity Church Newark was William Kingsland, and the first vestrymen William Dow, Aarent Schuyler, William Sandford, Edmund Leslie and Henry Kingsland. At the same time from Trinity Church, Newark, Uzal Ogden, James Nuttson, John Robinson, Daniel Rogers, Benjamin Johnson, Ebenezer Ward were officers.

Since that time, among the officers of this church, we mention Joseph Kingsland, Sr., John Rutherford, Aarent Schuyler, Thomas W. Sittorthwaite, Robert Swarth, Jonathan Bird, Richard Kingsland, James Sittorthwaite, Henry K. Schuyler, Jr., as prominent. Under the pastorate of the Rev. C. S. Abbett, now in charge, notwithstanding the many drawbacks here referred to, the church is in a prosperous condition, and unity prevails. The value of the church property, including the parsonage, situated some distance north of the church, which is of modern construction, substantial in appearance, and suggestive of comfort, is thirty-five thousand dollars.

METHODIST CHURCH.—Looking back more than a century and a half, we see situated upon the west side of Main, and the only street or road in the village, along Passaic River, adjoining the Reformed Dutch Church, and south of it, an old mansion, standing back from the road some forty feet. It is of stone, and of the usual style of houses of that day, substantial in appearance, of medium dimensions. A small portion of this old house, the then residence of the late William Dow, one of the early settlers of Second River, yet remains, and is part of the residence of one of his descendants, to whom it has come down through generations by lineal descent. Though nearly all of the original of this house of William Dow has long since been lost to view, and has given place to the present comfortable residence of his descendant, John W. Dow, Esq., there is yet much of history connected with it which suggests that we make record of its former occupants. Its owner in these early times of which we speak was a man of rectitude and intelligence, possessing in a marked degree the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens. He was identified denominationally with the Episcopal Church organization, was one of its first vestrymen, under the pastorate of the late Rev. Isaac Brown, as early as 1751 or 1752, and afterwards under the ministrations of the late Rev. Uzal Ogden. His daughter, Margaret, youngest sister of the late Rev. John Dow, of Belleville, and second wife of William Holmes, now deceased, had united with this church, and John Dow, her brother, was also a member.

Soon after their connection with the church, and when they were just stepping upon the threshold of manhood and womanhood, and about the year 1791, Methodism and its teachings began to lay claim to consideration. Its birth-place in this region might be said to be the old John Street Church in New York; at least here it was cradled in its infancy. Margaret Dow, a young woman of naturally pious inclinations, to which had been added the force and effect of religious encouragement and training by her father, visited New York, where she had cousins residing. Her thirst for religious teaching led her to attend this old cradling place of Methodism. Being forcibly impressed with the earnestness and spirit manifested by its members and shown in its devotional exercises, her convictions soon led her to believe that it was her duty to connect herself with these plain, but earnest Christian worshippers, which, after many conversations with her father, she did.

About this time a Miss Annie Stewart, afterwards Mrs. Bonsell (who died in Newark, Aug. 14, 1854), also a native of the village, having lost her parents, found a home at the residence of her childless aunt, the late Mrs. Tyson; she also was a convert of Mr. Ogden's and a member of his church. About the time of Miss Dow's visit to New York, Miss Stewart was on a visit to Elizabethtown, where she became acquainted with the Methodists. She soon united with the church, and though a stranger, she was warmly received by these people. Trusting in the indulgence of her aunt at Belleville she invited one of the ministers to preach at her house. He consented, and did preach there. It was in the winter of 1791 or 1792 that the first sermon by a minister of this denomination was delivered here, and either the Rev. Thomas Morrell or John Mann, (both of whom were stationed in New York at that time,) was the minister thus preaching.

Margaret Dow in the meanwhile having returned from a visit in New York, finding that these services had been held at the house of Mrs. Tyson was greatly rejoiced. Many others manifesting sympathy, added to the interest of the meetings. John Dow, the brother of Margaret, a man of more than usual intelligence and peculiarly endowed at this early day with the elements of character essential to leadership and public speaking, as afterwards shown, though quite young, being also a devoted Christian, joined this little band and became their leader, gathering many supporters of more mature years. Among them we find Mary Ann Stewart, aiding in the leadership; Mrs. William Crissey, afterwards wife of Thomas Brown, and mother of the Rev. George Brown, deceased; William Dow, father of John, and Margaret, second wife of William Holmes, and Richard Leecraft of Newark; John Rykeman, James Van Riper, and William Whitfield, who had come as an exporter from New York. Preachers were invited to aid the classes formed.

Belleville became a part of the old Elizabethtown Circuit, which extended as far as New Brunswick and included Staten Island, reached as far north as the New York State line and included some territory beyond it, and many miles in a westerly direction. Here began Methodism in this region.

Rev. John Clark was appointed in 1792 to the charge of this circuit. He found over this vast territory only one hundred and ninety white and three colored members of the church. Joseph Totten was appointed his colleague. The visits of these ministers were but few, as their services had to be divided up by those having claim on them all over this vast territory. John Dow, their leader here, was eminently qualified for the work. His father's house was the place of meeting from the origin of the organization until a church was built. Nicholas Sneathen, a young man whose talent was apparent to all, in the employ of Mr. Bennett, then conducting a grist-mill on Second River, whose peculiarly studious habits found him with book in hand on every available occasion, even while at work, the following year was recommended and received by the Annual Conference as a traveling preacher, and labored successfully for many years. In 1793, John Regan and M. Kainer were appointed on this circuit, the former a native of Ireland, a studious, conscientious and upright minister, died in 1796. In 1791, John Clark and Hezekiah C. Wooster were appointed. There were one hundred and ninety nine white and twelve colored members at this time. In 1795 there were two preachers appointed to this circuit, Shadrach R. Hutcheson and William Strongs. They were followed in 1796, by John Fountain and Abraham Van Nostrand. In 1797 John Clark who had been in the district before, returned with T. Merrit and J. Seward, his colleagues. They found a membership of two hundred and ten.

In 1798, Thomas Morrell became supernumerary, and he, with J. Tolleson and S. Thomas appear on the minutes of this year. The first named, who had been an officer in the Revolutionary army with Washington at winter quarters at Morristown, afterwards engaged in mercantile business at Elizabethtown, where he was widely known. In 1799 Thomas Liverard and David Bartine, Sr., followed. At this time Newark was a small town, and had not yet been visited clerically by these ministers. David Bartine, then in the vigor of manhood, with a strong intellectual, as well as physical development, supported by peculiar energy, resolved that Newark should be added to the appointments of this circuit. He procured a place of meeting, and expounded to them the doctrines of his church in that peculiar forcible manner for which he was so noted. In the year 1800, Joseph Totten returned to the circuit, Jesse Gilbert being his colleague. The membership at this time was two hundred and fifty. In 1801, Solomon Sharp, spoken of by the church as one of its great men, was then presiding elder, his district being the whole of New Jersey and part of New York State. In 1802, Joseph Totten and William Mills who were the preachers in charge, had at the expiration of their term an increase of two hundred and fifty members.

Up to this time the meeting-place at Belleville (John Davis' house) became too small, and the question "What shall we do?" was propounded. A meeting was called to consider. It was a cold December evening, 1802, they assembled at their usual place of meeting, five in all being present—John Dow, Richard Leecraft, William Holmes, James Van Riper and John Rykeman. They convened to take measures for the building of a church. In 1803 they issued their subscription, headed as follows: William Holmes, $200; Richard Leecraft, $100; John Rykeman, $100; John Dow $100; and J. Van Riper, $50. It was circulated, and on its return contained the names of one hundred and ninety-five persons, all of whom have passed away. The amount subscribed was $1725.53.

On this subscription list were successively placed the following names of clergymen of different denominations: Rev. Uzal Ogden, Episcopal, $10; Rev. William Woodbridge and Rev. A. M. McWhorter, Presbyterian, each $5; Rev. Daniel Smith, Methodist, $5; the Rev. George Strebeck, who was sent out to this country by Mr. Wesley, but afterwards went to the Episcopal Church, $5; Rev. William Phœbus, Methodist, $5. In 1803, Father Thomas, C. Wooley and J. Stevens were the ministers in charge, and the membership of the circuit was five hundred and fifty whites and thirty-one colored. During their term of service the church at Belleville was completed, being erected on the lot occupied by the present church edifice, which was for these early days a very respectable one of brown stone plastered and penciled; the seats were old-fashioned, high, open backs, with single row on which to rest the shoulders; the pulpit, half-octagon, very high, though afterwards modernized, lowered and painted white; over the pulpit was a canopy or sounding-board, on the top of which was a gilded pineapple with green leaves, the only ornament about the church. There were no galleries.

The cost was twenty-four hundred and seventy dollars. On the 3d day of April, 1804, it was found that there was a deficiency of seven hundred and fifty dollars to make payment in full for this church. It was borrowed of Richard Leecraft, before spoken of as instrumental in its building, he being secured by bond and mortgage, the interest on which was to be paid quarterly. Here, in this plain but comfortable building, this congregation worshipped for many years. In 1804, Thomas Morrell, B. Hill and S. Budd presided over the circuit.

The Rev. John Dow having been early licensed as a local preacher, and standing in the front rank of that honorable class of ministers, supplied the pulpit most of the time during these intervals with great acceptability to the people. He was an easy, fluent, yet earnest speaker.

His daughter Abby, wife of William Lee, and John Gibbs, was the first infant baptized at the altar of that church.

In 1805, P. Van Ness and David Bartine. In 1806, William Lendon and David Bartine were laboring here. The following two years, 1807 and 1808, James Moore and Jacob Hevener were assigned to this field. During this year Peter P. Sandford, one of these worshippers (they often holding services near the residence of his father, at Sandfortown, across the Passaic), was recommended to and received by the Philadelphia Conference and appointed to Trenton Circuit. In 1808, Thomas Stratton was associated with James Moore. During this year the thought was entertained by the Belleville members that something might be done for Methodism in Newark. There had at this time been preaching there by the ministers of this church, both traveling and local, for the previous nine years. John Dow labored there with much regularity. It is said that the Rev. Mr.

Hancock, who died in 1854, preached there when there were but five Methodists in the place. Up to this time they had no regular meeting-house. On the 22nd of January, 1808, they held a meeting at the house of John Dow, at which there were present Richard Leecraft, John Dow and Charles Marsh. They determined to build a church in the town of Newark, and having formed the resolution, they set to work to accomplish the thing resolved upon. Richard Leecraft gave one hundred dollars, John Dow and Charles Marsh twenty-five dollars each. The subscription was circulated; a lot was secured in Halsey Street, Newark; men were set to work; and in a few weeks Ezekiel Cooper stood upon the foundation of Wesley Chapel preaching to the people of that town. In the early part of 1809 the church was completed, at a cost of $2734.80. When the trustees met for settlement, they found that the same deficiency—seven hundred and fifty dollars—existed here that existed on the completion of the Belleville Church, and Richard Leecraft again said, "I will loan you the money." On the first board of trustees of this church were John Williams, Joseph Sandford, William and Hugh Holmes, Srs., all of Belleville, their associates being from Newark.

Here we find not only that the church at Belleville is the pioneer church of this denomination, that here in Belleville the foundation-stone of Methodism was laid, but the strange anomaly is brought out that just three-quarters of a century ago Second River, or Belleville, actually contributed to Newark a church of this denomination, which, looked at from the stand-point of to-day, presents the strange appearance of weakness contributing to strength, poverty making contribution to wealth.

In 1809, William Smith, Thomas Stratton and J. Sharpley were on this circuit, and in 1810 Belleville seems to have been connected with Staten Island as a separate charge, and T. Drammond was pastor. In 1811 the old Elizabethtown Circuit was divided. The lower part was called Essex, including Newark, the upper part, including Belleville, was called Bergen; J. Robinson and J. Finley were the preachers. In 1812, S. Martindale and J. Van Sickle, they are the Morris Circuit, supplied Belleville. In 1813 they are again upon the Bergen Circuit, and Joseph Totten and T. Bennett were the preachers in charge. In 1814, Stephen Martindale and P. Price were on this Circuit; in 1815, D. Best and J. Finley; in 1816, J. Finley and W. Burroughs; in 1817, P. Van Ness and A. Ketcham; in 1818, the eminent minister, Joseph Lybrand, with William Smith; in 1819, John Potts and Charles Pittman; in 1820, George Banghart and Charles Pittman; in 1821, George Banghart and W. Leonard; in 1822, Manning Force and Benjamin Collins. This year the old stone church at East Bloomfield was built by these men. It is said Mr. Collins made and carried mortar himself to promote the work. Daniel Parish, a resident of Bellevill, this year was recommended to and the next year received by the Philadelphia Annual Conference. In 1823, Benjamin Collins and James Aikins were colleagues.

B. Weed and Joseph Corey were on the circuit in 1824. The size of the circuit was now somewhat reduced, and the following, as nearly as can be ascertained, were the preaching-places, namely: Belleville, Bloomfield, Spring Garden, Centerville, Rockaway Neck, Fairfield, Bloomingdale, Ringwood, Ramapo, Paterson, Paramus, Homestead, Drummond's, Johnson-town, Babcock, Thebes, De Camps, Haverstraw Neck, Pond, Rockland, Fort Lee and Smith. In 1825, B. Weed and Anthony Atwood; in 1826, D. Bartine and William A. Wiggins. During this year William N. Sandford, John and William Lee were licensed as local preachers. In 1827, William Wiggins was appointed to Belleville Circuit, with Lawrence McComb presiding elder. In 1828 and 1829, Isaac Winner; in 1830 and 1831, William Grauville; in 1832 and 1833, the Rev. James H. Dandy; in 1834 and 1835, William H. Bull; in 1836 and 1837, Robert Lutten; in 1838 and 1839, Curtis Tally; in 1840 and 1841, Francis A. Morrill; in 1842 and 1843, Jefferson Lewis; in 1844 and 1845, James N. Tuttle; in 1846 and 1847, John D. Blaine; in 1848, William A. Willmer; in 1849, John S. Swain; in 1850, James H. Dandy; in 1851, Nicholas Van Zandt; in 1852 and 1853, William Tunison; in 1854, George Hughes; in 1855, Ellwood H. Stokes; in 1856 Wesley Robinson; in 1857 and 1858, Charles Laren; in 1859 and 1860, R. B. Lockwood; in 1861, Daniel E. Franks; in 1862 and 1863, George W. Treat; from 1864 to 1866, Daniel R. Lowrie; from 1867 to 1868, Thomas Walters; in 1869, David Graves; in 1870 and 1871, J. P. Daily; from 1872 to 1873, John D. Blaine; from 1874 to 1875, Richard Johns; in 1876, Thomas H. Jacobus; from 1877 to 1879, James O. Rogers; from 1880 to 1881, David W. Bartine, D.D.; from 1882 to 1883, Charles Larew, D.D.; in 1884, David Walters.

Among those who started in the ministry from here, to whom reference should be made, we mention the late Rev. Edmund S. Jones, who, while here and engaged as a school-teacher, started in the ministry in 1829, and became one of the most eminent bishops of this denomination; the late Peter P. Sandford, a native of this vicinity, who, being licensed seventy-six years ago, occupied during his ministry several of the pulpits in the city of New York, and edited the Christian Advocate; and also, Edwin Jones (twin brother of the bishop), Isaac N. Felch, Nicholas Suetten, Isaac W. Cole. Notable in the local ministry we mention the Rev. John Dow, licensed in the early days of Methodism, prominent as its founder, conspicuous for his talent and long service. We also give a list of local preachers licensed being members of this church, namely,—Joseph Sandford, John and William Lee, William M. Sandford, Calvin Lathrop, all of whom, except William M. Sandford, are now deceased, he having attained his eighty-seventh year.

The first board of trustees of this church was composed of the following-named persons elected April 4, 1803: John Dow, Robert Lecraft, William Whitfield, James Van Ripper, and John Rykeman. This board was sworn in by Josiah Hornblower, a justice of the peace at that date. Later we find John Lee, William M. Sandford, Jeremiah T. Brower and John Dow forming the board of trustees, with William M. Sandford president. In 1844, Charles J. Williams, Richard G. Humphrys, John Collard, William Whitfield, John Lyle, and Jeremiah T. Brower constitute the board. They were sworn in by John C. Lloyd, Esq., who was justice of the peace at that time.

This first-described church,—within whose walls a Lybrand, a Dew, a Foree, a Pittmann and a Weed, all now deceased, and many others, had eloquently expounded the Scriptures, and where the simple Christian teachings of a Moore were heard,—having served its day and generation, in 1846 was removed to give place to an enlarged, more commodious and slightly structure. Under the pastorate of the Rev. John D. Blaine the church entered upon the work, and the church erected at this time is on the site of the original structure. In size it is thirty-eight by sixty feet, with gallery in the east end. It is a plain, yet neat structure, with a seating capacity of about four hundred. Its interior is beautifully decorated. Its seating is modern and comfortable, having a lecture-room also seated, which is used as a lecture and Sunday-school room. Abraham P. Sandford and Minard Coeyman were the contractors constructing this church. It cost about five thousand dollars. On the south, and adjoining it, there is a parsonage of fair proportions and two and a half stories high. The value of the church property is ten thousand dollars. The congregation numbers about two hundred and the church membership is one hundred and fifty.

The Sabbath-school was organized about 1822. Of those who have acted as superintendent of the school, commencing in its early history, we mention John Williams, William Lee, Jeremiah T. Brower and others; later, Minard Coeyman, John Collard, William E. Jacobson, Edgar Coeyman, H. H. Morgan. Among its early teachers, William M. Sandford, John Collard, Abby Dow, Eeza Holden, John M. Sandford. Later, as superintendents, there were C. W. Dickinson, James Rouse, C. D. Bogart and others. About sixty scholars attend the school.

It will be apparent to the reader that no history can be given of this church that is not to a great extent a history of Methodism. This was the nucleus around which all its original interests centred in a great measure. To close it without some allusion to the privation and hardships endured by its ministers, both circuit and local, in this early day would exhibit great incompleteness. It will be seen that in the winter of 1791 or 1792 the first sermon was preached here, and probably the first by any minister of this denomination in this State, except that it may have been that about this time similar services may have been held in Elizabethtown. In 1792 in its extent, Elizabethtown Circuit embraced the territory bounded southerly by New Brunswick, northerly by New York State line and some territory beyond it. On its eastern boundary, taking in Staten Island, it extended westerly many miles, probably twenty or more. Over this territory two ministers presided, subject to the direction of their presiding elders. As late as 1824 the circuit which embraced Belleville included twenty-two appointments, with two traveling ministers, leaving twenty appointments to be filled by local preachers, the former for their services receiving upon an average two hundred and fifty dollars per year to support themselves and families and provide the necessary equipments which always included a fine horse and saddle, with saddle bags attached. As they spent a large portion of their time in the saddle, it necessarily was their place of study. Local preachers who followed their usual avocations during the week as a means of livelihood, and also necessarily had horse and saddle as a means of reaching their appointments, often fifteen miles distant, which required them to start early. Their travel, lay often over turnpike roads, where they paid gate money or toll, besides rendering their services without fee or reward. In the latter, as well as in the first place, much of their study was done in the saddle. A careful estimate made by one of these last-named ministers now living, fixes the number of sermons probably preached by him in the early days of his ministry at eighty per year, and the number of miles traveled to reach his appointments at nine hundred for the same period.¹

ST. PETER'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, situated on the south side of William Street, about fifteen hundred feet west of the Passaic River, occupies a beautiful eminence probably one hundred and fifty feet above the high-water in Passaic River; was opened for divine service on Monday, Dec. 2, 1838, since which time it has been more than once enlarged to meet the demands of the increasing attendance until it now has a seating capacity of over four hundred. The church property has a value of about thirty-five thousand dollars.

In early years this church was attended by residents of Newark in large numbers.

Rev. Father Stans was its first pastor, and in succession came the Revs. Bernard McCabe, David Bacon (who, at the time of his death, was a bishop of the church, resident at Portland, Me.), Francis C. Cyle, Philip Collick, John Curoe, John Hogan, Hubert De Burgh, John O'Connor and the present pastor, Rev. W. H. Dornin, under whose pastorate it is in a prosperous condition. It numbers among its pastors, besides the late Bishop Bacon, others of marked ability, one of whom, the Rev. John Hogan, died while in charge, beloved by his congregation and possessing the universal esteem of those by whom he was known.

The society has a parochial school, the attendance at which is large, numbering two hundred and twenty-five. It embraces a large portion of the children of the church, and is admirably conducted by several sisters under the management of the pastor.

The church corporation is possessed of considerable real estate outside of the church site, which embraces about two acres. On the west side of the church is the burial-place, where rest the remains of many of its founders and supporters, among them not a few who ranked as our old and respected citizens, having for the most part emigrated here in early life from Ireland, acquired property, reared families to succeed them in the church, lived and died respected citizens. In this burial-place there is a marble monument of more than ordinary proportions, a well-merited tribute of respect to their deceased pastor, the Rev. John Hogan.

Of those who served from time to time on the board of trustees, we mention the following, many of whom, though now dead, still live in the recollection of some of our citizens. Commencing with the early history of the church: George McCloskey, John Graham, John Butler, John Conlin, Felix McDonnell, Michael Gorman, Nicholas Duffy, John Finn, Michael and Timothy Barrett, Peter McCloskey, Patrick Smith, John Sleanor. Later, William Connolly and Alfred Lintott.

Following the example of the older churches, not content with the prosperity of their first established church organization, they became imbued with the spirit of church extension which characterized the other churches, and about the year 1871, a plot of land having been donated the church by William Joyce, Sr., at North Belleville (now Avondale) near the station on the Newark and Paterson Branch of the New York and Lake Erie Railroad, this corporation built thereon a substantial stone edifice of Gothic architecture. This now independent church is making good progress toward equality in success with its mother, under the pastorate of the Rev. — Morris.

The church property has a valuation of twenty thousand dollars. Nor is this the only instance of the spirit of church extension here manifested, as the church organization of this denomination at Bloomfield owes much of the merit of its establishment to this church, whose pastors had charge of its adherents up to the date of and for some time after, a separate church organization there.

Schools.—On the 18th day of April, A. D. 1804, the trustees of the Reformed Dutch Church at Belleville conveyed to William Burnett and John Spier, in trust for the proprietors of the School Association at Belleville, a tract or lot of land out of the south-east corner of the lot by Hance Spear and Catryna, his wife, conveyed to Aaron Schuyler and others, - the same whereon the Reformed Dutch Church now stands.

This proprietary school association appears to have existed as an organization long prior to the date of the deed, and a constitution is in existence, adopted by them on the 27th day of February, 1792. By this constitution the subscribers are made sole proprietors, with power to dispose of the property by will or otherwise.

In 1829 the minutes show the names of the proprietors, with the sums contributed by them respectively, each contributor being one of the joint proprietors in proportion to his subscription. The names of the first fifteen proprietors, of whom there were seventy-seven, were as follows: Philip Van Cortlandt, Thomas Burnet, Abraham Cadmus, Abraham Spear, Minard Coeyman, Henry Stimus, John P. Sanford, Samuel Stevens, Abraham Van Emburg, Abraham Stevens, Michael Sanford, Garrit Haughboort, James Sandford, Abraham Sandford, Samuel Morris. Notable among the other proprietors are Adrian Van Riper, Anthony Wauters, John Spear, Jr., Dr. Thomas Steele, William and John Hornblower, Dr. William Burnet, Thomas Spear, Aaron J. Schuyler.

There was, at a date not certain, a stone school-house, perhaps fifty feet in length by twenty-eight in width, two stories high, built on the lot alluded to, the lower story of which was used as a school-house and the upper part as a place of meeting for the inhabitants, and also for the undenominational Sunday-school.

Among the superintendents were the Revs. Peter Stryker, Staats Van Santvoord, John Dow, William Bachelor, Barklow Stryker and others; as teachers, James T. Spier, William M. Sandford, Peter Greshong, Jane Wade, Jeremiah T. Brower and Aaron Sandford, all now deceased except William M. Sandford. Of the scholars there yet remain a few, as John Collard, Eliza Stimus and James Browe. This school was probably organized at the close of the last century and continued in existence for some years, when denominational Sabbath-schools were established.

On the first floor of the building was a day-school, which was attended by the children of Second River or Belleville and its surroundings. There was a succession of teachers, several of whom afterwards occupied more prominent positions in life. From Belleville, at the close of his engagement here as teacher, Edmund Janes entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and became one of its most prominent bishops. His twin-brother, Edwin, succeeded him as teacher, and also entered the ministry. Isaac N. Felsch succeeded the last-named, and he, too, at the close of his engagement, entered the ministry, and became a prominent minister and presiding elder of the Methodist Church. They are all now deceased.

Of the trustees of this school, the first we can name were John N. Jordamon, James T. Spier, William Coeyman, Henry N. Jordamon, John Stimus and Capt. Henry Jordalemon. They were elected by the proprietors March 2, 1829, and were called "school visitors." At this time Henry Jordalemon was chairman and Abraham V. Spier secretary of the School Association. Of the latest and last trustees of the school of this association were Henry N. Jordalemon, Abraham V. Spier, Isaac A. Cooley and Theodore Sandford. A school was continued here up to 1852, when it was removed and the material used in the new Dutch Church, then building. In the meanwhile private day-schools had also been conducted by Jeremiah T. Brower in a building then known as the "Lecture-Room," belonging to the Dutch Reformed Church. Mr. Brower continued his school for many years. This lecture-room building was located on the west side of Cortlandt Street, a little south of John, and is now a dwelling-house. A Mrs. Leslie and Miss Wallace also had their private schools for small children at a very early day, Miss Wallace continuing hers on the corner of John and William Streets up to the time of her death, in advanced years, about 1846.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of Second River school district, held Saturday, Sept. 4, 1852, it was resolved that an election for and against an appropriation of money for the purchase of ground and the erection of a school-house for that district be held on the 11th day of September then next ensuing. One hundred and ninety-one votes were cast, one hundred and eighty of which were in favor of appropriating five thousand dollars. Arthur Ward, Andrew Arthurs and Theodore Sandford being at the time trustees of said district, purchased of Hugh Holmes the present site of the public school, on the southwest corner of Academy and Stephen Streets, embracing nearly two acres of land, the purchase money being seven hundred dollars. On the 11th day of April, A.D. 1853, the trustees entered into a contract with Timothy Underwood for the erection of the present structure, for the sum of $4895.54, he contracting with Hinman Lyon for the mason-work. They entered upon the work, and in the fall of that year completed it. It is of brick, thirty-two by sixty feet on the ground. It is two stories high, besides the basement story. In point of architecture it was in advance of its day. The basement is of dressed stone in courses, on which rests a double base course of brown cut stone. The monotony of the brick wall is also broken by pilasters and a belt course of brown cut stone; the windows have brown cut stone sills and circular heads. It is of a fine appearance now as when built, and as thoroughly substantial. It is surrounded by a suitable fence and shade-trees. The building when complete exceeded the appropriation about two thousand dollars, which was appropriated. Soon after school was opened there, and has been continued to this time. The two superintendents from the date of building have been Theodore D. Wells, Dr. Samuel L. Ward, Gasherie DeWitt (the two latter deceased), who were succeeded by County Superintendent Charles M. Davis, Esq., of Bloomfield. The trustees in the meanwhile have been Dr. Arthur Ward, Andrew Arthurs, Theodore Sandford, Charles H. K. Smith, John W. Dow, Dr. D. M. Skinner, George Dunbar and others. The present board is O. H. Perry, Charles Clearman and Theodore Sandford. There have been employed here as teachers Robert Gow, Chamney Wagner, Amanda Garfield, Fanny Bruen, Alice Morgan, A. F. Horst, Serena Ross, Amzi Barringer and wife, Helen Sandford, Emma Lyon, Miss Cox, F. Pierce and wife, Phoebus Lyon, Miss Stimers. The present teachers are E. L. Anderson, Emma Titus, Margaret Key, Amelia Caniff and Sarah Albey.

MONTOMERY SCHOOL, in the vicinity of Randolph's mills, was organized about 1838, and a small frame building was erected on the northerly side of the road leading through the village. The first board of trustees was John Vreeland, James Moore, Hugh F. Randolph, Elias Osborn and Abraham H. Cadmus. On its boards of trustees, besides the above-named, have been John Robinson, James C. Dodd, John Crisp, William Piercey, Ephraim Moore, Right Gilbert and James Fry. Among its teachers we name Isaac S. Bruen, Margaret A. Williamson, David McClure, James Gambale, Sarah Snow and C. M. Fuller. Margaret Williamson taught there ten or twelve years. Elias Osborn has been one of its trustees from the time of its organization to this time excepting only an interval of one year.

There has grown up here quite a spirited little settlement. Elias Osborn has been the grocer of the neighborhood for nearly fifty years. Among the old residents who have long since passed away we call to mind John Vreeland, John Robinson and their wives. They left descendants residing in the vicinity. James Moore and Elias Osborn are old residents, now living in quite advanced years. They are large property-holders in the neighborhood. North of this settlement was the lower portion of Newtown, where the Kidneys had large possessions, and where for successive generations they lived and died. A door of the residence of the later of them, Richard Kidney, had small holes in it made by British bullets.

Roads.—During the winter of 1869¹ an act was passed providing for an extended system of Telford roads or boulevards, varying in width from sixty to one hundred feet, radiating from the city of Newark, leading to and passing around the surrounding towns. One of this system of roads, called Washington Avenue, commencing at the northerly termination of Belleville Avenue, Newark, extending northerly, passing through Woodside (now part of the city of Newark), through Belleville and Franklin and to the Passaic County line, is eighty feet wide and is about six miles in length. Its course is generally straight, with such curves only as are rendered necessary in order to conform to the general lay-out of Belleville, and to make the most beautiful sites along the line accessible by means of this boulevard. It passes through the village from one thousand to twelve hundred feet west of the river, on an elevation of fifty to sixty feet above the same. From its eastern border the ground is descending, from its western either level or gradually ascending along its line through and above Belleville. There are most beautiful villa sites, from which most extended views in a southerly and northerly direction are afforded, stretching out for miles. The scenery is unsurpassed for beauty. It is yet thinly settled, and affords opportunity to persons desiring to locate in the suburbs of New York or Newark worthy of their examination and consideration, and a day spent by such in this neighborhood would not be without its advantages to them. The road is reforested, in good condition, furnishes a fine drive; from this elevation the air is exhilarating, and the health of the locality compares favorably with any of the surrounding towns.

Stages and Taverns.—The first public conveyance to New York was a daily stage, the proprietor of which was Joseph Sandford. Its origin dates back probably ninety years or more. It furnished the only means of getting to and from New York (other than by water) for several years. Later, John Dow and John Williams were the proprietors of a line of stages running to New York. These stages were of the old Concord style,—close coaches, with more seating on the back, front and top than on the inside. They were driven by Jacob Robinson, who, in the commencement of his career as a driver, was the slave of John Dow, who, after purchasing him, at once informed Jake that he had paid so much for him, naming the sum, and that as soon as his wages, at a sum named, amounted to the price paid for him he should be freed. Jacob was a faithful man, and the promise of his master was fulfilled. He did more; he sold out his interest in the stages to him, and thereafter the proprietors of the same were John Williams and Jacob Robinson. This period of stage-driving was from sixty-five to seventy years ago. Jake became a man of some importance. The last-named proprietors continued the stages up to fifty-five years ago.

John Williams in the meanwhile was keeping a hotel on the corner of John and Main Street where stood a home-like looking old stone house, one and a half stories high, with four rooms on the first floor, the door being in the centre. Back of this and connected with it was a frame building of considerable size, a part of which forms the rear of the residence of one of those landlord's descendants. Here was conducted a hotel which was widely known. It was a summer resort, as well as a stopping-place of the greatest respectability for travelers. The stages started from this hotel at eight in the morning and returned towards evening. After some years Jake becoming old and unable to endure the exposure incidental to stage-driving, his son Francis became driver. Mr. Williams and Jacob sold out to a Mr. Tucey, of New York. They continued the stages for a time, and sold out to T. P. Seaman, about fifty years ago. He put on fine stages, and drove four, and sometimes six, splendid horses, employing one Barber as driver, who, besides being a good horseman, was quite a musician, and played the bugle finely. For a long time the departure of the stages was announced by stirring airs played upon the bugle. Seaman also was at this time proprietor of the Mansion House, and, besides, a horseman of great notoriety.

Thomas Farrall about this time was keeping a hotel on the corner of William and Main Streets, where James H. Van Rensselaer resides, and he, too, started a line of stages. He sold out to Seaman, and went to Europe on a visit. On his return he repurchased the property. John T. Grice became proprietor of these stages, and he sold to one Lewis, of New York.

The stage line was continued, under various proprietors, until lines of stages were extended to Newark, which, running in connection with the railroad to New York, diverted the travel so that the stages between Belleville and New York, failing to pay, were discontinued. This state of things existed until the establishment of a horse-car railroad from Newark to Belleville, about twenty years ago.

In 1871 a portion of the township was set off and designated as the Belleville polling district. It embraced the territory bounded by the river on the east, Second River on the south, and a point nearly the same as that now being the line between Belleville and Franklin townships was its northerly boundry; its western boundry approximately the line of the road known as that leading to the poor house. This territory, so far as local improvements were concerned, was placed in the hands of five commissioners, first appointed by the act creating the board of commissioners, and afterwards elected by the people residing within this district. Their power over this territory was quite extended.¹ It included the right to grade and pave streets, contract for water supply, lighting streets, etc. The commissioners appointed by the act were Gasherie De Witt, James H. Van Rensselaer, Hugh Holmes, Andrew Little, Theodore Sandford and John Spier.

Beside the above-named as commissioners, there were subsequently serving at different times N. H. Jorammon, Michael R. Kenny. Of this number, serving as treasurer, was Andrew Little, N. H. Jorammon and Theodore Sandford. The first board organized, and under the act made many permanent improvements, among them the paving of William Street. They also made the first contract with the city of Newark for a water supply; they continued in existence as the controlling power until March 27, 1874, when an act creating the city of Belleville was passed.² This city act embraced Belleville township as it then existed, Woodside having been set off on the south in 1869, and Franklin set off Feb. 18, 1874. Many questions arose as to our legal existence as a city, and the questions involved were sharply contested in the courts. In the meantime both the town and city authorities claiming, and, to some extent performing, the functions of their respective officers. Hugh Holmes having been elected mayor, took to himself the dignities of that office, and exercised certain functions supposed to be conferred on him by the act creating a city. A Common Council was also clerical, who, in like manner, exercised the functions of their office, as supposed to be conferred. Meanwhile the town committee held over and acted as if in authority, and so things remained until the city charter was repealed on Feb. 22, 1876 (page 481), and by the acts of the same year (see page 595) for an act defining the status of Belleville township officers. With the date of this act Belleville again became a township, with all its original powers and authority, having by means of these acts last referred to shorn both the commission and city authorities of all power.

At this time suits were pending, varied in their character, growing out of this confused state of things, notably among them the suit brought by Mifflin Paul, to recover the amount due him, being certain bonds issued by the commissioners of Belleville polling district in payment for William Street pavement, and a second to determine the right of the township authorities to have and spend over the entire township $2279.75, moneys in the hands of Theodore Sandford, as treasurer of the commissioners of the Belleville polling district, the allegation in rebutting this claim of right, being that the moneys having been assessed upon approximately one-half of said township, should not be expended upon the township at large, but upon the territory upon which it was assessed in a manner provided by legislative enactment, which should be obtained in the premises. In the last-named case it was decided in favor of the township, and a general expenditure of the money; most of the suits involving the legal existence of the city were affirmatory of its legal statutes. Those of the city officers elected and exercising the functions of their respective offices were name, besides Hugh Holmes as mayor,—O. H. Perry, chairman of Council; John L. Douglas, William McVay, Martin Malague, James Deighan, Henry Lane, Ephraim Moore, Henry R. Marchbank and R. P. Seaine, city clerks; Richard Ferris, city surveyor. The officers filling the positions of assessor, collector, town committee, chosen freeholders and town clerk for the year succeeding the return to township authority was,— 1884.—Assessor, W. Connolly; Collector, J. A. Mooney; Town Committee, John Conlin, A. Loring Cushing, James Deighan, Charles Chairman, William McVay; Chosen Freeholders, A. E. Sandford, Walter Scott; Town Clerk, E. P. Seaine.

Assessor, Charles E. Willett; Collector, John Collard; Town Committee, William Stander, John Eastwood, Charles S. Willett, Levi Becker, Edward Hooker; Chosen Freeholders, M. E. Biewert and Oliver B. Perry; Clerk, George Patterson.

1879.—Assessor, Charles E. Willett; Collector, Henry Osborn; Town Committee, John Eastwood, An. Francisco, N. H. Joralemon, A. Howard Osborn, Eli Van Hooken; Freeholders, James Scott and Minard Coymann; Clerk, Walter Scott.

1882.—Assessor, William Connolly; Collector, Henry Osborn; Town Committee, O. H. Perry, John Conlin, A. Loring Cushing, Charles Chairman, William McVay; Chosen Freeholders, A. E. Sandford and Walter Scott; Town Clerk, James T. Boylan.

1884.—Assessor, William Connolly; Collector, E. J. Sandford; Town Committee, C. H. K. Smith, James Hardman, Jr., Benjamin Preston, I. B. Baker, T. H. Henderson; Chosen Freeholders, A. E. Sandford, Patrick McVay; Clerk, R. P. Seaine.

Serving as justices of the peace at various periods commencing with the early history we name Josiah Hornblower, John Dow, John Williams, Abraham Joralemon, John C. Lloyd, William M. Sandford, Abraham Van Riper, Theodore Sandford, John W. Dow, Abraham W. Van Riper and Mr. Hays. Those serving as sheriffs of the county from this township have been William Dow, John Kennedy and S. V. C. Van Rensselaer, William H. Webster having served a term as surrogate. As members of the Senate, residents at Belleville, we give the names of Josiah Hornblower and John Dow; as members of the Assembly, Josiah Hornblower, John Dow, William M. Sandford, Capt. Abraham Spier, Abraham Van Riper, John Kennedy, Abraham V. Spier, Hugh Holmes.

Old Residents and Reminiscences.—THE SPIER FAMILY.—The first mention made of the Spiers is in connection with a grant of land lying east of the Hackensack and embracing many thousand acres, in which Hendrick H. S. Spier is named as one of several owners. Later we find that on the 28th day of March, 1679, Capt. van, an Indian sachem, executed a deed for Hapequenunck to Hans Diderick and others; still later, on March 16, 1684, in the execution of confirmatory deeds, John Hendrick Spier is named as one of the grantees.¹ The Spiers of this locality claim to be the descendants of this John Hendrick Spier. They were among the earliest settlers at Second River, and were Hollanders of the genuine type. They occupied here very large tracts of land, including much within the limits of Poversland (now the township of Franklin). There is traditional evidence among the Spiers resident here to the effect that John or Hans Spier, of whom they are descendants, was a son of John Hendrick Spier referred to. Hans Spier and Catryna, his wife, were here in 1720, and on July 13th of that year made conveyance to Arent Schuyler, John Stottenburgh and others of the church lot now occupied by the Reformed Dutch Church. The Spier tract was large and covered the heart of what is now the village of Belleville.

Abraham, son of Hans Spier, married one Getty Bross, June 17, 1724, a record of which is found in the Reformed Dutch Church at Hackensack. Their son John married Magdalen Van Dyck, April 19, 1746, at Second River. From them descended nine children, namely: Abraham, Jane, Harmonis, John, Thomas, Peter, Nantia, Betsy and Lancy. Nantia married — Vreeland, of Povershon; Betsy married Abraham King; Lancy also married a King. John Spier married Margaret Joralemon, and in early life also lived at Povershon, on what has since been known as the cotton-mill property, and afterwards moved to Belleville, occupying a stone house still standing on the bank of the river, and owned by his descendants. Later he moved and occupied the house now owned and occupied by his grandson bearing his name.

From the elder John Spier and Margaret Joralemon descended eight children, namely: Maria, Magdalen, James, John, Abraham, Margaret, Elizabeth and Anne, who died young. Maria married Abraham Van Riper, who resided on a farm immediately south of the Passaic County line, which was inherited by him from his father, John Van Riper. Abraham and Magdalen Van Riper had five children, namely: Sarah, John, Abraham, Eliza and Margaret. Of these, the two former are deceased, and Margaret married Theodore Sandford, Magdalen married John N. Joralemon, and lived and died within a hundred yards of her father's residence. James married Eliza Wade, and from him descended three children, namely: John, Alfred and Maria. Of these, John now resides where his grandparents resided most of their lives, and where his father, James, with his unmarried brothers, John and Abraham, lived until the time of their respective deaths. To John and his brother and sister descended most valuable tracts of land bordering the heart of the village, which they continue to own. Margaret married Abraham Van Houten, and they resided in the village from the time of their marriage to the date of their respective deaths. They had four children,—William, Cornelius, Abraham and Anne Maria,—all now deceased except Cornelius. Elizabeth married Peter Sandford, and resided for many years at Bloomfield or Cranestown (now Montclair). After the death of her husband she went to reside with her son-in-law, at Newark, where she is yet living, and more than eighty years of age. Of these descendants of John Spier, his son John was peculiarly ingenious, and to him is attributed the mechanical production of the first power-loom in this country, which was manufactured at Paterson. He also made models of a mowing-machine, and the model of a screw for propelling vessels, both of them embodying the principles in use to-day. While a young man, sixty or sixty-five years ago, his brother Abraham was as well known in business and political circles at one time throughout the then large county of Essex as any other man in it, and he possessed great influence, and was at one time a member of the Legislature.

John Spear, who represents the present generation here, is well known, and has held many offices of trust in the town.

Besides the Spiers and the Hornblowers, as old residents of Second River, others are entitled to mention. Capt. William Sandford settled on the opposite side of the river, as shown in a previous part of this history. Many of the descendants came to reside on this side of the river, as John and William Sandford, who, nearly a century ago, purchased lands and resided on their farms situate on the road to Newark. Michael, Abraham and Joseph, the descendants of Peter Sandford, came to Belleville about seventy-five or eighty years ago. Michael's descendants were six children,—Dianna, Peter, William Ellen, Jefferson and Joseph.

Michael Sandford was from his earliest manhood the owner and captain of vessels sailing from Belleville to New York, of which he built three on the wharf adjoining his residence, first the "Gutty," and last of them the "Two Fannys," built nearly sixty years ago, and now sailing from Newark.

Dianna married John Cotyman. Peter married Elizabeth Spar and removed to Bloomfield and died there, leaving as descendants Anna Sandford, now deceased; Charles P. Sandford, now postmaster at Montclair; and Margaret, wife of Mark W. Ball, now of Newark. Ellen married William Tise, she is now living in her eighty-second year, having only one child,—Sarah Baker, widow of Benjamin Baker. William married Mary Dow, daughter of the Rev. John Dow. Their descendants were Charles, Anna, Edmund and Cathalina Sandford, the latter now deceased; of these, Theodore and Edmund reside at Belleville; Charles resides at Paterson; Anna with her father at Belleville, who is now in his eighty-seventh year.

Stephen Van Cortlandt, so long and favorably known by old citizens, resided at one time in the old historic mansion, situated in the most easterly part of the village, now the property of S. V. C. Van Rensselaer, to whom it descended through generations preceding him. In the latter part of the past century the house was owned by Stephen Van Cortlandt, who also owned large tracts of land around it. Many acres of land were also owned by the Van Cortlandts on the south side of the brook. Stephen Van Cortlandt had an only daughter, who married John Van Rensselaer, of the patroon stock, and after his marriage came to reside at Belleville. From John Van Rensselaer and his wife descended two children, one of whom died in early life. James married Margaret Duxbery, from them descended S. V. C. Van Rensselaer James Van Rensselaer and Kate Van Rensselaer. Of these, S. V. C. Van Rensselaer now resides in Newark, and is a member of the bar. James resides at Belleville, where he is a prominent citizen. Kate married Gratz Van Rensselaer, and now resides at or near Albany, N. Y.

Among old residents we also mention the Van Ripers, now quite numerous, whose ancestors settled here at a very early period, one of whom, Cornelius, was among the first blacksmiths; had his shop on the river road a little south of the Episcopal Church lot, before and during the Revolution. It is said that when skirmishing between the British on the east bank of the river and the residents here was being engaged in, that Van Riper's shop was the place where slugs of iron were prepared in the absence of ball, having exhausted his supply of iron suited to this kind of shooting, he surrendered to the gunners first his hammer and then his sledge to be used in place of ball. The British discovering the kind of shot used, were heard to call out loudly to their comrades, "Get out of the way for God's sake, before they send us the anvil!"

Among other early settlers were the Joralemons, Wimmers, Kings, Coeymans, Leslies, Holdens, Holmeses, Cadamauses and Dr. S. L. Ward.

Commencing with the most ancient store-keepers and coming down to those engaged in that business to-day, we mention a few in each period,—Josiah Hornblower, Harmonis Spier, John Dow, William Holmes, Abraham Cadmus, Michael Sandford, William H. Brandt, William M. Sandford, Ralph Pomeroy, Nicholas S. Joralemon, William Hinton, John S. Fox, James G. Alexander, Caleb Nichols, William H. Webster.

Later, W. H. Ackerman, W. B. Crisp, Francis Haggerty, John Conlin, John Whitfield, Henry Osborn, James Runyon, Michael Gorman, John F. Wisschusen, Michael Levy, John De. Mouth, Alfred & Anson Cooper, Townsend & De Puy. Among the physicians, the earliest was Dr. Burnett, and then followed Dr. Thomas Steele, S. L. Ward, James Jameson, J. A. Corwin, Arthur Ward, J. Gibson, J. T. Dunkley, D. M. Skinner and A. M. Clark.

Banks.—MANUFACTURERS' BANK at Belleville was chartered in 1834.¹ The following persons were named as incorporators: Zenas S. Crane, John Dow, Anthony Kutger, John Williams, William Stephens, Nicholas S. Joralemon, Abraham V. Spier, William H. Brant, Ralph Pomeroy, Joseph Kingland, Cornelius G. Van Riper, George Kingsland and William B. Baldwin and their associates, the above-named being also the first directors, all except the last-named, now deceased. Capital stock, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The books of subscription to the stock of said bank were to be opened by Jacob K. Mead, Aaron A. Van Houten, John C. Lloyd, William Dow, Caleb Nichols, John Kennedy and John Lee. The stock being subscribed, they purchased a lot on the north line of Dr. Samuel L. Ward's house lot, on the west side of Main Street, and built thereon a two-story brick banking-house, probably twenty-two by forty-five feet. The first officers were Cornelius G. Van Riper, of Passaic, as president, and ——— Eustis as cashier. Prominent among those who took an interest in the bank, besides those here already named, was John S. Fox.

After a short period of prosperity the bank failed through the failure of parties to whom it had loaned money, and the banking-house was bought by Dr. Arthur Ward, who built, in part, upon the site the Miss Roberts' house, now occupied by Aaron Lloyd, Esq. This was the end of banking in Belleville.

Industries of Belleville.—HENDRICKS MILLS, situated on Second River, in the township of Belleville, formerly Bloomfield, commenced operation in what is known as the lower, or "Soho" Mill, just west of the site of the former paint-mill, by Herman Hendricks, who associated with him Solomon I. Isaacs, his brother-in-law, as owners, employing a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, for the purpose of refining and rolling sheet and bolt copper. The motive-power used was water. In 1824 they enlarged their business and built what is known as the Upper Mill, immediately in the settlement now known as "Montgomery," here conducting the business by the use of sixty horse-power additional. In the early history of this firm they employed twenty-five hands, and turned out about three hundred and fifty tons of copper per year. Their business was largely increased by the building of the Upper Mill. The pig copper was then obtained from South America, and was much inferior to that used by them now, which is mainly Lake Superior copper, and the purest in the market. The business has from time to time been largely increased, and, in addition to the water-power spoken of, they have two steam-engines, one of three hundred and one of ninety horse-power. To their former business they added the manufacture of copper rivets and wire.

The production of their manufactory is large, giving employment to about seventy-five hands. The lower, or "Soho" Mill was partially abandoned in 1867 to concentrate their business, and destroyed by fire in 1875. They have a store at 49 Cliff Street, New York, to which a large portion of the product of the factory is shipped, from which it is sold and forwarded to all parts of the United States and elsewhere. The manufacture of rivets and wire has attained quite significant proportions. As to the present proprietorship, Solomon I. Isaacs withdrew from the business in 1833, and the interest of Herman Hendricks having fallen into the hands of his sons, it was thereafter conducted in the firm-name of Hendricks Brothers, and the business finally fell into the hands of Uriah Hendricks, one of his sons, and by his death, in 1869, to his sons, and is now being conducted with great vigor in the name of Hendricks Brothers. Thus it will be seen that the business has for generations past remained continuously in Herman Hendricks and his descendants. Their capital at this time is more than equal to any necessity, and enables them to anticipate the market both in purchase and sale of stock. The Upper Mill was destroyed by fire in 1874, and was immediately rebuilt in a larger, more beautified and imposing scale, and now presents itself a magnificent manufactory, with all necessary machinery.

Originally the only means of transportation of stock and supplies to and from the factory was by boats navigating Passaic River, of which there were many going to and returning to New York with the regularity of packets. Of these boats the proprietors Hendricks and Isaacs, were part owners, with Cants.

Michael Sandford, George Whitfield and Caleb Nichols commanders, by which they received their copper and Liverpool coal no other being then used. When it is considered that these mills are distant from the river about one and a half miles, one can appreciate the great saving to them as a consequence of the construction of the Midland, now New York and Greenwood Lake Railroad, which, in its windings runs within one hundred yards of their mill, connected with which they have a spur running into their yard, and the copper and coal is shipped to them direct from the mines by this road, and their manufactured products to all parts of the United States.

Mention of a great advantage to them and of an important matter of history has been omitted in the failure to speak of the construction and opening of the Morris Canal, which runs within two hundred yards of their mill, by which a large portion of their coal is now received. One noticeable feature of the conduct of these mills has been that men once employed by these proprietors, except in rare instances, remained with them for life, to be succeeded by their descendants. Mr. James Moore, now nearly eighty years of age, having entered their employ in the early history of these works, soon after became superintendent. He has continued in that position during all the changes in ownership (taking place only by death) to this day.

The same familiar face confronts the visitor now that met his eye a half-century ago. In addition to the ownership by this firm of their mills, they now own large tracts of land, with spacious mansions and beautiful surroundings, to which they are making frequent excursions.

FOURDRIMER WIRE-WORKS.—John H. Eastwood, William Buchanan and Charles Smith entered into business in 1877, in the firm-name of Eastwood, Buchanan & Smith, as manufacturers of Fourdrimer wire-cloth and all grades of fine iron, copper and brass wire directly opposite the Mordant Works of John Eastwood, who there built a good substantial brick building, suited to the demands of the enterprise.

They furnished the factory with the required machinery, apparatus, looms etc., and here conducted this business, having a capital equal to their necessities until 1880. They then organized as a stock company, with John Eastwood as president, John H. Eastwood treasurer and Charles Smith as secretary. The business at the time having increased, soon after demanded additions to the buildings and equipments, which they furnished doubling their original capacity until their business has attained a magnitude in their specialties of which they have a right to be proud. They now employ about forty-five persons and their business is in a prosperous condition. Their products are sold and delivered in answer to orders from all parts of the country.

THE POWDER-MILL, NOW DE WITT WIRE CLOTH MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S MILL SITE is as noted for the variety of the uses for which the power has been utilized in the past as it is now remarkable for the superiority and extent of its manufactures. First this site seems to have been a part of the possession of Stephen Van Cartlandt, of whom we shall have occasion to make mention hereafter as one of the oldest, most influential and respected citizens of Second River. The earliest knowledge obtainable in relation to this mill-site locates there the dam, the pond and the road as it exists at this time. In close proximity to the dam, and upon the line of the street, if not encroaching upon it, stood a building about twenty-five by forty feet, close to which, and upon the southerly side thereof, was the race-way and water-wheel, the former running easterly parallel with the line of the road, or Mill Street, and emptying into the brook fifty feet north of the bridge, crossing Second River on the road to Newark. Here there has been a succession of bridges, first a wooden one, which gave way to an arched structure of stone. This is now succeeded by an iron bridge of a character that marks the advance of the age.

The building mentioned was a grist mill and was conducted by a man whose name was Marks as a country mill up to the war of 1812, when Stephen Decatur, the brother of Commodore Decatur, probably at the former's suggestion, saw an opportunity of establishing a profitable business, and at the same time serving his country by furnishing a supply of the much needed powder, in the firm-name of Decatur, Rucker & Ballard, secured this mill and site, then building the exact counter part of the first-described building on the south side of the race and at the same time other buildings; constructing one south of the brook, the half-filled cellar of which is yet to be found two hundred feet east of the dam; and inclosed the whole mill-site by a tight board fence eight feet high, taking in half as much south as north of the brook. They entered upon the manufacture of powder, fully realizing all they had anticipated in regard to its sale. But, as is the case in many instances, they manufactured the destroyer of their success, and one day in 1814 the most startling and shocking event in Second River (now Belleville) history occurred,—when, with tremendous report, followed by earthquake-like rumbling, these buildings, that a moment before sheltered the inmates of this hive of industry, were torn and hurled hundreds of feet in the air. What could be more horrifying than the scene presented here? Upon the ground lay several human beings bleeding, groaning, dying, and some already dead. Said an eye-witness, now eighty-seven years of age, who heard the report, saw the shattered debris in the air, and visited the scene of disaster, distress and death within a few minutes of the occurrence. "I always regretted that I had been tempted to look upon the scene." The remains of some of the victims of this disaster found a last resting-place in the graveyard of the Reformed Dutch Church at Belleville, where ton stones mark the place. Nothing but the concentrated and energetic efforts of the citizens prevented the rebuilding of the mill. For this opposition one of them was cruelly beaten in the public streets by a member of the firm. Soon after, and probably in 1815 or 1816, Thomas Uffington, then a resident of the place, engaged in the business of gold-beating in the rear of his residence, leased these premises, built there on such buildings as he required, changed the course of the race-way to suit the position of his mill, creating one of them close to the dam and just north of the brook. To these premises he removed his business of gold-beating, which he here conducted on a much larger scale, employing in gold-beating alone twenty or twenty-five hands. He also engaged in the manufacture and rolling of sheet-brass, and within a short time embarked in the manufacture of other articles, as umbrella furniture, runners, ferrules, tips and strainers, for which he rolled the wire. Thus commenced the production of wire at Belleville, probably sixty-six years ago, or in 1818. About this time he sold out the business of gold-beating to Mr. Jones, who removed it to New York City. In the mean time a Mr. Bragg moved out from New York and commenced the manufacture of brass lamps (of a kind much used in stores) in a dwelling known as the old Courtlandt house, nearly opposite the Big Rock, adjoining the Minard Coreman tract. Not succeeding in he sold out this business to Mr. Uffington who made this an addition to his other business, enlarged his works, added to his force of employes, so that at this time he probably employed fifty or sixty hands, twelve or fifteen of whom were apprentices, and provided for in his own house. He lived alternately in what has been since known as the Mansion House opposite the bridge, and the stone house on Main Street, since spoken of as the McComb house. He was an Englishman by birth, an intelligent gentleman, and probably continued this business up to 1835. William Stephens also a native of England, and who came here a young man, had at this time been some years in the employ of Mr. Uffington as clerk of his establishment, and had gained considerable knowledge of the business.

Mr. Uffington failing of success in business, William Stephens associated with him Thomas Thomas and Fuller, and, under the firm-name of Stephens, Thomas & Fuller, succeeded Mr. Uffington in the business, and continued it so far as the rolling and manufacturing of sheet-brass was concerned, discontinuing the making of umbrella furniture, and William Stephens associating with him William Dougherty, took up the lamp business, of which mention will be made elsewhere.

The business of the manufacture and rolling of sheet-brass was continued by Stephens, Thomas & Fuller until 1840, when the latter died, and Stephens & Thomas pursued this and added to it other business, at one period notably that of making coins for Brazil, Liberia and San Domingo, and a small coin called a "token" for different firms through the country. This token was redeemable by those issuing it. This business of money making became a very extensive one, they often shipping fifteen or twenty tons at a time to New York, from where it was shipped to its destination.

The greatest activity prevailed and many men were employed. This coin varied in size from that of a cent to a silver dollar and was made of copper. Its manufacture was of comparatively short duration, not more than two years or possibly three.

About the year 1836 the drawing of coarse wire was commenced here; the first fine wire was made in 1845, and the first Fourdrinier wire in 1847. The first Fourdrinier cloth having from three thousand to four thousand meshes to the square inch, and the first dandy rolls were made in this country, the last-named being cylindrical in form, from seven to ten inches in diameter and from four to seven feet in length.

This roll is covered with fine wire-cloth, and is used in connection with the Fourdrinier wire in the process of making paper.

The dandy roll is sometimes used for water-marking the paper. By sewing letters or other designs on the wire cloth it leaves the impression on the wet paper which is retained when dried and finished.

Peter Staniar (now deceased), who came here about 1843 from England, is the person who is entitled to the mechanical production of fine wire, and William Staniar, now of the firm of Staniar & Linsley, manufacturers of wire and wire-cloth at East Newark, who also came here from England, to the mechanical production of woven wire cloth and Fourdrinier cloths as here first manufactured. The wire used for Morse's experimental telegraph line from Washington to Baltimore was drawn here, and was copper wire, none other being then used. At the dissolution of the firm of Stephens & Thomas, William Stephens succeeded to the business, and thereafter the firm was William Stephens & Son up to 1857. Peter Staniar and William Staniar from the date of their connection with the production of wire and wire-cloth, respectively, were silent partners in the business.

The business failing of success, Gaslerie De Witt & Brother (Josiah II.) being associated with him, further on De Witt Brothers & Co., at this time adding to the firm Cornelius Van Houten and James G. De Witt, conducted it up to 1876, when they organized as an incorporated company in the name of the De Witt Wire-Cloth Manufacturing Company, in which name they are now conducting the business. The De Witt Wire-Cloth Company organized with a capital stock of two hundred thousand dollars, which was afterwards increased to three hundred thousand dollars. The present officers of this firm are Michael Dyer, president; F. J. Bartlett, Philadelphia, vice-president; J. G. De Witt, Brooklyn, treasurer; Cornelius Van Houten, Belleville, N. J., superintendent. They have stores at 87 Chambers Street, New York, and 703

Market Street, Philadelphia. The premises were owned by the Van Comblunds and Van Rensselaers until the organization of the De Witt Wire Cloth Company, in 1876, when they purchased it, and are now the owners.

This industry, with small beginning in 1847, has made extensive developments from two looms and twelve wire blocks and very few workmen to what is now produced by over one hundred and sixty hands, one hundred and fifty blocks and over fifty looms, thirty-four of which are run by steam-power (the water-power being mainly used for rolling), and the additional production by other machinery introduced for making wire cables, ropes, cords, etc. The factory, excepting the hand-weaving department, was originally run exclusively by water,—forty horse-power. They now have a steam-engine of one hundred and twenty horse-power, consuming, with the annealing furnaces, about twelve hundred tons of coal per annum.

Having spoken of the connection of Peter and William Stanier with the origin of this business, justice demands that mention should be made of how much its success is due to the enterprise of Gasherie De Witt (deceased), whose tact, business foresight and perseverance gave that start to the business that placed it on the road to success; and of Cornelius Van Houten, the application of whose skill, ingenuity, experience and perseverance in mechanics, commencing with the origin of this business, in 1847, and continuing to this time, has furnished not only the mechanical skill, but has contributed largely to the intelligent systematic and persevering conducting of the business.

They have at intervals (suggested by the necessity to answer the increasing demand for their productions) added to their buildings, until their works now cover a very large area, and present a scene of great activity.

JOSIAH RHODES'S MILL.—Probably fifty-seven years ago John Andrews leased a plot of the east end of the now De Witt Wire-Cloth Manufacturing Company's mill site, and built thereon a factory about fifty by seventy-five feet on the ground, two stories high. He used power derived from a small dam with a raceway leading to it from the mill, and engaged in the manufacture of felt-cloth. He soon discontinued the business here and engaged in the same manufacture on the opposite side of the river, a mile above the village. The building here stood idle for a short time, and in the spring of 1837 was leased by Josiah Rhodes, who there conducted the business of dressing skins of seals, otter, minks, beaver, etc., which business he pursued for some time, then added to it the blowing of furs. After a few years, and about thirty-seven years ago, A. D. Crane being the inventor of a year clock, had carried on its manufacture in a small way. The firm was James R. Mills and Co. Soon after a more extensive company was formed known as the Year Clock Company. The stockholders were James R. Mills, Josiah Rhodes, Henry K. Cadmus, Abraham V. Speer and others. They leased the mill occupied by Josiah Rhodes and engaged quite extensively in manufacturing these clocks, and lost several thousand dollars in the business. They continued the business about two years, when after the failure of this business Josiah Rhodes started a grist-mill, and kept a flour and feed-store there for some years. The mill burned down in 1858. Josiah Rhodes removed to New York, bought a mill there and there died.

SKIN DRESSING AND SPLITTING.—In the spring of 1836, an Englishman by birth, then fifty years of age, with his wife, came to this country and to Belleville for the purpose of engaging in business. He was a man of intelligence and of large business experience; was possessed of much practical knowledge in mechanics, all the result of having conducted an extensive business in England as a tanner, dresser and splitter of hides or skins. Though he had recently been unfortunate in business at home he yet had some means, and came here in the hope of retrieving his fortune. He brought with him two of his former employés having a knowledge of the business, also a pattern of the principal portion of a skin-splitting machine, of which he said he had been the owner at home. This he called the vibrating bar of the machine. The writer of this article then being an apprentice with his father to the trade of carriage-making, though he had no knowledge of pattern-making, was employed by Mr. Longstaff to make the remaining portions of a machine for splitting skins. They were made, and the castings procured in Newark, brought in their rough state from there, whereby Mr. Longstaff, and the writer chipped, filed, drilled, and otherwise fitted, the required frame made, the machine set up completed.

Sheep-skins in great numbers were split upon this machine between forty-eight and forty-nine years ago. Mr. Longstaff said that the skins put through this machine were the first ever split in this country, and careful inquiry warrants the believing that it is true, and that to Belleville is due the credit of being the place of the beginning of this now extensive branch of business, and to one of its citizens the claim of the mechanical production of the machine and of taking part in splitting the first skin. Mr. Longstaff's place of business was on a wharf on the Passaic a short distance south of the Episcopal Church, then owned by the late Michael Sandford.

THE MANUFACTORY OF MORIANTS FOR DYEING and setting colors in silks, cottons, woollens and other fabrics was first established here by John Eastwood, a man of more than usual business foresight and energy. On his arrival in this country from England, in 1847, the business at first was not large. It was located on a portion of the lands now owned by the De Witt Wire-Cloth Company. Eastwood conducted the business with moderate success until 1857, when the establishment burned down, and he then purchased the present site of his works in the northerly part of the village, being a tract of seven or eight acres, with a frontage of several hundred feet on Passaic River. Here he built factories on a much larger scale, to which he has added buildings from time to time, and improved and increased the capacity of his machinery and appliances to meet the growing demand for his products, until he now has the largest works of the kind in the United States, and employs about sixty men; uses an average of sixty thousand cords of wood annually, which he receives, with other supplies, by vessels coming direct to his wharf. His products are also shipped by boats to all accessible points, and by railroad all over the manufacturing portions of this country. The grounds upon which these works are built comprise eight or nine acres, having a water-front of several hundred feet. By the vigorous and judicious conduct of the business he has amassed a fortune, and occupies a stately mansion with tastefully arranged surroundings.

THE RIVERSIDE RUBBER-WORKS were established in 1878 in Newark, under the name of the Eagle Rubber-Works, by James Hardman, Jr., and J. A. Reel. They soon after removed the business to Belleville, and located on the east side of Main Street, on a wharf formerly the property of Henry K. Cadmus, and occupied a building used prior to that time as the cotton-waste works, conducted successively by James Murphy and one Sylvester. In 1878, J. A. Reel retired from the business, and it was continued by James Hardman, Jr. The business increasing rapidly, in 1882 the works were enlarged by the construction of a three-story brick building of considerable size, adding at the same time other buildings and further increasing the facilities by putting in a very fine Corless engine of sixty horsepower. The name of the works at the time of this enlargement was changed to the Riverside Rubber-Works. There are also on the grounds a machine-shop with the most approved tools and machinery of the day. This firm started six years ago with a capital of seven hundred dollars, nearly all of which was absorbed in tools and fixtures, manufactured small articles, known as stationery supplies, as pencil tips, erasers, etc. Now the works presents a scene of activity; the capital is forty thousand dollars, thirty-five hands are employed, and the variety of goods manufactured has been largely increased.

The firm now has an office in New York, under the management of H. J. Yatman. George Quayle is superintendent of the works.

PAINT-MILL.—The mill site now known as the Paint-Mill is the first below the mill site of Hendricks' Lower Mill, or Soho. It has a forty-horse water-power. The first use of this power is believed to have been for a snuff-mill, eighty years ago or more. Soon after this period it is known to have been used for a grist-mill, conducted by William Holmes, who was afterwards a merchant here and prominently known. Many years ago the firm of Hinton & Moore, dealers in white lead, purchased this site, improved the dam, and built thereon substantial stone buildings, the front of which was close upon the line of the road, and extended probably one hundred and fifty feet along its line. It was two stories high. Here they conducted a successful business in the manufacture of white lead for many years, receiving frequently two or three boat-loads in succession of pig-lead, brights and other supplies, and in turn shipping the white lead to New York, often from fifty to seventy-five tons at a time. The manufacturing was under the superintendence of John Grice, afterwards his son, John T. Grice. Mr. Hinton died, and the business was for some years carried on by Gen. James A. Moore, who for fifty years resided opposite the mill, and died there, at an advanced age, fifteen or eighteen years ago. During his business years John Armor, his brother-in-law, was his book-keeper. A stock company was formed, with George Campbell, of Brooklyn, as principal stockholder and manager, under whose management, commencing probably forty five years ago, the business was greatly enlarged, the old mill was added to and many other buildings erected. They quadrupled their business and often shipped hundreds of tons of the product of the factory in a single week. After conducting the business several years they discontinued it. The premises and power were unused for a few years and finally burned down, probably twenty years ago. The property was purchased by Hendricks Brothers, and now belongs to them.

BUTTON MANUFACTORY.—The firm of Gibbs, Gardner & Co., organized about fifty years ago, was composed of John Gibbs, John Gardner and others. They procured a building on the premises occupied by Stephens, Thomas & Fuller, and engaged in the manufacture of brass buttons, of a kind much used in that day, and without which no respectable coat was complete. They employed many hands and turned out large quantities of these buttons. The co-partners named were mechanics of more than ordinary skill in many branches, notably that of die-sinking. They continued business here for some years. John Gardner removed to Newark, where he will be remembered as a resident in Mulberry Street, near Centre, where he conducted business as a manufacturer of many small articles. John Gibbs remained here for many years, and engaged in various branches of business. He conducted the business of blacksmithing on quite a large scale, succeeding David Buck, who died while engaged in this business more than forty years ago. Besides the ordinary business of smithing, he forged many tons of iron annually into the required shapes for furnishing vessels, built by Cornelius C. Joralemon, who at this time, as well as earlier and later, was building some of the finest coasting-vessels afloat, some of them as large as six hundred tons burden. Mr. Gibbs also owned and ran a line of stages from here to Newark, and also from here to New York. He afterward moved to Brooklyn, where he conducted an extensive manufactory in metals, and where he is now living.

CALICO-WORKS.—This site was first occupied by Bennett as a grist-mill many years ago. The front of the dam was then two hundred feet west of the front of the present dam. It was made of logs, and the road at that time ran across lands now occupied by the extension of the dam, the raceway from which ran down the southerly side of the brook, as it has ever since. There was a mill, probably about one hundred feet long by thirty feet in width, standing close upon the line of the road, opposite the old stone house now standing on the northerly side of Mill Street, two hundred and fifty feet west of Washington Avenue. This was the house in which the miller resided. The mill was frame and covered with shingles on the sides and ends, as well as the roof, with three doors in the road side of the sume. The water-wheel was in its southerly side, and the water by which it was driven was taken from the raceway on the southerly side of the brook, and carried across the same on an elevated trestle-work by means of a flume or conduit resting upon a frame-work of considerable height, several feet wider at the base than at the flume. The water having reached the mill, fell upon an overshot wheel of considerable height, and gave quite extensive power. This was not only a country, but a merchant mill. Capt. Bennett, the then proprietor, with his family, lived in the residence immediately owned and occupied by George and Jonathan Bird, and also here owned a farm of several acres, being a part of the mill land. There was used, in connection with this mill, a store-house standing on the banks of the Passaic, and fully described in connection with the history of the Episcopal Church. Capt. Bennett conducted this mill for some years, and was succeeded in its ownership by Capt. Stout. After his purchase he extended the dam from its original log front, and built its present front of stone, thus increasing the power. He took down the mill described, and operated by Bennett, and built a new mill directly south of the first-named, and on the south side of the brook.

This building formed a part of the easterly end of what was afterwards the calico-works. He also owned the lands before referred to, and occupied the house previously occupied by Bennett, using the store-house spoken of on the river for the storage of grain. He carried on quite an extensive business in milling for several years, this being exclusively a merchant mill. He built a smaller mill west of the first described, which was used as a country mill. The building spoken of was built by William Benson, who afterwards married a Miss King. He resided here the remainder of his days, and brought up a large family. He was known as a good mechanic or millwright, and had charge a large portion of his after-life of a grist-mill located on the opposite side of the road from the dam.

This last-named mill having remained idle was taken down. The premises on which Stout built his mill, with all the lands and water-power, including the dwelling-house occupied by him, was sold to the Eagle Printing Company, and they built on this site, about sixty years ago, a stone factory of several hundred feet in length, a building of peculiarly fine appearance for a factory. It had a cut-stone front of several hundred feet in extent, with alternate extensions and recesses. The east end of this factory was also previously the east end of Stout's mill. This factory was erected by the company as a bleaching and calico-printing establishment. They carried on a very extensive business, and employed more than one hundred hands, and conducted the business for some years, but finally failed about fifty years ago.

Raney was, during these years, a stockholder and superintendent. John Truesler was manager. After their failure Andrew Gray and one Right afterwards successively conducted this business, Caleb Duxbury being manager. Some time afterwards the premises were purchased by George Bird, and George and Jonathan Bird conducted these works and continued the business for many years successfully, George Bird acquiring a competency. Soon after his death Jonathan Bird succeeded to the business for a time when the premises were sold to a stock company, of which John Eastwood, of Belleville, was one. They put in large quantities of expensive machinery, as it was said the old was out of date.

A Mr. Pattison was manager and John Eastwood general superintendent. Owing mainly to disagreements in the company, they did business but a very short time. The machinery was soon sold and removed. The mill then remained idle for a time and was purchased by Moore & Seely with the intention of starting an extensive hat manufactory. They proceeded to fit it up for that purpose, and while so engaged it burnt down and was never rebuilt.

RANDOLPH'S OR KENNEDY'S MILL.—The history of this mill site, from the most ancient knowledge we can gain in reference to it, is as follows: It was the most westerly on Second River, this side of the line dividing what was known as Second River from Bloomfield, the dam of which is now in Bloomfield and the mill in Belleville township.

About eighty years ago there was located here a saw-mill. Soon after this period the proprietor, a Mr. Mix, engaged in sawing mahogany for cabinet-makers' use, the logs being brought from San Domingo. Mix was succeeded by John Miller a few years later, who continued the business, and was followed by — Van Dyck, nearly seventy years ago, who, owning the site, established there a chocolate-mill, the bean being shipped to him from New York. This business he conducted quite spiritedly for a time, when he discontinued it, and after a short interval was succeeded by his son or a very short period. About sixty years ago Hugh F. Randolph, a man favorably recollected for his kind-heartedness and general consideration of others, one of whose descendants is now a prominent citizen of Bloomfield and president of the Morris Canal Company, purchased this mill site and re-established the business of mahogany-sawing. The business was successfully conducted by Mr. Randolph for a number of years on quite a large scale. He sold out to Mr. Gwinn. He built additions to and greatly enlarged the mill, fitted it up as a paper-mill, and let it to William Frame, a merchant of Bloomfield, afterwards sheriff of Essex County, who carried on the business of paper-making there for some years. Mr. Gwinn built another paper-mill on the same site, and conducted it by the use of steam, thus being the owner of two paper-mills, running one of them himself, while he also conducted the business of manufacturing chemicals. He purchased an acre of land opposite his chemical-works, built a fine residence, artistically laid out and beautified the grounds, and lived there for a number of years, conducting his various enterprises. After his death John Kennedy purchased the mills, and for several years carried on the business of paper-making quite extensively in the use of both mills.

Finally the mills burned down, and the site and power were purchased by J. Hunt Adams who erected thereon a spacious structure and put in expensive machinery. About twenty years ago this proved unsuccessful, and the property was used a short time as a file-factory, and subsequently as a smelting-works or refinery. Still later it was occupied by James B. Hervey as a laundry, who there employed many hands and conducted quite an extensive business. The entire premises were sold a few years ago to Adam Smith, of New York, who now owns it. The establishment is now occupied by the Charles T. White Chemical Company, who commenced business about a year ago. Newman White and Edward E. Milke compose the company.

LAMPS, ETC.—William Stephens and William Dougherty, engaged in the lamp business, commenced operations as manufacturers of brass lamps and spittoons on the premises of Mr. Stephens' father-in-law, James Hornblower, a short distance south of the Dutch Reformed Church, and on the river side of the road. To this business they added that of making tin-ware. This last-named enterprise was bought out by James Browe, who, with his brother William, also did something at the former (the making of lamps) in their shop in William Street. James Browe removed the business from here to his store in Main Street, where he has continued making tinware, and added to it the stove business, which he has followed to this time.

LAUNDRY.—The laundrying of new shirts is here conducted on a quite extensive scale by George T. Chabolt. His buildings cover a large area, are of brick, substantial in their character and well arranged. The power employed is steam, and the water used obtained from the Jersey City Water-Works. This laundry was established twenty-two years ago by James B. Hervey. It is the largest and most complete establishment of the kind in this country. Employs two hundred hands, seventy-five of whom are Chinamen. From sixty to seventy thousand dollars are here paid out annually as wages. It is now conducted in a most systematic and energetic manner. Large consignments of goods are shipped to and from the factory daily by teams belonging to the proprietor.

QUARRIES.—Among the many industries and resources of Belleville, notably from a very early period in the history of Second River (now Belleville) the quarrying of brown stone and its shipment to market has been one of considerable extent. Quarries were opened a century ago near Hendricks' works, from which large quantities of stone were taken and shipped to New York and elsewhere, as not only the ancient brown stone fronts of New York, but also the more beautiful of recent date, give decided evidence. It is also said that a large portion of the stone in the fortifications in and about New York were taken from these quarries. The quarrying and shipment of this stone at this period was one of the largest industries of this locality, thousands of tons being quarried and shipped each year from these and the North Belleville quarries. Among those who have conducted these quarries from time to time are Cornelius Thomas, Wm. H. Harris, Abraham Joralemon, Alex. Philip, Messrs. Baldwin & Pattison, John D. I. Robinson.

Belleville Fire Department.—Forty years ago the people of Belleville were sufficiently alive to the importance of protecting their property against the ravages of fire, and were guarded to a certain extent by a primitive style of fire-engine, which the boys delighted to call the "Coffee-Mill." It was a huge box on wheels, with long handles working on a crank on either side. Each handle was manned by six men, and when a dozen firemen got full speed upon this rotary engine a considerable stream of water was thrown provided the supply from the wells or cisterns held out. The "Coffee-Mill" fell into decay, and during its latter days a more modern engine was put into use. This apparatus was kept in a building near the Dutch Reformed Church, and a few of the present receding generation look back with pleasure upon the days when they "ran with the machine." This engine fell to pieces, and was succeeded by a hook-and-ladder truck about twenty-five years ago. For many years this truck did service, but it also rusted out, rotted and became a wreck, and for a long time Belleville was without any appliances for the extinguishing of fires.

On the 23d of June, 1882, the present department was organized by the appointment, by the fire commissioners, of twelve men to each hose company. The companies were named respectively the Valley Hose Company and the Eastwood Hose Company. Each has a "jumper" and about seven hundred and fifty feet of hose, and is manned by about twenty-five active members.

The Valley Hose is stationed in John Street. The foreman is John Hughes; Assistant, John Hawley. The Eastwoods are on William Street, near Washington Avenue. Foreman, John Smith; Assistant, John Lawrence.

Both of these companies have neat two-story houses, built by the town at a cost of six hundred dollars each. The room in the upper story is large and suitable for meetings of the company. The Valley Company have put two hundred and fifty dollars' worth of furniture in this room, and have suspended a locomotive tire over the house for the purpose of giving alarm signals.

The Belleville department is controlled primarily by its Board of Fire Commissioners, composed as follows: James Harman, Jr., John H. Eastwood, Arthur E. Sandford, John Osborn, A. H. Osborn. The chief engineer is John Osborn, and his assistant Arthur E. Sandford.

The expenses of the department are paid for by a tax upon the property within the limits of the fire district. This district extends from the Second River to Eastwood's factory, and from the Passaic westward six hundred feet from Main Street, or nearly to the railroad track, also six hundred feet north and south of William Street. The district includes all the populous territory of the township; and the line of hydrants supplying water from the high-service reservoir of the Newark Aqueduct Board, with a pressure of seventy-two pounds to the square inch, dispenses entirely with the need of fire-engines.

The department has a relief fund for the benefit of sick or disabled firemen, their widows or orphans. The fund is judiciously managed by a board of three trustees, and has now over six hundred dollars in the treasury.

CHAPTER LXX.

MONTCLAIR TOWNSHIP.¹

"THE MOUNTAIN" was the earliest designation of the western border of the original colony of Newark. This highland, which is itself a spur of the Highlands of the Hudson, extending from the "steep rocks" near the "Great Fall" of the Passaic to the headwaters of the Raritan, the Hackensacks called Watchung or Atchung or Atchunk. The Indian word is an Iroquois name mountain, and its root is the same as that of Mass-atchu-sets, the land of mountains. The central part of the ridge and slope, with its adjoining foot-lands, has been rescued from the some what rough guttural of the aborigines, and has received in recent times the more melodious name of Montclair. Although the "mountains" of New Jersey are only hills of moderate height, yet the beautiful outlook from many points along the top, the clearness and sweetness of the air, the charm of the rural landscape just at hand, and of the cities and harbor in the distance, render the name most appropriate. From "Eagle Rock" on the south to "the Notch" on the north the mountain summit and its slope are seats of vision, and the valleys at the foot share the associations of the heights.

Geographical and Topographical.—The township is four and one-sixth miles in length on the western mountain crest, four and a half miles on the eastern ridge of Bloomfield, and has an average breadth of one and one-sixth miles.

The township of Caldwell lies west of the mountain summit, Acquackanonk lies on the north, Bloomfield on the east and Orange on the south.

Above the village rise two rivulets, which flow southward and eastward to form in Bloomfield the little stream anciently known as Second River. In the northern end of the town rises another rivulet, which pushes its elbow over the northern line of the town and enters the northeast corner of Bloomfield. It was known in the early settlement of the colony as Third River. These rivers or brooks discharge their waters into the Passaic at the northern and southern limits of the former township of Belleville. In the territory of Montclair they are too small for water-power, although in ancient times their better water supply gave power to two small mills.

These streams run in the line of broad and shallow valleys lying at the foot of the mountain, and from the valleys the land swells eastward to the Bloomfield border.

The geological formation of the mountain is true. It is overlaid with sandstone. The soil above the freestone, prevalent throughout the town, is a mixed gravel and loam. The farms, however, are everywhere disappearing, and the suburban residence is everywhere rising, so that the visitor sees the taste and elegance which indicate the proximity of the great city.

Early Descriptions.—The original colony tract of Newark extended, to use the Indian names in the earliest title, from Weequachick to Yauntokah, and from the Passaic to Watchung. Weequachick was the creek which runs from the cove of Newark Bay between Elizabethtown and Newark. Yauntokah was the Third River.

The original description of the tract, if strictly construed, had no west line. The mountain was assumed for a boundary. A second purchase was made to avoid misapprehension. There was much debate ten years after the first purchase of 1666 about buying the land to the top of the mountain. The second deed, of 1677-78, reads:

"Whereas, in the original deed of sale made by the Indians to the inhabitants of the town of Newark, bearing date the eleventh day of July, 1667, it is said to the foot of the Great Mountains, called Watchung, alias Atchuck, Wee Winckrop and Shenocklehu Indians and owners of the said Great Mountains, for and in consideration of two Guns, Three Coates, and thirteen Kams of Rum, to us in land paid, etc., doe covenant and declare, etc., that it is meant, agreed and intended, that their bounds shall reach and goe to the top of the said Great Mountains, and that Wee the said Indians will make out the same to remaine to them, the said inhabitants of Newark, their heirs or Assignes for Ever."

Although John Curtis and John Treat, surveyors, were chosen by the town that same year "to run" this "west line with the Indians," it has been a very indefinite boundary in the detail even down to half a century ago.

All the present territory of Montclair was included within the colony or "town" of Newark for one hundred and forty-six years. At the end of that time, in 1812, the township of Bloomfield was created. It included all the northern end of the colony, and comprised about two-fifths of its territory. For twenty-seven years Bloomfield extended from the ridge of the mountain to the Passaic, until Belleville was joined, in 1839. Twenty-nine years later, in 1868, the town of Montclair received its separate organization. The line between the two towns of Montclair and Bloomfield is defined as follows:

"Beginning at a point in the centre of the stone arch bridge over the stream crossing the road west of and near to the residence of Henry Stucky on the Orange line; thence from said starting-point in a straight line about north thirty-one degrees and five minutes east, to a point in Passaic County line, which point is five hundred feet west on said county line of the road running in front of the residence of Cornelius Van Houten."

The Hollanders.—When the Hollanders, who had gained influence at the Indian-trading place of Acquackanonk, on the Passaic, made the purchase of the Acquackanonk tract, in 1679 and 1684, they laid their farms in parallel strips along the northern Newark border back to the mountain. The Dutch came at once into acquaintance with the Puritan manager, and at an early day secured land this side the township line. Acquackanonk and Newark were within the one county of Essex, and the relations soon became as if the two kinds of people were fellow-colonists. They did become, and have since continued to be, fellow-townsmen. Nearly one-half the territory of the present town of Montclair was settled by the Dutch. In later days the more dense Holland settlement of North Caldwell, or Fairfield, has had a reactionary movement eastward over the mountain. The relations of the Puritan and of the Dutch descendants have always been most cordial, and no one has ever thought the Hollanders specially deserved to have pointed at them Canning's couplet,—

'Tis matters of commerce, the fault of the Dutch
Is giving too little and asking too much."

The Dutch name often covers English blood, and the English family goes back to Dutch ancestor.

The Early Out Lands and Houses.—Even before the second purchase from the Indians had fully established the right to the slope of the mountains the first land-owners had made their way from the Passaic to the top of the mountain. In the proprietary records the first name on the list of surveys of these out-lands is Jasper Craine, in 1675. Besides his "home lot" in the settlement, his lots in the "Great Neck" and his lot near the head of Mill Brook, he has that year land "at the head of y^e Second River," twenty acres, with Mr Samuel Kitchell on the north, with Thomas Huntington east, and with common land south and west. Another adjoining land-owner is Aaron Blackley. This group of four land-owners, three with surveys in 1675 and one with a survey in 1679, is located, according to the descriptions: "at the head of Second River," "lying in the branches of Second River," "by the first branch of the Second River," with a highway running east and west along the side of one of the tracts. This location was, no doubt, in the heart of the present Montclair, somewhere between the old Fordham Crane mansion and south end of the town, along the Second River. The east and west road may have been the present Church Street or a road connecting eastward with Watsonson, as Bloomfield was then called.

This Jasper Craine Dr. Stevens describes as "an active, energetic, and perhaps a witless man, who had aided already in the commencement of two or three new settlements," and, as early as the year 1651, had been only prevented by the "injustice and violence of the Dutch" (so we thought it) from establishing another on the banks of the Delaware, "whereby," he said, "the gospel might have been published to the natives and much good done, not only to the colonies at present, but to posterity." He was, therefore, both by character and by experience, the man to lead the pioneer movement to the mountain.

In addition to these owners of out-lands in the centre of the present population, there were also extending along the mountain from the northern part of Orange to the northern part of Montclair a good number of others whose names can be traced. There were near the mountain, in 1675, John Ward (turner) and John Baldwin, Sr. At the mountain, in 1675, Robert Layman, Sergt Richard Harrison and Samuel Swaine; in 1694, Azariah Crane and John Gardner, and in 1786, Nathaniel Wheeler, John Johnson, Mr Ward and the Widow Ogden. Between the mountain and Wigwam Brook, in 1689, Matthew Williams, Paul George and Samuel Day, and Mary Day "now Mary Olliv." Upon the mountain, Robert Layman and John Baldwin. At the mountain, with land reaching to the top of the mountain, in 1675, John Oatlin and John Baldwin Sr., Hannah Freeman and Richard Harrison. At the foot of the mountain, in 1679, Samuel Harrison, Anthony Olliv (Olive), John Oatlin and Thomas Johnson; in 1694, John Conduer, Azariah Crane and John Baldwin, Jr. Along the mountain, Edward Ball in 1694; between Third River and the mountain at the Acquackanonk line, at about the end of the century, John Cooper and Samuel Kitchell; and between Toney's Brook and the mountain, in the new century, in 1724, Josiah Ogden, "adjoining to the plantation of Vanneuklos, on which he now dwells."

These land-owners, who had penetrated beyond the land-owners at Watsonson and Wigwam Brook, did not venture to build houses. We have hints of the woods and the swamps, of the wigwam and the forl, but no intimation as yet of a house. Although the Indians were friendly, the apprehension of "a rising" on the part of the natives had been one cause to prevent immediate settlement in the out-lands. There had been Indian wars in Connecticut, and this colony was directly connected with those who were engaged in bloody battles against the native tribes there.

The saw mill which Thomas Davis had liberty to set up in 1695 is supposed to have been located near the Peter Davis land, the site being not far from the ruins of the Crane or Wilde woolen-mill; the saw-mill implies houses soon after. Anthony Olive had a house on Wigwam Brook, in Orange, in 1712; Joseph Jones a house in 1721, on the mountain road, (probably in East Orange); Daniel Dodd a house in the present Bloomfield, in 1719; Capt. John Morris, a grist-mill, "lately built," in 1720, on the Morris plantation; but no authentic date of a house appears here earlier than that of a dwelling of one Vanneuklos, near Toney's Brook, in 1724. Stone houses which were then antiquities were one hundred years ago all along the Orange and Paterson and Bloomfield roads. There were two stone houses on the Vincent property. There were the Charles Crane, the Phineas Crane, the Samuel Jedediah Ward, the Samuel Miller Ward and the Joseph Baldwin houses along the old Orange road in the same vicinity. There were the houses of the Cranes; Benjamin, Stephen, Eleazer, Nathaniel, Aaron (so known afterwards) built some of them before the Revolution, and some of them, it can hardly be questioned, in the early part of that century. The William Crane house, called afterwards the Amos Crane house or the Fordham Crane house, appears in 1743, and Levi Vincent, John Low, Johannes Kiper and Thomas Calmus are residents that year. The Egbert houses, the Joseph Baldwin house, the houses of the Van Giesons, of Jacob Kent, of the Seiglers and the Speers, along the Valley and the Falls roads northward, go back undoubtedly before the Revolution. The Parmenas Dodd house, on the site of the Presbyterian Church, facing the road southward; the Nathaniel Dodd house, half-way down from the church to the depot, facing the old road northward; the John Smith house and the Peter Davis house, farther east on the same road, were built probably between the middle of the century and the Revolution. The most of these houses, two rooms long and one story high, were built of field-stone rudely dressed. The freestone first began to be quarried in 1721, but it was not used for house-building.

In the account of a hurricane which swept along the mountain, reported in a New York newspaper in July, 1756, orchards, fences, corn-fields and woodlands for a mile and a half along the mountain and Daddtown region are mentioned, with twenty-five houses and barns as being injured or destroyed. This shows a great advance in improvement and building.

Indian Titles and Riots.—Excitement in respect to Indian titles over the mountain in Horseneck filled the ancient township during the middle part of the century. The Cranes, Harrisons, Morris and Dodds had been among the subscribers for the purchase from the Indians of land west of the mountain, north of the Minisink path and within the upper Passaic at the beginning of the century. A strenuous contest of more than half a century followed. The proprietors of the province denied the validity of the Indian deed. The residents in Horseneck and the owners residing this side of the mountain asserted their claim. The pastor at Newark Mountains took the side of the subscribers and residents. Riots broke out. The Legislature was unable to meet them. Arrests, indictments, convictions followed. John Vincent and Levi Vincent, Jr., John Dodd and Jonathan Davis, Jr., were among the indicted. Those committed to jail were liberated by the people, and great confusion prevailed. The number of respectable citizens engaged was no doubt large, and the excitement high. Daniel Pierson, a man well-informed on the subject, stated "that three-fifths hold lands under proprietary titles; one-fifth have no pretension to any title, and these were the chief destroyers of timber; and the other fifth holds under Indian titles; but that not more than one-third first settled their lands under an Indian title, and the other two-thirds purchased the Indian title within a few years past." The contest took its place among the historic title contests of the State.

The Revolution and Revolutionary Traditions.—This part of the Newark colony touched the Revolutionary contest at several points. The fact that Nathaniel Crane, a private,—after the Revolution well-known as Maj. Nathaniel Crane,—was in the battle of Long Island on Sept. 15, 1776, and one of the last to leave the field under a shower of bullets, indicates that citizens here early entered the military service. From 1777 the enlistments were common throughout the county. Among those known to have been from the Montclair region were Capts. Abraham Speer and Thomas Seigler, Second Lieut. Joseph Crane, Sergt. Obadiah Crane, and the Privates Jonathan and Joseph Baldwin, Aaron, Matthias, Nathaniel, Joseph, Eliakim Benjamin, Oliver, William and Phineas Crane, Peter Davis, Nathaniel and Parmenas Dodd, Moses Harrison, Amos Tompkins, Abraham and Francis Speer, John, Levi Vincent, John Smith and a Van Gieson.

After the retreat of Washington from Acquackanonk, through the lower part of the town, to New Brunswick, universal consternation prevailed. The people fled to the mountains and over the mountains. The pastor of the Mountain Church was marked for capture. The scouting-parties of the British carried devastation everywhere. But not till the reaction of the next year, 1777, did the people venture back to their desolate lands and plundered houses.

Nathaniel Crane—and we may infer that others were with him—was at the battle of Monmouth in 1778, where was also Gen. Joseph Bloomfield.

When Gen. Anthony Wayne—according to tradition—left his camp at Second River, just south of the ruins of the copper-works, his troops took their march in the famous snow-storm of January, 1779, up the old road to Horseneck, posting a picket at Bloomfield and abandoning their cannon embedded in the snow in Caldwell.

The encampment at the Fordham Crane house, near the Mountain House, was probably in 1780,—some months after the battle of Springfield,—when the troops returned from the Hudson.

The troops from this region were in that battle, in June of 1780, and Washington was greatly pleased with the patriotic spirit of the militia. His main encampment from October 7th to November 27th was at Totowa, near Paterson. Col. Mayland's regiment of cavalry was stationed near Little Falls, and Maj. Paul's rifle corps was stationed in a ravine near the Great Notch. He was ordered to watch the roads through the Notch into this region and into Acquackanonk, and to guard against surprises. Lafayette's headquarters were at Gaffel, near Centerville. During October the light infantry was ordered to a new position, the better to watch the Notch and the Crane-town Gap. This agrees with the tradition well as to the time when Washington, with a detachment, was at the Crane mansion. He was scouring the country on his blooded Virginia horses, looking after the stragglers and correcting the mutinous tendencies of his wretched soldiers. The bold hill on the east side of the notch was, it is said, a favorite lookout. From that height he once detected a raiding party of British sallying from Elizabethtown to the mountains. He dispatched at once a troop of cavalry behind the hill to Springfield, who cut off the foragers and reclaimed the fine lot of cattle they were driving off. The army here was in that deplorable condition which led, in 1781, to the mutiny of the Pennsylvania troops at Pompton. The detachment extended along the road and mountain southward from the Crane homestead. Confiscated household furniture taken from the British is still in possession of a family here, purchased with Continental currency earned by working for the soldiers.

The Churches—THE TWO EARLY CHURCHES.—There were two churches which the people attended in the early times, one a Puritan and the other a Holland Church. After the society at Newark Mountains was organized, at about 1718, the greater portion of the people here, as well as of those in Harseneck, were attracted to this new centre. Besides the power of religious associations, the first pastor, the Rev. Daniel Taylor, zealously espoused the claims of their Indian titles. To him succeeded the Rev. Caleb Smith, in 1748. The stone parsonage had been finished during the year 1749. During his pastorate the second church at Newark Mountains was erected, which the people attended until long after the third pastor, the Rev. Jedediah Chapman, was installed, in 1766. He was more zealous for the people's rights during the Revolution than their first pastor had been for their Indian titles. Rev. Mr. Chapman and probably Rev. Mr. Smith catechized the children from house to house, and preached in the original Montclair school-house above the Presbyterian Church.

The Holland population had their religious associations with Acquackanonk and Second River. Their associations tended towards Second River, where a Dutch Church was erected in 1727, with reference, in the arrangements of pews, to a former church. All the northern end of the town from the house of William Crane was placed by town legislation with the inhabitants of Second River in a town arrangement for the care of the poor. Levi Vincent, a French Huguenot, John Low and Thomas Cadmus, from among the Puritan population in the south end of the town, were also made exceptions, and assigned to the Holland enumeration. This arrangement continued for fifty-three years, from 1744 to 1779. The pastors of the Holland people at Second River were Rev. Guillaume Berthoff, 1699 or 1700 to 1724 at both Acquackanonk and Second River, Rev. —Morinus, Rev. —Leydt, Rev. —Schoonmacher, Rev. Coens —, Rev. Peter Stryker.

During this time the Reformed Dutch Church of Harseneck, afterwards called the Fairfield Church, was organized. The Presbyterian Society of Harseneck was also organized in 1781, and subsequently a Mr. Crane united with Cornelius Hatfield, of Elizabeth, in the donation of parsonage land to that church. This land has been retained and has become valuable.

THE TWO HOME CHURCHES.—At the end of the century two other churches were built at Bloomfield and at Stone House Plain. The Bloomfield Church became shortly a strong church, and was located in the natural centre of the out-lands destined to form a new township. The building of the church was a large enterprise and made a broad provision for the future. It was begun in 1796, and was opened for worship in 1799. The tower was not completed until 1819. Oliver Crane represented the Cranetown neighborhood in the trustees of 1797, and Nathaniel Crane among the managers of the building.

Connected with the movement for an organization of a church was the giving a name to the town. The selection of the name of Gen. Joseph Bloomfield was in good part due to influence proceeding from Cranetown. Maj. Nathaniel Crane was in the battle of Monmouth, in which Gen. Bloomfield was. Isaac Watts Crane, as a teacher and politician, was an admirer of Bloomfield and an advocate of his name. Gen. Bloomfield was a frequent visitor among his relatives in Orange Dale, and was associated in Cranetown with the church and civil life there. There was a touch of the politic in the minds of those like Isaac Watts Crane, and the result was seen when, in 1797, Gen. Bloomfield came to the town and made a handsome donation towards completing the rising walls of the church. In the dignified cavalcade which escorted the honored visitor on that occasion was Capt. Crane's elegant company of infantry, and when Gen. Bloomfield addressed the people on the virtues of patriotism and of political and Christian union, it is said Mr. Isaac Watts Crane made a response in behalf of the society re-echoing the same sentiments.

The congregation had been formed at the Joseph Davis house in 1794. The church edifice was begun, the trustees of the society were first elected and the selection of the house was made in 1796; the common was laid out before the church lot in 1797; the ecclesiastical organization of the Third Presbyterian Society of Newark was made in 1798; the original church of the Newark colony became the First Presbyterian Church of Newark in 1720; the Mountain Society became in 1753 the Second Presbyterian Church in Newark; and worship under the first pastor was begun on the first Sunday of the year 1800.

The following names were subscribed to "a promise to pay unto the trustees of the Presbyterian Society of Bloomfield, for the purpose of hiring a minister to preach the gospel for six months," with the date appended "Cranetown, April 13, 1797," give the principal citizens among the Puritan population at that time:

In the original parchment subscription for building the church, in 1796, among the principal subscribers are Eleazer Crane for £40, Joseph Crane for £60, Joseph Crane for £20, Oliver Crane for £25, William Crane for £22, Stephen Fordham for £45, Aaron Crane for £90, Caleb Martin for £12, Gideon Crane for £14, and Nathaniel and Israel Crane each for £100. Many Cranetown names also appear on the additional subscription in 1798 "for the use of the meeting-house." Some sixteen of the names on this subscription are of Holland extraction. Nearly three-fourths of the original members of the Bloomfield Church came from the Orange Church. Among the elders and deacons at the organization of the church was Joseph Crane, who had been an elder from 1794-98 in the Orange Church. The other early elders from the western part of the town were Israel Crane and Oliver Crane from 1805, David Taylor and Nathaniel Crane from 1812, and Matthias Smith and Elias B. Crane.

The pastors under whom the people of West Bloomfield has the place afterwards began to be called worshipped were the Rev. Abel Jackson, 1800-10; Rev. Cyrus Gildersleeve, 1812-18; Rev. Gideon N. Judd, 1820-34; Rev. Ebenezer Seymour, from 1834 until their own church was organized.

The Reformed Dutch Church of Stone House Plain was organized at the beginning of the century. As the Puritans had had two churches on the south (at Newark and Orange), so the Hollanders had had two churches on the north and east (at Acquackanonk and Second River). Dutch zeal was not behind the Puritan zeal in catechetical instruction and in missionary appointments for preaching. We must, therefore, believe that the sermon and the catechism were at the Spertown school-house before the formal church organization. The congregation was gathered by the Rev. Peter Stryker, pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church at Second River. The church was organized under the direction of the Classes of Bergen in 1801. The first church edifice was erected in 1802. Mr. Stryker became the pastor, having both churches in his care. The Rev. Staats Van Santvoord seems to have succeeded him as pastor of the two churches, and the two churches continued together till 1826. The pastors down to the time of the organization of the township of Montclair were Rev. John G. Tarbell, 1827-28; Rev. Alexander G. Hillman, 1837-41; Rev. Eben S. Hammond, 1842-44; Rev. William Thompson, 1845-46; Rev. Robert A. Quin, 1847-49; Rev. John A. Liddell, 1849-50; Rev. John Wiseman, 1851-52; Rev. Peter S. Talmage, 1853-65; and the Rev. Benjamin I. Statesir, 1865-72. Under Mr. Talmage's pastorate the present edifice built of freestone and ten feet longer than the first, was erected in 1857 on the old site. The spire was completed in 1860-61.

The division of the township, in 1868, left this church edifice within the township of Bloomfield, and an important part of its parish within the township of Montclair. The Holland population, therefore, have continued largely under the recent pastor, Rev. John Kershaw, 1873-82, and the present pastor, the Rev. William G. E. See.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH of Montclair was organized in 1838, as a strong colony from the Bloomfield Church. For some time previously it had been the custom of the Bloomfield Church to divide the service in the winter-time, the morning service being held in Bloomfield and the afternoon service in West Bloomfield. The place of meeting was the room in the second story of the public school building, on a site just in front of the present church.

Maj. Nathaniel Crane, an elder in the Bloomfield Church, left a bequest at his death, in 1833, designed to assist in establishing a new organization. He directed that the residue of his estate, valued at about ten thousand dollars, should be invested for the support of a church in West Bloomfield, whenever that portion of the parish should form a separate congregation and erect a church edifice. The propriety of such an organization was considered at a meeting on the 17th of August, 1837. On the 31st of the month the new parish was created. "The West Bloomfield Society" was taken as the title. The trustees were Zenas S. Crane, Cyrus Pierson, Jared E. Harrison, Reuben D. Baldwin, James Crane and William Smith.

The school building was purchased and enlarged. The main audience-room was placed on the second floor, the lecture-room and the pastor's study on the first floor; and columns stood in front before the open vestibule. The building was dedicated and the church organized on the 9th of August, 1838, the churches of Orange and Bloomfield being represented by their pastors, Rev. Asa Hillyer, D.D., and Rev. Ebenezer Seymour. Sixty-six of the members came from the church in Bloomfield, two each from the churches of Caldwell and Succasunna Plains, and one from the First Church of Orange. The two elders, Matthias Smith and Elias B. Crane, came also as officers from the Bloomfield Church.

The first pastor, then fresh from the seminary, was Rev. Samuel W. Fisher, D.D., who continued pastor from 1839 to 1843, and was afterwards pastor at Albany, N. Y., Cincinnati, Ohio, president of Hamilton College, New York, and pastor at Utica N. Y.

The later pastors have been Rev. Nathaniel E. Johnson, 1843-44; Rev. Aaron C. Adams, 1845-51; Rev. Job F. Halsey, D.D., 1852-56; Rev. Silas Billings, a stated supply of the pulpit, 1856-58; Rev. Josiah A. Priest, D.D., 1858; Rev. Nelson Milford, D.D., and Rev. J. Romeyn Berry, D.D.

Under the pastorate of the Rev. Dr. Halsey the present church edifice was erected, at a cost of sixteen thousand dollars, and was dedicated in 1856. It has since been much improved, especially by the addition of side galleries. The bell was the gift of Miss Mary Crane, the niece of Maj. Nathaniel Crane, who had made the like graceful gift to the Bloomfield Church.

The parsonage lot was a legacy from Nathaniel H. Baldwin. The property of the school district, consisting of the lot and building in the rear of the church, was purchased in 1860 and converted into a lecture-room. During the present year this building has been displaced by a handsome stone chapel arranged for all the social and Sunday-school purposes of the church.

The METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH of Montclair was an outgrowth from that at Bloomfield, as the Bloomfield Church was from that of Belleville. More properly, the three churches were on one wide circuit, and churches at Belleville, Bloomfield, Montclair and Orange were organized in order. The Bloomfield Church worshiped probably for some years before 1820 in the house of Mrs. Naomi Cokerfair, north of the Morris neighborhood, and a small stone church was erected just above Bay Lane, near the Coit house, in 1822. Meetings were held in the western part of the town, about 1817, at Joel Crane's house, across the turnpike from where Leist's Hotel now stands. "Woods meetings" were also held south of the Joel Crane house at about the same time. During the year 1827 the James Wilde family came from Saddleworth, Lancashire, England, to West Bloomfield, and established a wooden manufactory in the Israel Crane mill. This manufactory continued in various forms the production of blue broadcloths, printed shawls, flannels and cotton prints until 1839 or later, and the Wilde establishment became an important element in the church. During the early years Rev. Isaac Winner, who supplied the circuit, organized a church in Orange, in which Henry Wilde, of West Bloomfield, was a trustee. The Wildes were originally Church of England people, but the second Mrs. Wilde had become a Wesleyan in England. The earlier portion of the Wilde family therefore gave assistance in the organization of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, but the latter portion supported the Methodist organization. Many of the work-people in the mill came from the vicinity of Saddleworth, and were Wesleyans. The strength, therefore, of the Methodist Church in the town was transferred to the vicinity of the factories. Washington School-house was erected on a lot previously purchased in 1825 for twenty-five dollars. The children of those employed in the mill were taught on Sunday, spelling, reading and writing, as well as the Scriptures. John Reichert was the superintendent. Corline Dornmus became active and efficient. The house was full of parents and children, and preaching services were held. The name of Edmund S. Jones, afterwards a bishop in the church, appears for the year 1823 as one of the preachers for the Bloomfield stations. James Wilde gave a lot for a church—the lot on which the colored Methodist Church now stands—before his death in 1835. The church edifice was erected in 1836. Rev. Watters Burrows was the pastor at the time and also one of the trustees. A parsonage was also erected. After the influence of the Wildes was withdrawn, on account of their removal from the town, the society continued to increase.

The society in the Coit neighborhood had now become only a class. An union was therefore made of the remaining portion at the little Coit Church and a portion of the West Bloomfield Society, and in 1853 the united body erected a new edifice facing the common in Bloomfield. Rev. G. K. Snyder was the pastor at the time of this transition.

The WEST BLOOMFIELD METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH became a separate congregation in 1857. The present church was built in 1879. It is on the west side of Fullerton Avenue, north of Bloomfield Avenue and is a handsome wooden structure. The valuation of the church property is thirty thousand dollars. The old edifice was vacated after the last meeting held on Sunday evening, Dec. 7, 1879. The new edifice was dedicated on December 14th, the dedication services being conducted by the Rev. J. F. Hurst, D.D., and Chaplain McCabe. An ample parsonage adjoining the church lot was completed and occupied in November, 1881.

The pastors since 1865 have been Rev. Jeremiah Cowens, 1865-67; Rev. Jesse Lyman Herbert, 1867-69; Rev. Thompson H. Landon, 1869-72; Rev. James L. Ayars, 1872-74; Rev. George W. Smith, 1874-77; Rev. Jonathan K. Burr, 1877-78; Rev. James J. Boswell, 1879-80; Rev. John T. Reed, 1880-81; Rev. John Crawford, 1881-84; Rev. Morris D. Church, 1884.

The old church edifice has been occupied by the colored Methodists.

ST. LUKE'S PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH was organized in 1846. Mr. John Wilde and the other portion of the James Wilde family, who were early connected with the Church of England, were largely interested in the organization. A small wooden edifice was first erected. The location, which proved unfortunate, was in the rear of a deep lot, which fronted the turnpike.

Services were held with more or less regularity until May 28, 1858, when it was decided to re-organize, and a vestry was elected. There was still, however, no settled pastor until June, 1860, when Rev. George R. Davis became the rector. The first wardens were Owen Doremus, C. St. John Seymour; Vestrymen, Dr. R. F. Brown, Richard Naylor, William H. Ashley, A. W. Crittenden, George N. Wright. Mr. Davis remained with the parish for two years, when the church was again without a regular pastor for the same space of time. In 1862 the Rev. Mr. Crystal was inducted rector. During his pastorate the present stone edifice was commenced in 1866. The lots on which the church was built (about two acres) were the gift of Robert M. Hening. The Rev. J. L. Maxwell has been pastor since June, 1869. The new edifice was completed and opened for worship on Easter Sunday, April 17, 1870. The cost of the church was thirty-five thousand dollars.

THE CHURCH OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION (Roman Catholic) is an outgrowth from Belleville. The Rev. John Hogan, pastor of St. Peter's Church, Belleville, visited West Bloomfield as one of his stations, and about 1856 the edifice was erected. It is located on Washington Street. It continued under the care of the Belleville pastor till 1864. The Rev. Titus Joslyn, the first resident pastor, came to the congregation on February 6th of that year. He was born a Protestant, in Schenectady, N. Y., and was educated in Union College, under the care of his father, Professor Joslyn, of that college. His parents removed to New York in 1873, where he was baptized by Bishop Hughes, June 16, 1845. He entered St. Joseph's Seminary, under the Jesuits, in 1847, was ordained priest in St. Patrick's Cathedral, in New York, March 13, 1852, and labored under the direction of Archbishop Hughes till he came to the parish,—West Bloomfield. He remained pastor for over ten years, till Sept. 5, 1874. Under his direction the church was enlarged, in 1866 the tower built, and one-half of the present property purchased. The parish included the Roman Catholic population of Caldwell, Bloomfield and Watessing.

The Rev. A. M. Streets succeeded Mr. Joslyn as pastor from Sept. 5, 1874, to March 18, 1879. During his pastorate the new rectory, at the corner of Elm and Fulton Streets, was built in 1876.

In the year 1878 the Church of the Sacred Heart was organized in Bloomfield as a colony from the Montclair Church.

Rev. Joseph F. Mendel has been the pastor since 1879. During his pastorate the parochial school has been organized,—in 1881. It has five Sisters of Charity as teachers, and an average daily attendance of two hundred and thirty pupils. The property of Bernard Wallace was also purchased for the church in 1881. The Rev. Walter Purcell has been appointed assistant pastor, and has under his care the Catholic people of Verona and Caldwell. The value of the church property is twenty-five thousand dollars.

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF CHRIST in Montclair had its organization in 1870. A consultation in respect to the desirability of such an organization was held the year before, on the 18th of December, at the house of Mr. J. B. Beadle and a committee on organization was appointed. The society was organized on the 29th of January, 1870, when Samuel Holmes, Joseph B. Beadle, Charles H. Johnson, Edward Sweet, Samuel Wilde, Jr., and Julius H. Pratt were elected trustees. The ecclesiastical organization was made on the 29th of May, at the residence of Mr. Beadle, when the Articles of Faith were accepted and sixty-four persons entered into the church covenant. Samuel Holmes, Joseph B. Beadle, James B. Pearson and David B. Hurd were elected deacons. The Rev. Leonard Bacon, D.D., of New Haven, Conn., preached the first sermon in a public hall tastefully furnished for public worship, and the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches held an union service in the afternoon. The formal recognition by the fellowship of the churches was on the 8th of June, when the Rev. Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., preached the sermon. The present and only pastor, the Rev. A. H. Bradford, D.D., was ordained and installed on the 28th day of September of the same year. A church edifice and lecture-room, with a pastor's study and every appliance for social and religious uses, were dedicated in 1873. The church is situated at the corner of Fullerton Avenue and Plymouth Street, and can seat seven hundred persons. A parsonage has since been erected.

THE UNITARIAN SOCIETY of Montclair was organized in October, 1868, and had a membership of from thirty to forty members. For some two years the pulpit was supplied by clergymen of other Unitarian societies. The Rev. J. B. Harrison became the pastor in 1870, and continued in that service until 1873. From that year Mr. John A. Bellows conducted for some time the religious services of the society.

THE CHRISTIAN UNION CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH of Upper Montclair completed its organization on April 13, 1882. The first deacons were Winslow Amer and Henry H. Hall. The society, under the name of "The Christian Union," was organized Feb. 25, 1881, Thomas H. Bird, John R. Anderson, George A. Gates, Winslow Amer and A. Eben Van Gieson being the trustees.

The origin of the religious movement which resulted in this church was as early as 1816-17. The Rev. Enos A. Osborn, then a theological student in the Bloomfield Academy, opened a Sunday-school in the neighborhood. It was held at first in a barn, afterwards in private houses. It was afterwards removed to the Reformed Dutch Church at Stone House Plain; it was brought back again to the Speer Neighborhood, as Upper Montclair was then called, and held in the school-house. In later years it had grown to be the custom to have a preaching service after the afternoon Sunday-school, whenever a preacher could be obtained. Members of the Presbyterian Church of Montclair united with the neighborhood in maintaining the Sunday-school and the service. A handsome stone chapel, called the Cliffside Chapel, was completed in 1880 at the corner of the Valley road and Belleville Avenue.

A difference of opinion, however, in respect to ecclesiastical connection resulted in the disuse of the Cliffside Chapel and in the erection of another chapel, dedicated on April 13, 1882, in which the present society worships. The edifice is a frame building, in two rooms, capable of being used as one, with seats for about three hundred persons. The cost of the property is about ten thousand dollars.

The first and only pastor is the Rev. George A. Gates, who was ordained and installed on the 13th of April, 1882.

Education.—Little is known of the history of the schools before the time of the Revolution. On the testimony of the most authentic tradition, and without the certainty of records or inscriptions, the first school-house was erected about the year 1749. The same school-house is variously remembered as existing near the end of that century, and until 1812. It stood at the junction of the Orange and Bloomfield and upper Valley branches of the old road south of the present High School building, where the plumbers' shop now stands on land owned by Mr. Allison. It was a one-story building, built of stone, low and rude in structure, twenty-six feet long and eighteen feet broad. It faced the east, and the curve in the road was then such that it looked down the street. A large fireplace was in the southwest corner of the building; flat desks or tables were placed around the sides of the room, with benches at the walls, the seats being slabs with the bark side down. At the south end was an oblong platform two steps in height, which was called "the rostrum." In the centre of this platform was a trap-door, through which mischievous John Allen and others about 1807 or 1808, were let down into a little dungeon, and asked by the equally mischievous teacher, "What do you see?" There was no cellar. The earliest teachers now known and occupying the rostrum probably in the last century were Isaac Watts Crane, well known afterwards, and Hugh Thompson.

Rev. Jedediah Chapman, the pastor from Orange, came every two weeks to catechise the children. The venerable clergyman wore the cocked hat and was mounted on his horse, and master and school stood in file uncovered by the roadside until he had entered.

Dr. Gruet, Mr. Tracy, Mr. Smith, Mr. Hinman and Mr. Norton were teachers in this school-house. One octogenarian remembers, with a lively sensibility which penetrates the fourscore years, the spirit of the Scotch-Irish Tracy and the cruel suitability of the weeping-willow to its stroke of discipline.

Gideon Wheeler was the last teacher in this antiquated structure. He took his school through a summer course in a blacksmith-shop down the eastward road while the old walls were being moved to a new building, in 1812.

The next period of the school history is that during which the school was located on the present lot of the Presbyterian Church. This period extended from 1812 to 1860. There were two school-houses on the church lot,—one two-stories in height, twenty-two by forty feet in size, the second story of which was used for religious meetings, and standing about fifty feet in front of the present church; the other a stone building of one story, which stood on the site of the present chapel. The first of these two remained a school-house until 1838, when it was purchased by the newly organized church, was enlarged and renovated, and was devoted to church purposes until 1866, when it gave way to the new church edifice.

The three prominent teachers in this school-house were Gideon Wheeler, Philander Seymour and Warren S. Holt. William Heddon and David J. Allen also taught for a short time.

Gideon Wheeler was a man of intellectual force and sound judgment, an excellent teacher for the time. He was a magistrate for a number of years, and held court on Saturday afternoon. He was also a surveyor and conveyancer. He held his position with satisfaction on the part of the people until declining health compelled him to relinquish the school-house for the farm. He attracted pupils from Speertown, Verona, the Coit Neighborhood, Tory Corner and from "between the mountains." His full period of service was from about 1810 to 1822.

Philander Seymour came as a young man from Genoa, N. Y., but had already taught "between the mountains" south of Pleasant Valley. He was a superior man and a superior teacher. He was considered a gentleman and was very popular. His years in the new school-house were the longer part of the time from 1822 to 1830. He withdrew to Bloomfield, where he taught "in the old school-house."

Warren S. Holt taught first in the public school and afterwards established a private school. He acquired the reputation of a good teacher, especially in mathematics, while at the school-house. His success led him to his wider enterprise at the Mountain House. His period of instruction was shorter than that of Mr. Wheeler or Mr. Seymour. It was from about 1835 to 1838, and his withdrawal from the school district teaching may have been in consequence of the sale of the school building.

The period from 1810 to 1838 was the period of high success in the Bloomfield Academy. In the origin and maintenance of that academic and theological institution Israel Crane and other intelligent men of West Bloomfield were profoundly interested. The academy, under such able preceptors as Amzi Lewis, Jr., Rev. John Ford, Rev. Humphrey Mount Berine,¹

¹ Abner Brundage was his usher or assistant. Mr. Brundage was a singer, and taught singing-school a few years before in the present school-house of the rostrum and trap-door.

Rev. Dr. Amos Armstrong, assisted by his son, Rev. William J. Armstrong, Albert Pearson and Dr. Edwin Hall—most of them strong, college-bred men, with no little philosophic and theological force, overshadowed the more common education in that part of the town. It was supported also at first financially by a Society for the Promotion of Literature, composed of the strong men of the town, and after Dr. Armstrong assumed the financial support, by the social and moral aid of the people throughout the Presbyterian parish. Samuel Hanson Cox and other young men from the academy conducted religious services in the second story of the West Bloomfield school-house. A number of the young men from this western district found their way to these strong instructors. Still, in this part of the town the interest in the common education was well maintained. Mr. Gideon Wheeler had under his instruction from ninety to a hundred pupils, and the number increased rather than diminished under his successors, and during some portion of the time there were two departments,—the girls' department in the second story and the boys' department on the first floor.

The time had now come for the organization of the new church. The new society in 1838, therefore, purchased the school building for four hundred dollars; the second story was enlarged and made to project some twelve or fourteen feet over the east wall; pillars were placed under the projection; the north end of this veranda was inclosed for a pastor's study and the south end for a stairway and the central part remained as a portico, with three pillars in front. The upper part became the audience-room, and the lower part the lecture-room of the new church.

The second school-house on the present church lot was immediately built. The lot was purchased from Ira Campbell. The building, constructed of stone and one story high, remained a school building until 1860, when it also was sold to the church for six hundred dollars, and was transformed into a lecture-room. The lecture-room itself gave place, in 1884, to the present chapel of the church.

The three teachers in this house who most impressed themselves as instructors were Isaac B. Wheeler, so long an elder in the church, Samuel Jones and Edwin C. Fuller, all of whom are now living in Bloomfield, Orange and Montclair.

It was during Mr. Fuller's administration that the trustees, Joseph Doremus, Charles Smith, Anthony Ball and Ira Campbell, took high authority in abolishing the Saturday forenoon school hours, the half-holiday having been the immemorable usage. The whole holiday remained the permanent usage, despite the criticism which ran with the gossips. The payment for tuition was two dollars a quarter.

During the time of Mr. Fuller application was made by the town for a special school law. Resistance was made, but the free school law was enacted in 1849, amended in 1850, and the tuition of all children was henceforth paid by taxation. At the time of the enactment of the law there were seven school districts in the township. Three of the four, in the eastern part of the town, were united, and the Bloomfield plan of a central grammar and High School and primaries at a distance from the centre began its growth. The three districts in the western portion of the town remained separate.

The Washington School-house had been erected in 1825, originally for the education of the mill children on Sunday. A day-school and a new district followed. Isaac B. Wheeler was a teacher at a later period in this district also. The Speertown district is recalled as a separate school down to the present day. The original school-house was a low frame building, and was an old building in 1814. The red school-house was built in 1825. The West Bloomfield district began its free school development under Mr. Fuller.

In 1860 began the construction of the present High School building. The land was purchased from Grant J. Wheeler, and the north wing of the building was erected. It was two stories in height, fifty feet in length, thirty-five feet in breadth, and cost, with land, heating apparatus and furniture, six thousand dollars. The south wing was erected in 1869, at a cost of eleven thousand dollars; the east wing in 1873, fifty-five feet long, thirty-six feet broad, at an expenditure of thirteen thousand dollars—making a total cost of thirty-one thousand dollars for the whole building during the thirteen years.

Mr. John H. Morrow was the first teacher in the original wing of this new edifice, and directed the first development of the free system under the new facilities. The number of school children in 1866 was three hundred and fifteen. The amount of money paid to teachers in salaries was seventeen hundred and fifty dollars. Mr. Morrow continued to be the teacher from 1860 to 1866.

Special plans were originated in 1866 for the establishment of a High School adequate to the demands of the best education preparatory to the college or the university. The purpose was to secure the services of a principal who should be a graduate from one of the best colleges, and whose character should command the best development in education. The High School was to afford facilities "to educate here at home the youth who had previously been sent away to school," and so to enable "parents to retain under home influence their children during the period of the formation of character." John W. Taylor, a graduate of Harvard University, became the principal in September of that year, and inspired a rapid development during the four years of his supervision. His tact, ability and enthusiasm in school-work, his geniality and his fondness for young life, his instinct for individualizing and his natural leadership, gave inspiration alike to teachers, students, parents and trustees. The purchase of a scientific and philosophic apparatus was made, and the library was begun. The number of pupils in 1869 demanded the new wing.

Mr. Taylor resigned his position in 1870, and Mr. John P. Gross, a graduate of Bowdoin College, became the principal. Mr. Gross continued to develop a wide public interest in the school. The increase of pupils rendered necessary the enlargement of 1873, and the building completed in its present form has the capacity for seating six hundred children.

The first graduating class, composed of thirteen members, was guided through the advanced course by Mr. Gross, and the first diplomas of the trustees in 1874 were made significant of a thorough education. Mr. Gross resigned at the end of the year.

The present principal is Mr. Randall Spaulding, a graduate of Yale College, who has been at the head of the High School for the past ten years. His efficient supervision is supported by a large number of efficient assistants.

The number of enrolled scholars has increased from 193 in 1869-70 to 670 in 1880-81. There were during that year 349 scholars enrolled in the primary school, 246 in the grammar school and 75 in the High School. The annual amount expended for salaries is $10,000. The principal of the High School has a salary of $3000. The total annual expense in 1880-81 was $13,285.

A large primary building has been erected within the school inclosure in 1884. The citizens of Montclair have now the satisfaction of knowing that by common concession their school system has no superior in the State, and few, if any, superiors in any State in the country.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS.—During the later period of the Bloomfield Academy there was a powerful stimulus given to private enterprise in education. The town became celebrated for its educational facilities. The ambition of teachers was attracted by the reputation of the place. The widely-known character of Mrs. Harriet B. Cooke's school for young ladies at Bloomfield added the co-ordinate branch of education. Private schools from that time onward became numerous. Some of them attained a high degree of success. One of the arguments of the remonstrant minority against the free school law in 1850 was that there were "five flourishing boarding-schools in the town."

The two schools which were of most note in West Bloomfield were those of Warren S. Holt and of Rev. David A. Frame.

Mr. Holt established his boarding-school for boys at the Mountain House in or about 1838, but was with James H. Randall, principal of the Bloomfield Academy in 1844 to 1845. He returned to the Mountain House and conducted his school with considerable success for a number of years.

Rev. David A. Frame, a man of high order of mind and of unusual eloquence in the pulpit, was compelled to leave the pastorate from impaired health. After two years as principal of the Bloomfield Academy, from 1842 to 1844, he established Ashland Hall, where for a number of years his house was filled with young men. Some of these young men, like the Hon. William H. Aronox, of New York, formed a strong life-long attachment to their preceptor and cherished a high admiration for his genius.

HILLSIDE SEMINARY.—At a later time the Hillside Seminary was established for young ladies. Rev. Ebenezer Cheeler was the first principal, and was succeeded by Mr. Nitsche and by the Rev. Aaron R. Wolfe. The school became well-known and was successful. The number of students boarding in the seminary was limited by the plan of the school.

Public Communication and Development.—Soon after the opening of the present century Newark began to indicate that it would prove the most powerful centre in the State. Within twenty years Essex County ceased to be the fourth and became the first county in population. The counties of Hunterdon, Sussex and Burlington surpassed Essex in numbers in 1790. Essex surpassed them all in 1820. The rapid development which has since gone on was due first of all to the construction of excellent roads.

THE NEWARK AND POMPTON TURNPIKE, more commonly known as the Bloomfield turnpike, was one of these solid, broad avenues which attracted to it numerous tributaries of travel. The charter was procured in 1806. The new road was to cross the Passaic River near the Little Falls, and to pass through "the more convenient gap in the mountain near Cranetown." A part of the capital stock—four thousand dollars a mile—was made payable in work. There was resistance to the commissioners, indignation and contempt and complaint by the opponents; but no toll-gate was placed on any portion of the old road occupied by the pike, and so the objection from the compulsory payment of toll was avoided. The work of securing a diagonal right of way was successful, and the benefit soon allayed the personal feeling. Israel Crane and Gen. John Dodd were the incorporators from Bloomfield, and Israel Crane the leading director. Local business was quickened. Mr. Crane cut "the little turnpike"—the street past the depot—from the turnpike to his store, and his business became very large and very widely extended. The tannery of Smith & Doremus, south of the Presbyterian Church, soon after 1807 brought its hides from New York, its bark from over the mountain, and sold its leather to the boot and shoe manufactories of Bloomfield and Orange. A large peach production at one time was manufactured into brandy at the distillery. The manufacture of superior cider became extensive, and six thousand barrels a year of Newark cider, it is said, were at one time made. Peter Doremus established his store, now occupied by his son Philip, on the crossing of the turnpike and the old road in 1811. A woolen-mill was established by Mr. Crane for the manufacture of blue broadcloths and was sold afterwards to the Wildes when they came from England, in 1827. One of the sons of James Wilde had been the New York agent of the Wilde mills in England, and the Crane mill no doubt brought sons and father here.

As the most active interest in the turnpike was taken by Israel Crane, and as he at a later period had a large interest in the development of the Newark freestone quarries, he furnished funds for the maintenance of the road, and it finally passed into his possession. It was sold by his heirs to the Essex Public Road Board, who have widened, graded and relaid the top of the old structure. It is now a broad avenue from the mountain to the city.

THE NEWARK AND BLOOMFIELD RAILROAD was organized as a company, composed entirely of Bloomfield and West Bloomfield incorporators, in 1852. The West Bloomfield incorporators were Zenas S. Crane, Grant J. Wheeler and William S. Morris; those from Bloomfield were Joseph S. Davis (who became the president), Ira Dodd (who became afterwards the superintendent), David Oakes, Robert L. Cook, David Congar and Warren S. Baldwin. It was not, however, till June, 1856, that the trains run to Montclair. One car more than supplied the demand of public travel, and there was a deficit of three hundred and thirty dollars at the end of the first seven months. When first opened the same person sold tickets at the West Bloomfield Station and acted as brakeman on the road.

The first board of directors was composed of Grant J. Wheeler, William H. Harris, Jared E. Harrison, of West Bloomfield; and Joseph A. Davis, Ira Dodd, Wright F. Conger and Jason Crane, of Bloomfield. Their negotiations with the New Jersey Railroad Company did not prove satisfactory to them, and the final arrangement was with the Morris and Essex Company. Continuous trains from New York were run from about the year 1866. When the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad leased the Morris and Essex, the auxiliary branch was included in the property transferred. The road has now seventeen trains a day between Montclair and New York. The fastest time is forty-two minutes. The road has one station in Montclair and three in Bloomfield.

THE NEW YORK, MONTCLAIR AND GREENWOOD LAKE RAILWAY has had a very important influence in the development of the northern portion of Montclair. There had been dissatisfaction with the time and the accommodations of the Bloomfield road. The charter, which was obtained in 1867, projected a road from Jersey City to the State line, at Greenwood Lake. Robert M. Henning, Julius H. Pratt and Henry C. Spalding were especially active in procuring the road. Albert Pearce, Samuel Wilde and Joseph B. Beadle were also incorporators. The two centres of population at Montclair and at Bloomfield had both grown strong, and the township was now ripe for a division into two parts. The enterprise of building a railway was the occasion, not the cause, of the division of the town. The proposition to bond the town was naturally resisted by those whose interests and associations were with the Bloomfield road. The new township, taking the popular name Montclair,—a more pleasing rendering of the Indian guttural "Watchung,"—was erected the next year, 1868. The bonds were issued; the new township accepted them to the extent of two hundred thousand dollars, and Bloomfield was exempted in the act which authorized them.

The road was completed in 1872, at first to Montclair and the extension afterwards to Greenwood Lake.

The road has now four stations in Montclair, viz.,—Montclair, Watchung, Upper Montclair and Montclair Heights,—and two in Bloomfield, viz.,—Bloomfield and Chestnut Hill. There are eight trains each way between Montclair and New York.

The building of this road had an immediate effect on the older railroad. The cars, the road-bed, the stations, the management and the time have much improved.

The influence of both these roads on the recent growth of Montclair has been very marked. A new and a strong population has come. The mountainslopes from south to north are the sites of tasteful residences, and the valleys and swells of land are everywhere occupied with the attractive houses of men whose daily life is in the cities. The Montclair road has recently come into the possession of the Lake Erie and Great Western Railway.

Patriotism.—A large number of the citizens of the old town rallied to the militia service in the war with England in 1812. Zenas S. Crane, John Munn and Richard Romer were among them, and also Capt. John Munn, who had been under Gen. Bloomfield in 1794, in the suppression of the whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania.

Edward Moran was the first volunteer from the town at the outbreak of the Rebellion, in 1861. He was mustered in as a member of the Seventh Regiment of New York City, and was afterwards connected with the naval service.

Among the enlistments from the town during the recent war were the following privates: John H. Jacobus, Stephen P. Williams, Albert Woodruff, who died of disease; John Dickinson and Henry B. Ball, both of whom were killed in the Newark regiment of the New Jersey Volunteers; John B. Ball, Charles Madison, Nicholas Beadle and John Coyne, in the Eighth Regiment; and Robert Madison, William J. Madison, John B. Munn, James Taylor, John Webster, James Kane, David McNamara, in the Thirtieth Regiment, all of whom in all the regiments enlisted for three years.

The following persons went for nine months' service in the Twenty-sixth Regiment:

First Lieutenant William R. Taylor, Corporals William Egberton, James H. Williams, John M. Corby and Edwin F. Dodd, and the privates, Peter Arnold, Alfred T. H. Church, John Collins, Henry A. Corby, William H. Corby, James B. Crane, Edwin Dodd, Horace Dodd, Henry Glan, Cornelius Dellhagen, Monroe Harrison, John H. Howell, Richard Jacobus, Charles Johnson, Charles Lent, F. W. L. L., John D. Pott, Peter King, Joseph W. Peto, George W. Post, William A. Riker, Mortimer Whitehead, Thomas S. Searles, John Spidler, George Ungerman, John E. Van Gieson, John M. Wheeler, Albert E. Munn, John J. Reese, Joseph W. Nason.

Joseph W. Nason, after his nine months' service, became first lieutenant in the Thirty-ninth Regiment of the New York Volunteers, and was killed on the skirmish-line in front of Petersburg. Nicholas Beadle was killed at the battle of Williamsburg, James Taylor at the battle of Antietam, John M. Wheeler at the battle of Fredericksburg, and John B. Munn at the battle of Chancellorsville. Charles Littell died from disease in front of Fredericksburg.

Frederick H. Harris entered the service as captain, in 1862, became major in 1864, lieutenant-colonel in 1865, and returned home at the close of the war, in 1865. He had command of a brigade during his service, and was twice breveted by the President of the United States, once for "gallant and meritorious service in Georgia and the Carolinas" and once for gallant service in the battle of Bentonville, N. C.

Dr. John J. H. Love was appointed volunteer surgeon by Governor Olden, of New Jersey, in April, 1862. He was engaged in a thirty days' service after the battle of Williamsburg, on May 5th, in the transportation and care of the wounded, was commissioned surgeon in the Nineteenth Regiment on July 19th, and in August was mustered into the United States service. He was made surgeon-in-chief of a brigade in March, 1863, and in August was made surgeon-in-chief of a division in the Army of the Potomac. He served with distinction in this position, and returned home with the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

The Montclair Gas and Water Company began its existence in 1871. In that year a charter was procured from the State by William S. Torrey, Robert M. Hening, Lewis S. Benedict, George S. Dwight, Frederick H. Harris, A. C. Benedict, Jr., and John Torrey, Jr., who were the incorporators. Twenty-five thousand dollars was to be the capital stock, in shares of twenty-five dollars.

The privileges of the charter were, however, transferred to another association, and the plan for the introduction of water was at length relinquished. Among the active men who guided the introduction of gas into both of the towns were Joseph A. Davis, M. D., who became the president of the company, John J. H. Love, M. D., P. H. Van River, Augustus T. Morris, Thomas W. Langstroth, Beach Vanderpool, Eugene Vanderpool and Andrew A. Smally. The gasometer was located in Bloomfield. The pipes were introduced into the streets of the two towns in 1872 and 1873, and the introduction to private houses gradually followed.

The Montclair Library Association was organized in 1869. George S. Dwight, Israel Crane and J. W. Taylor put into form the constitution. A board of directors were chosen and over three hundred volumes were collected. A charter was obtained during the winter of 1870-71, with the privilege of stock to an amount not exceeding fifty thousand dollars. During the summer of 1871, N. O. Pillsbury gave the use of a lot on Fullerton Avenue, on which a building with two commodious rooms was erected. The building was accordingly taken possession of in December, 1871.

The growth of the library was slow but steady. In seven years it advanced from sixty to two thousand books, and the demand for their use continues to increase.

The number of stockholders and subscribers in 1875 was one hundred and forty-four and the total number of books taken out was four thousand eight hundred and ninety. During the financial depression which existed in the following years it proved more difficult to maintain the interest, and during the past few years it has been little used.

Population.—Montclair became a separate township in 1868.

The relative population and the growth of the population in Montclair and Bloomfield has been,—

	1850.	1860.	1870.	1880.
Montclair	1,875	2,875	4,875	5,147
Bloomfield	3,585	4,790	7,403	10,986

Post-Offices.—The post-offices are two. The post-office at West Bloomfield was established in 1831, when Nathaniel H. Baldwin was appointed postmaster. It took the name of Montclair in 1865.

Upper Montclair has been recently established.

Montclair Fire Department.—Montclair inaugurated its first fire organization in the autumn of 1882, and prior to that time the town, like other country places, depended entirely upon the willing efforts of its citizens and the primitive household pail as a means to save burning property from destruction, or, as is more frequently the case where no apparatus is kept, to prevent the spread of the flames to adjacent buildings. Subsequent to a disastrous fire on Mountain Avenue, in 1882, a number of citizens talked over the necessity for some steps being taken to form a company to do fire service, and in response to a call sent out, a meeting was held in the town committee rooms on November 28th, at which it was reported that half the necessary amount of money to purchase a truck had already been raised, and that twenty-five members had enrolled their names for active service.

The company was duly organized on December 21, 1882, with the following officers: Foreman, Charles M. Schott, Jr., a former member of the Fire Department of Somerville, N. J.; Assistant Foreman, George Westerbrook; Secretary, Dr. Albert J. Wright, for several years connected with the Oswego, N. Y., Fire Department; Treasurer, Dr. James A. Casey. A contract was given out for a hook-and-ladder truck, which was received April 6, 1883, and was housed in the engine-house of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad by the courtesy of the officers of that company. On April 24th the company was incorporated under the State law of 1876 relating to fire companies. In December, 1882, the same officers were re-elected, and are now acting, with the exception of Dr. Casey, the treasurer, who resigned, and is succeeded by Robert M. Hening.

In January, 1884, a committee was appointed with authority to purchase additional apparatus, and they then procured a Babcock extinguisher, with two sixty-gallon tanks, and two small extinguishers attached. The town committee erected a frame house on the corner of Bloomfield Avenue and Valley road for the use of the Fire Department, and on the 24th of April last the company took possession of their quarters. A bell-tower has since been erected, and a bell weighing three thousand four hundred and ten pounds hung therein, the expense being borne by the township. The bell was first rung for a fire-alarm on the 18th of August, 1884. The town is divided into twelve fire districts, by the respective members of which the signal is given. A relief association was formed Sept. 17, 1883, and is now in a flourishing condition. There is also a fire police, consisting of six members of the company, appointed by the foreman, who is virtually the chief engineer of the department. The truck is fully equipped with ladders, pick-axes and other necessary implements, hooks, a large pump and twenty-four buckets. There is also a fifty-foot New York extension ladder in the truck-house ready for an emergency. The force numbers forty-seven members, nineteen for the chemical engine and twenty-eight for the truck. About two thousand dollars has been raised by private subscription to put the department on its present footing, and an appropriation of five hundred dollars was made by the township committee for the current expenses of the present year. Montclair now feels safer and is more content, for the town was a heavy sufferer from fire before its citizens were aroused to the necessity of establishing a system for the protection of their property.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

SAMUEL WILDE.

The progenitor of the Wilde family in America was John Wilde, who came from England in 1688 and settled in South Braintree, Mass. He married, in 1690, Sarah Hayden, granddaughter of Richard Thayer, who became a resident of Braintree in 1641. Their children were John, Samuel, William and Sarah. The children of Samuel were Samuel, Micah and Joseph, the latter of whom was an officer in the Revolution. His children were John, Elijah and Joseph. The children of the last-named were Hannah, Samuel, John and Mehitabel. Samuel was born in Dorchester, Mass., in 1800, and on removing to New York, about 1820, engaged in the hardware and looking-glass trade. His wife was Sarah, daughter of Robert Jones, to whom were born four sons and seven daughters, of whom five survive. The birth of Samuel, of this number, occurred in Dorchester, Mass., Oct. 3, 1831, from whence in childhood he removed with his parents to Brooklyn, N. Y., where his education was received. He, in 1848, entered his father's counting-room in New York City, the latter being then extensively engaged in the coffee and spice business, under the firm-name of Withington & Wilde. Mr. Withington was the pioneer in this country in the process of roasting coffee by machinery for the grocers' trade. The firm later became Samuel Wilde & Sons, and on the death of Samuel Wilde, Sr., was changed to Samuel Wilde's Sons, consisting of Joseph and Samuel Wilde. Joseph died in 1878, and a co-partnership including Samuel and John, a younger brother, was formed, under the same firm-name, the premises first occupied in 1814 being still their place of business. Samuel, the present head of the house, the subject of this sketch, was married, in 1853, to Mary E., daughter of Joshua Lunt, of Falmouth, Me. Mr. Wilde made Montclair, N. J., his residence in 1861, and has since been actively identified with the interests of the township. He supports in politics the principles of the Republican party, which in 1871 and 1872 he represented in the State Legislature. He is one of the directors of the Meriden Cutlery Company, of Meriden, Conn. Mr. Wilde is one of the founders of the First Congregational Church of Montclair, of which he is a member and one of the board of trustees.

HUDSON COUNTY, NEW JERSEY.

CHAPTER I.

Location—Geographical—Topographical—Geological—Water Supply for Domestic Use.

HUDSON COUNTY, so named in commemoration of Henry Hudson, who discovered and explored the North or Hudson River in 1609, is located on the eastern side of the State of New Jersey, opposite Manhattan Island, or New York City. It is bounded on the east by Hudson River and New York Bay; on the south by the "Kill Von Kuhl," which separates this county from Staten Island, New York; on the west by Newark Bay and Passaic River; and on the north by Bergen County, of which Hudson was a part until its organization into a separate municipality, in 1840.

Its area is the smallest in the State, embracing only 43.83 square miles, while its population is second, Essex being the largest, and contained in 1889 a population of 187,950.

The topography of the county is made up of but two features, marsh and a rocky ridge. The range of trap rock forming Bergen Hill begins at Bergen Point, the southern extremity of the county, and pursues a northerly direction through the county, and as far north in New York as Haverstraw. Through this length the outcrop is unbroken. On the northwest border of the county is quite an elevation, as well as two rocky knobs that rise above the marsh. Nearly half the county, or 20.15 square miles, is covered by tide marsh, across which are built the several railroads mentioned in this work. From the summit of First Mountain the county has the appearance of a vast plain or prairie.

Geological Formation—TRAP ROCK.¹—The range of trap forming Bergen Hill and Palisade Mountain can be traced from Bergen Point to the State line, and beyond that to Haverstraw, in New York. Its length from the Kill Von Kull, at Bergen Point, to the terminus, at Ladentown, is forty-eight miles, of which twenty-eight are in New Jersey. Throughout this length the outcrop is unbroken, and varies in breadth from one-half to one and a half miles, being most contracted at Bergen Neck, near Bergen Point. At the latter place the rock is but a few feet above mean tide-water mark.

The eastern boundary or line of trap outcrop is sharply defined, and easily and accurately located. Beginning at Bergen Point, the line follows the border of the upland and marsh near the Central Railroad to Centreville; thence, skirting the shore, it runs near the line of the Morris Canal, east of New York Bay Cemetery, and continuing at the foot of the rocky bluff, pursues a northeast course west of Jersey City and Hoboken, after which it bends slightly to the east and below Weehawken, at the coal-yards, strikes the shore of the Hudson River. From this point on the boundary may be said to follow the river to the State line. Wherever the rocks are not covered by fallen debris from the bluffs the sandstone is seen underlying the trap, generally quite near the base of the mountain, although in places it is found high up in the bank,—e. g. Bull's Ferry, also at Closter Landing.

The western boundary of the Bergen Hill and Palisade Mountain trap is much more indistinct than that on the east side. As the sandstone appears at a few points only on this slope, or at the foot of the range, the line of actual outcrop of the trap is assumed as the division line of the two rocks. Beginning at Bergen Point, this has a remarkably straight course, coinciding nearly with the Newark Bay shore and the meadow margin to English Neighborhood, and then following at the foot of the slope to the State line. The foundation of the light-house in the Kill, at the mouth of Newark Bay, is said to be trap. Thence to the Central Railroad bridge no rock is seen in situ along the bay shore. From this point to the Morris Canal the trap rock is almost continuous in the form of low polished "roches moulonnées" at the water's edge and along the margin of the marsh. Crossing the canal, it then runs east of it, along the Bergen Hill slope and east of the drift-knolls, to the New Jersey Railroad, at West End Station. From this point the line continues its north-northeast course across the New York and Erie Railroad at the west end of Bergen tunnel, and near the wagon-road east of the Northern Railroad to New Durham. Here it is deflected to the east, and passing east of the village, it again comes to the meadows and follows their eastern border to English Neighborhood. At the former village sand-knolls cover up the rocks, and the most westerly outcrop of trap is at least a quarter of a mile from the village. North of New Durham the trap is frequently seen on the hill-side, and the wagon-road is approximately the limit of that rock, except for half a mile between the corner of the road to Guttenburg and the English Neighborhood Station. Here the trap crops out in the crest of a sort of subordinate ridge west of the road. This little ridge has a very smooth and regular slope towards the salt meadow. It may be a separate outcrop, with sandstone in its east face and in the depression between it and the main Palisade range. North of English Neighborhood it crosses the Fort Lee and Leonia road, runs east of Florville, and so on to the State line. Along nearly the whole length of the western boundary drift-hills border the trap, and in places rest upon it. The rock of this trap range is remarkably uniform in character, very hard, deep bluish in color, and breaks under the hammer equally well in all directions, making a desirable paving-stone.

This range is remarkable for its uniformity of slope on the west, as well as its Palisades on the east, and the westward slope corresponds nearly with the dip of the sandstone. The quarrying from Jersey City to Guttenburg has altered the face of the cliff somewhat, and farther north the talus has been bared of its timber and loose stones for dock-filling, etc. Originally this sloping surface was a mass of huge rocks confusedly tumbled upon one another. The sandstone appears at many points at the base of the Palisades from Hoboken to the State line. The trap rock is seen in contact with it and overlaying it. It can be seen finely exposed with the sandstone at Weehawken and on the boulevard to West Hoboken, at the eastern entrance to the tunnel of the New York, West Shore and Buffalo Railroad at Bull's Ferry, etc. In Bergen Hill the trap rock appears in two ranges, separated by a belt of sandstone. The Bergen cut exposed this intervening sandstone by uncovering the drift which concealed the outcrop. The sandstone is exposed in Bayonne City and near the Morris Canal, on Forty-fourth Street, between the two lines of trap rock. Elsewhere the range is apparently all of trap rock, excepting the comparatively small and isolated outcrops of sandstone which lie on its western feet. Of these outcrops, that of Homestead Station is remarkable for its alteration, or induration, the rock being very hard and jasper-like in appearance. At the western entrance to the tunnel of the New York, West Shore, and Buffalo Railroad the sandstone is cut into for a distance of several hundred yards. The rock is gray, and some of it is very friable and crumbling. At Belmont the cut of the New York, West Shore and Buffalo Railroad affords a good section of a short sandstone ridge, which conforms in direction to the trend of the Palisades, and ends at Fairview. Trap rock has been employed in building in Jersey City with very fair success. St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church, in South Jersey City, is built of it, with granite trimmings. The stone is very dark-colored, and was quarried only a few rods from the site of the church. Hudson County court-house is also of trap rock. Trap rock is largely used in walls and foundations on Bergen Hill and in that vicinity.

BIG SNAKE AND LITTLE SNAKE HILLS.¹—These companion hills are two isolated outcrops of trap rock in the Hackensack meadows. They are prominent features in the landscape and familiar to all travelers on the several railway lines which converge as they cross the meadows towards Jersey City. Big Snake Hill is properly the southwest end of the Secaucus upland, although separated from it by a narrow strip of meadow land. Its greatest diameter is from northeast to southwest, about half a mile. The southern and western sides are abrupt, almost precipitous; that to the north is gentle. The height above tide-level is two hundred and three feet. Red sandstone and indurated shales make up the lower third of the northern and western slopes. The rock at the base is red sandstone. It is succeeded by a grayish-colored, indurated rock, which, in turn, is capped by the trap rock. At the south side of the hill the cut on the New York and Greenwood Lake Railway exposes a mottled, shaly rock, whose dip is towards the northwest. The dip of the shale north of the hill at Secaucus Station is also towards the northwest.

Little Snake Hill is one-quarter of a mile east-southeast from Big Snake Hill. It is much smaller than the latter, and is seventy-six feet high. It is circular, and its sides are precipitous except on the south, which is very steep. The greatest diameter is three hundred and sixty feet, and the only rock exposed is trap.

Both of these hills are outbursts of trap rock through the shale, rising abruptly above the general level, and apparently not connected with any other elevation or outcrop of this rock. From their heights and shapes, it would seem as if these outflows had not followed the stratifications of the shale, but had broken across the strata irregularly and accumulated in these two localities, unless we may suppose that the erosion has here been so excessive as to leave them. But from their circular and ellipsoidal shapes, it is not likely that there has been any erosion to that extent.

PAVING BLOCKS—ROAD MATERIAL.¹—Trap rock continues to be quarried at many places in Essex and Hudson Counties for road material, paving blocks, etc., and occasionally for building purposes.

Palisade Mountain trap rock is quarried at a large number of localities, principally about Guttenberg, Weehawken, West New York, and along as far south as Montgomery Avenue, Jersey City. Cuttings for streets and railroads also furnish material which is used for roads, streets and railroad ballasting. The trap rock quarries are generally small affairs, and gangs of from two to five men work together in a quarry. It is common for the men to lease the properties and sell the stone to a contractor or dealer. When in blocks they are in two sizes; the larger are known as "specification blocks," and are four inches by eight to ten inches on the head and seven to eight inches deep; the "square blocks" are five to six inches square and six or seven inches deep. The much greater use of the former size has caused the business to increase very much within a few years, and nearly all the blocks now made are of the larger size. They bring thirty dollars per thousand, while the square blocks sell at twenty dollars. In 1881 the product of the quarries at Bergen Hill and Palisade Mountain was estimated by Michael Shannon, a contractor and dealer in Jersey City, to be four millions of specification blocks and one million square blocks, at a total value of one hundred and forty thousand dollars.

There are three principal grades of rocks,—the fine-grained, quarried at Mount Pleasant, a rocky hill north of the Pennsylvania Railroad; the light gray variety, quarried north of the Pennsylvania Railroad line, or Bergen cut; and third, the dark-colored variety, from near Weehawken and West New York. All of these varieties are hard, but they split readily into blocks, and in some cases there is but little waste. The larger-sized blocks are more difficult and expensive to get, and splitting them out is attended with more waste, but all the clippings can be utilized in Telford road construction.

A large amount of this stone is used in ballasting the tracks of nearly or quite all the railroads running out of Jersey City. The ease with which it is cracked, and its toughness and indestructibility, adapt it admirably for such use, and the convenience of getting it adds to the economy of its use for making an enduring, solid and dry road-bed. At New Durham, Abram W. Duryea has a quarry and a cracker, and furnishes stone for Telford roads in the upper part of Hudson County. Trap rock is also quarried quite extensively on the western side of Snake Hill, in Hudson County, and used for various purposes.

ARLINGTON QUARRIES.—Quarries for supplying building stone, to meet occasional local demands, have been opened at several places along the western foot of the Palisades, in Hudson County. The sandstone underlying the trap rock here is generally too coarse-grained and too crumbling to be of much value as a building stone. It can be seen at Weehawken and near New Durham. The New York, Lake Ontario and Western Railroad has cut into a very pretty, light-colored sandstone, which is promising in appearance, and conveniently located for transportation. The belt of sandstone in Hudson County has not produced any quarries of extent, and the long cut at Arlington, on the New York and Greenwood Lake Railroad, shows the rock mainly to be a fine-grained and rather argillaceous rock, and not adapted to make a good building stone. An opening has been made, within three or four years, east of Arlington, in the bluff of Richard Westlake, and a grayish, coarse-grained sandstone exposed. The opening is one hundred feet long and thirty feet deep, and of this depth about eighteen feet is fair building stone. This stone is used in Arlington for foundations and cellar walls.

Marshes—Old Road—Nurseries.—In speaking of the tides and their effects upon low lands, Mr. Cook said, in his report of 1881: "If the salt and other tide marshes are examined, other evidence is found which tends to show that the level of high-water is above where it used to be. In many places dead trees are to be seen standing in the shallow parts of the marshes. This is specially the case along the back or westerly side of the beaches, where the sand comes very gradually down to the marsh, and cedar trees grow on it. Many of these can be found dead and still standing, and with the beginnings of salt grass growing around them. And along the edge of the upland, but in the marsh, stumps of trees can be seen projecting above the surface of the meadow, and when these are examined, it is found that their roots are still, in many cases, quite sound and firmly imbedded in the solid ground, where there is every appearance of their having grown, except that they are below the meadow surface, which is at high-water mark. Such stumps and roots are found in almost every ditch which is dug in the salt meadows near the upland. Travelers going out from New York, in crossing the marshes between Bergen Hill and Newark or Paterson, can see from the car-windows any number of such stumps still standing.

"As salt marshes are at the level of high-water, and storm-tides cover the whole of them, it will readily be perceived that these trees, the remnants of which are all that now remain, could never have grown there when the ground was overflowed by the tides or by salt water. In some places this effect of the tide is explained by assuming that alterations in the coast and various inlets have given freer access for the incoming tide, and that it rises higher than it formerly did on this account. But the change is so general, and so much alike in all places, that the explanation offered does not apply well to all the cases. The changes which have taken place between the marshes and the upland are not observed to be gradual and uniform in their advances; they take place more in the manner which some of our geologists have designated as catastrophism than in that which they have called uniformitarianism. Some violent storm, with favorable wind, occurs at the time of spring tides, and carries the sea-water higher and farther inland than it has been known to go before, and farther than it may again be observed to go for a generation afterwards. But it destroys any vegetation which is not natural to salt water, and it is observed that the original growth, especially that of wood, does not spring up again, but the lower portions of the land remain a permanent gain to the marshes.

"The old road from Newark to New York was down Ferry Street and the Neck to near the present plank-road bridge, and so across the Passaic, the marsh and the Hackensack, on to Bergen Hill and Powles Hook Ferry. About the beginning of the present century a new road was built, going out of Newark from Bridge Street, crossing the Passaic there, and directly on from there, across the East Newark upland and the marsh and swamp, straight towards the Hackensack and Bergen Hill. A considerable portion of this road was built through a thick and growing cedar swamp, as I was informed by one who had frequently traveled over the road. This swamp became the resort of tramps and, it was said, of thieves and robbers, so that it was dangerous for single passengers to go through. On this account it is said to have been set on fire and burned.

"No trees have grown on the marshes since that time, though the stumps and many trunks of trees still remain. Some thirty years ago a nursery of trees was begun on this marsh, but the tides came so high on it that the young trees soon became diseased, and the project was abandoned. And it was common to see much of the surface of the marsh covered with tide-water until it was banked in and protected from the tides. Now, though it is below the level of high water, shrubs and trees again begin to grow on it, and no doubt will continue to thrive, unless the dike surrounding it should be broken so as to let in the tide-water."

Artesian or Bored Wells in Hudson County.¹—

At various places in the State a number of deep wells have been bored, with the hope of reaching water which would rise to the surface and flow over, forming true artesian wells. Very few have been successful in that respect, but a large number have been bored in which the water has risen nearly to the surface, and which has yielded a very satisfactory supply. Public attention is strongly and favorably drawn to them, and the following classified account of them in Hudson County is herewith given:

At Mattheessen & Wiecher's sugar refinery, on the south side of the Morris Canal, in Jersey City, a boring was begun in 1867, and discontinued in 1872, at a total depth of one thousand feet, inclusive of twenty feet of surface earth, the diameter of which, in the upper one hundred and eighty feet of the rock, was eight inches, and in the lower eight hundred feet, four inches. The rocks penetrated are chiefly gneiss and quartz, with white sandstone and thin bands of slate occurring below eight hundred feet. Several veins of water were met with between six hundred and nine hundred feet, of which the most important were at a depth of seven hundred and twenty feet. The yield was found to be fifty gallons per minute, when tested by pumping, the level in the well being twelve feet below tide, and the temperature of the water 52° Fahr. The brackish quality of the water, however, prevented its use, and the well is now closed.

A well bored at the Central Stock-Yards, and some five hundred feet back from the shore line of the Hudson River, passed through seventy feet of mud and earth, full of boulders, then through red sand rock to a depth of two hundred and fifteen feet, where a mica rock (gneiss) was struck, and the boring continued to a depth of four hundred and fifty-five feet. The water obtained was brackish. The well is tubed with an eight-inch pipe down to the rock, and from that down the bore is six and a half inches.

In the marsh and near the south end of Grand Street, Hoboken, a boring was made in 1828, which is mentioned in Mather's "Geology of New York" as four hundred feet in depth, reaching rock at forty feet, and has penetrated serpentine, sandstone and supposed white marble. This boring probably did not strike water, and the work was abandoned. Mr. Theodore Van Tassel recollects having seen the boring apparatus remaining in position for many years later.

A boring of small diameter was made about 1842 by Andrew Clerke in the marsh at the corner of Montgomery and Henderson Streets, in Jersey City. Here the red sandstone was met with fifteen feet below the surface, and was penetrated to the depth of two hundred feet, when a stratum of very hard rock, whitish in appearance, was encountered, and the work abandoned. A liberal supply of clear, bright water, but strongly impregnated with magnesia and common

At Cox's brewery, on Grove Street, between Seventh and Eighth Streets, in Jersey City, the underlying is covered by about seventy feet of boulder clay and earth. A small boring of one hundred feet in depth was first made nearly thirty years ago, and was enlarged to five inches in diameter, and carried down to a depth of four hundred feet in 1872-73. Small veins of water were met with in the rock at all depths. The water, though, is so hard as to form a heavy scale in a steam-boiler, but was of satisfactory quality for brewing purposes, and its temperature was 54° Fahr.

The well easily afforded three hundred barrels of water per day, the water rising in the excavated well to the level of the tide, thence passing away through the earth to the street sewers. The boring intersected a number of seams in the sandstone which contained fine earthy matter and limited the capacity of the well to deliver clear water.

At Limbich & Betz's brewery, on Ninth, between Grove and Henderson Streets, in Jersey City, and eight hundred feet northeast of Cox's brewery, the sandstone is covered by forty feet of boulder clay, with thirty feet of surface sand. A boring eight inches in diameter was made here in 1875, penetrating the red sandstone rock seven hundred and seventy-six feet and six inches to reach water, which was found in the bottom in a stratum of white or light-colored stone. At its completion the well, when tested by pumping, yielded thirty-three gallons per minute continuously for twenty-four hours. The water is sufficiently soft and sweet for brewing, but is ordinarily used only for cooling purposes, its temperature being 52½° Fahr. The well affords one thousand barrels of water per day without difficulty, the level of the well being ten feet below tide, or twenty-five feet below the surface of the ground.

borings made to rock at Pavonia Ferry, distant, viz., two thousand three hundred feet, two thousand eight hundred and fifty feet and three thousand three hundred feet nearly east from the last, came upon serpentine at sixty-three feet, one hundred and twenty feet and one hundred and seventy-nine feet below tide, respectively.

At the Palisade brewery, at the summit of the main ridge of Bergen Hill, and corner of Hudson Avenue and Weehawken Street, in the town of Union, a boring seven inches in diameter was carried down, in 1877-78, through trap, to a depth of two hundred and ninety-seven feet from the surface, water being found in quantity, increasing with the progress of the work. The well is pumped from the bottom, and yields two hundred and fifty barrels of pure soft water per day, of a temperature of 51° Fahr. When not pumped it discharges a much smaller quantity, at a level of one hundred and sixty-one feet above tide-level, into the bottom of an excavated well, twenty-eight feet under ground, and twelve feet below the surface of the rock.

In the marshes west of Hackensack River are a number of wells which have been bored through alluvium and boulder clay. Four of them were sunk in 1871, and derive their supply from a sheet of water-bearing gravel, at a depth of nearly two hundred feet, the water rising to the surface and flowing off in moderate quantity. The water, while it is palatable, has a noticeable taste, said to be of sulphur. These wells are on the line of the Newark plank road. An equal number of wells are to be found on the line of the old Newark turnpike; these, however, are not in use, and their origin is unknown.

At the Secaucus Iron-Works a well was bored to the depth of six hundred feet. The strata passed through, as reported by I. P. Pardee, superintendent, were: from the surface to the shale rock, 18 feet; red shale, to 370 feet; shaly sandstone, to 395 feet; red shaly sandstone, from 400 to 600 feet. The quantity of water was largest at two hundred to two hundred and fifty feet down. The water yielded on evaporation 68.64 grains of solid matter to the gallon. It probably gets a little salt water in it from the Hackensack River, near which it is bored. The diameter of the bore is six inches, and yields a steady supply of eight gallons of water per minute.

CHAPTER II.

Hudson Employed by the Dutch—Discovers North River—Muttiny—His Detention in England—The "Half-Moon" sails for Amsterdam—Second Expedition of the Dutch to New Netherland—Overtures by the Dutch to the English—Vessels "Little Fox" and "Little Crane"—Christianson's First Voyage—Public Attention Awakened in Holland.

THE discovery of New York Bay and Hudson River has been accredited to different persons, and at different times. Some assert, and with seeming good authority, that this bay and river were discovered by Jean and Sebastian Cabot as early as 1497, while sailing along the coast of North America, under a commission from Henry VII. of England.¹ Truly enough, they had a view of the coast, as far as they sailed, from southwest to northeast, or from the mouth of the Mississippi to Cape Cod; yet they never claimed the discovery of any particular bay or river north of Virginia.

Then, again, the claim is set up in favor of Jean de Verrazano, a Florentine, who was in the service of Francis I., King of France, in 1524, and is supposed to have visited the bay of New York.² To prove this assertion, Governor Stuyvesant is brought on the witness stand, and in his "Manifesto" to the Governor of Maryland, says: "The French were, in the year of our Lord God Almighty, 1524, the second followers of the discovery in these northern parts of this America, by Johan de Verrazzano."¹

Another navigator appeared upon the scene in 1525, Estevan Gomez by name, a Portuguese, employed by Emperor Charles V., who had fitted out an expedition to discover some shorter passage to the Moluccas. It is supposed that he visited New York Bay, but how thorough his explorations were is not known.

In 1598 the Greenland Whale Company had some Dutch in their employ, who in that year, it is said, came into the bay of New York, intending to use it for winter shelter. For fear of the Indians, they built, it is asserted, a small fort, merely for temporary protection.

Hudson Employed by the Dutch.—Our next explorer was an Englishman, named Henry Hudson,² who, for the time being, was in the employ of the Netherland East India Company, in the year 1609, when they fitted him out with a ship, and sent him in search of a passage to China by the north or northeast. Hudson was, no doubt, a proper person for such an enterprise. He had already undertaken a voyage in the year 1607, in behalf of a few English merchants, and arrived at the Island of Spitzbergen, previously discovered by the Hollanders. He had gained the confidence of his masters in so great a degree that they sent him again to sea the next year (1608) with the same object in view.³

The inclinations of the directors of the East India Company were much at variance upon the proposals of Hudson. The directors of Zealand opposed it; they were probably discouraged by the fruitless results of former voyages, concerning which they could not obtain sufficient information from their colleague, Balthasar Moncheron, who long before had traded the north.⁴ It was said they were throwing money away, and nothing else. If private merchants would run the risk they had no objection, provided the company was not injured by it. The Amsterdam directors, nevertheless, would not give up their plan, and sent Henry Hudson in the same year (1609) with a yacht called the "Half-Moon,"⁵ manned by sixteen Englishmen and Hollanders, again to sea.

Hudson's Third Voyage and Account of Discovery.—To Henry Hudson, more than to any other man, belongs the honor of the discovery of the river that bears his name, as well as the discovery, occupation and settlement of the territory or municipality now honored with the name of Hudson.

The vessel in which he sailed, the "de Halve Maan"⁶ ("Half-Moon"), left the Texel on the 6th of April, 1609, sailing towards the north. Prevented by the ice from reaching the latitude of Nova Zembla, he went to Newfoundland, and from there to Acadia, or New France, till the vessel was driven into a bay known only to the French, who arrived there annually to purchase hides and furs from the savages.⁷ Hudson, unwilling to approach these chilling shores, returned to sea, and steering southwest discovered land, which was at first considered to be an island, but which was soon discovered to be a part of the continent, named Cape Cod.

This industrious navigator felt (although born in England), so sensibly his relation to the Holland East India Company, who had employed him in discoveries, that he could not have hesitated a moment to give the name of his adopted Fatherland to this newly discovered country, which he called New Holland. But not wishing to fix his permanent residence on this spot, Hudson preferred the sea, taking a southwest course till he discovered a flat coast in 37° 35', which he followed in an opposite direction.

At this time he discovered a bay, in which several rivers were emptying, which no doubt must have been the South River, afterward named Delaware. It has a projecting point, which then, or afterwards, obtained the name of Cape Henlopen, probably from the family name of the first discoverer. Now the bay was again left, and they steered northeast along the coast at 40° 18', where, between Barnegat and Godinspant, named thus afterwards in remembrance of him who discovered this cape, there was a good anchorage to explore the country, and to open a communication with the inhabitants; but Hudson's curiosity was not so easily satisfied.

He went again to sea, following the coast in the same direction, till the mouth of a large river was discovered, which then was named by the sailors the North River, and afterwards, in honor of the name of the first discoverer, Hudson's River.

This river was sailed up as far as could be effected, viz., to 43°. Hudson became acquainted with the natives, and was fully persuaded, as far as inquiries went, that this river and country had never been visited before by any Europeans. "I dare not, nevertheless, decide (says Lambrechtzen) if in this they were correct." The Rev. S. Miller, D.D., one of the ministers of the First Presbyterian Church at New York, and member of the Historical Society in that city, mentioned, in a discourse delivered before that society in 1809, that one John de Verrazzano, a Florentine, who was in the service of the French King (Francis the First), must have discovered, in the year 1524, in the ship "Dolphin," the American coast in the latitude of 31°, and followed it to 41°; that he entered a large bay containing five islands, which may be taken, with great probability, for the present New York; that they stayed there fifteen days, conversing much with the natives. The Rev. Mr. Miller refers to the journal of Verrazzano of July 8, 1524, which he borrowed from Hackluyt's Voyages, vol. ii. 295-300, which, with the conclusions of the Rev. Mr. Miller, is inserted in the Collections of the New York Historical Society, vol. i. 12-60.

Certain it is that Van der Donck, who resided several years in New Netherlands, asserts that he often heard the ancient inhabitants, who yet recollected the arrival of the ship, the "Half-Moon," in the year 1609, saying that before the arrival of the Netherlands they were entirely ignorant of the existence of any other nation besides their own, and that they looked at the ship as a huge fish or sea monster.¹

The evidences of this, nevertheless, as well as the statement of Hudson himself, render it not improbable that Verrazzano landed in the bay of the present New York, but the event must have taken place eighty-five years before, and might have been obliterated by the departure of a whole generation.

Mutiny on the "Half-Moon."—But whatever may have been the case, the vigilant Hudson resolved to return to Amsterdam, and communicate his report of the voyage to the directors. The voyage was prosperous. But when he approached the English coast a mutiny was stirring among the crew, among which were several Englishmen. They compelled the skipper to enter Dartmouth, from which the rumor of his discoveries ere long reached the capital.

Hudson Detained in England.—Nothing was more averse from the views of King James than of allowing the Netherlands any advantages from the transmarine colonies, while he, in imitation of Queen Elizabeth, desired to convert the whole to the profit of his own subjects. Hudson was considered as a person of importance, and he was forbidden to pursue his voyage towards Amsterdam, with the intention, ere long, to make use of his services. Again Lambrechtsen says: "I could not discover that a voyage to the South or North River was ever repeated by Hudson, but well that he discovered, in the year 1610, a narrow pass to the sea to the North of Terra Labrador, called by him the Strait of Hudson, and a large bay to the South of Canada, to which he gave the name Hudson's Bay. This was the last voyage of this man. He was placed with his son and five men, by a mutinous crew, in an open boat, a prey to the sea, and never was heard of any more."²

After the ship, the "Half-Moon," had been detained at Dartmouth for some time, it was at length permitted to return to the Fatherland, where it arrived in the beginning of the year 1610. And now did the directors obtain such favorable reports of the countries discovered by Hudson that, in their opinion, these were a full compensation for their disappointment in their principal aim,—the passage to India by the north.

De Laet, one of the Holland directors of the West India Company, who published, in the year 1624, a history of the West Indies,³ preserved a part of Hudson's journal, and made us further acquainted with the country of New Netherlands, its inhabitants, climate and natural productions.

It was yet, like other climates to which no Europeans had penetrated, in a state of nature, as it was formed by the hand of the Creator or left by unknown events. Immensurable woods, with numerous swamps, covered the soil. The savages lived along the rivers, and covered themselves with skins of wild beasts, increasing in the forests with great rapidity. Their precious furs, so highly valued by luxurious Europeans, were the first objects of trade. The same woods supplied an inexhaustible provision for the construction of vessels. The soil's fruitfulness exceeded the warmest imagination, principally so along the rivers, when, overflowing their borders, they left a rich loam behind. There was found not only Indian wheat (probably corn), but grapes, too, with other fruit.

The rivers abounded with every variety of fish, and the adjoining seas were rich in codfish, tunny and whales. In short, New Netherland, to make use of Hudson's own words, "was the most beautiful country on which you could tread with your feet. The natives were good-natured, peaceable and obliging; the climate pretty near at par with ours; so that therefore New Netherland was very properly adapted for our nation to be settled by it, as there seemed nothing wanting but domestic cattle."

Several tribes of savages inhabited this uncultivated territory, sustaining themselves by hunting; they roved along the numerous immeasurable plains of America, to return to the borders of the rivers and bays laden with the furs of beavers, otters and other wild beasts, where the Netherland colonists and mariners were ready to barter other articles of comfort for these furs, then so highly valued in Europe.

Hudson's favorable account of the country which he visited in America was favorably received in the Fatherland, and inflamed the zeal of some merchants to send a ship thither, which was carried into execution in the year 1610. They addressed, too, the States-General of the United Netherlands, soliciting their privilege and encouragement, so that their High Mightiness satisfied their desires by a placard of the 17th April, 1614, granting to the discoverers of thus far unknown countries the exclusive right, besides other advantages, to make four voyages towards such lands.¹

The "Half-Moon" sails for Amsterdam.—The "Half-Moon" having been detained eight months in England, did not reach Amsterdam until the summer of 1610, and the directors of the East India Company, indisposed to continue efforts in a quarter which did not seem to promise the coveted passage to Cathay, and which was not strictly within the limits of their charter, took no further steps to make available the discoveries which their yacht had effected.

But meanwhile, if the glowing accounts of the country he had visited which Hudson sent from England to his Dutch patrons, corroborated by his companions in discovery, on the "Half-Moon's" return to Amsterdam, did not at once induce active efforts to transfer to those pleasant regions permanent colonies from the over-populated Fatherland, it did not fail to stimulate commercial adventure in a quarter which promised to yield large returns.

A new temptation was unexpectedly offered to the expanding commerce of Holland. Vast regions in North America, which Hudson had seen abounding in beaver and other valuable furs, and where native hunters, unrestrained by arbitrary regulation of excise, furnished ready and exhaustless cargoes, were now open to Dutch mercantile enterprise.

Second Expedition of the Dutch to New Netherlands.—The tempting opportunity was not neglected, for another vessel was immediately fitted out and dispatched from the Texel, in the summer of 1610, to the great river of the mountains, with a cargo of goods suitable for traffic with the Indians. The new adventure was undertaken at the private risk of some merchants of Amsterdam,² who, perhaps, as directors of the East India Company, had read Hudson's report to his Dutch employers.

The "Half-Moon" had now just returned to Amsterdam after her long detention in England. A part of her old crew manned the new vessel, the command of which was probably intrusted to Hudson's Dutch mate,³ who had opposed his early return; and the experienced mariners soon revisited the savages on the great river, whom they had left the autumn before. Tradition relates that when the Europeans arrived again among the red men "they very much rejoiced at seeing each other."⁴

Overtures by the Dutch to the English.—Meanwhile, the occupation of Virginia by the English had become well known in Holland, and the States-General, through Caron, their ambassador at London, had even made overtures to the British government "for joining with them in that colony." A proposition had also been made to unite the East India trade of the two countries. But the statesmen of England would not favor either of the Dutch projects. They feared, they said, "that in case of joining, if it be upon equal terms, the art and industry of their people will wear out ours."⁵

The Vessels "Little Fox" and "Little Crane" sent out by the Dutch.—The theory of a northern passage to China by way of Nova Zembla had continued in the mean time to be warmly supported by many learned men in Holland. Among them was Peter Plancius, of Amsterdam, who, like his contemporary, Hakluyt, was distinguished no less as a clergyman than as a promoter of maritime enterprise. Plancius insisted that Heemskerck had failed in 1596 because he attempted to go through the Straits of Weygat, instead of keeping to the north of the island.

In compliance with Plancius' opinion, the States-General, early in 1611, directed that two vessels, the "Little Fox" and the "Little Crane," should be furnished with passports for voyages to discover a northern passage to China. But the ice arrested the vessels long before they could reach the eightieth degree of latitude, to which they were ordered to proceed.⁶

Christiaensen's First Voyage to Manhattan.—About the same time Hendrick Christiaensen, of Cleef, or Cleves, near Nymegen, returning to Holland from a voyage to the West Indies, found himself in the neighborhood of the newly discovered river, which the Dutch had already begun to call the "Mauritius," in honor of their stadtholder, Prince Maurice, of Nassau. But deterred by the fear of losing his heavily laden vessel, and remembering that a ship from the Monichendam, in North Holland, had been cast away on the coast, Christiaensen did not venture into the river at that time, reserving the enterprise for a future occasion. On his arrival in Holland, Christiaensen, in company with another "worthy" mariner, Adrien Block, accordingly chartered a ship, with the skipper Ryser, and accomplished his voyage thither, bringing back with him two sons of the chiefs there.⁷

"So soon as the 'Hector' (now ready to hoist sail) shall be sent forth this Haven towards Virginia, Sir Thomas Gates will hasten to the Hague, where he will confer with the States about the overture that Sir Noel Caron hath made for joining with us in that Colony. Sir Noel hath also made a motion to join their East India trade with ours; but we fear that in case of joining, if it be on equal terms, the art and industry of their people will wear out ours."

Public Attention Awakened in Holland in 1611.—The reports which the comrades made on their return to Holland, and the personal presence of the two young savages, named Orson and Valentine, whom they had brought over as specimens of the inhabitants of the New World, added a fresh impulse to the awakened enterprise of the Dutch merchants. Public attention in the Netherlands soon became alive to the importance of the newly discovered regions in North America. A memorial upon the subject was presented to the Provincial States of Holland and West Friesland by several merchants and inhabitants of the United Provinces, and it was judged of sufficient consequence to be formally communicated to the cities of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Hoorn and Enckhuysen.¹

The experience which Christiaensen and Block had now gained naturally recommended them for further employment. Three influential and enterprising merchants of Amsterdam—Hans Hongers, Paulus Pelgrom and Lambrecht van Tweenhuysen, of whom Hongers was a director in the East India Company—soon determined to avail themselves of the favorable opportunity thus offered to their enterprise. Equipping two vessels,—the "Fortune" and "The Tiger,"—they intrusted the respective commands to Christiaensen and Block, and dispatched them to the island of Manhattan to renew and continue their traffic with the savages along the river.

In 1613 other merchants in North Holland soon joined in the trade. The "Little Fox," under the charge of Capt. John De Witt, and the "Nightingale," under Capt. Thys Volckersen, were fitted out by the Witsens and other prominent merchants of Amsterdam; while the owners of the ship "Fortune," of Hoorn,—the city which was soon to give its immortal name to the southern cape of America,—dispatched their vessel, in charge of Capt. Cornelius Jacobsen Mey, to participate in the enterprise of their metropolitan friend on the Mauritius River, as the Hudson was then known by the traders.²

CHAPTER III.

Commercial Importance of Manhattan in 1613.—Introduction of Domestic Animals—Pioneer Ship-Building—Progress of Dutch Discovery—1614, Block Completes his Yacht—Block Visits Various Points along the Coast—Charter of New Netherland—etc.

Important Fur Trading Point.—The admirable commercial position of Manhattan Island soon indicated it, by common consent, as the proper point whence the furs collected in the interior could be most readily shipped to Holland. To secure the largest advantage from the Indian traffic it was, nevertheless, perceived that inland depots would become indispensable. Thus, cargoes of furs could be collected during the winter, so as to be ready for shipment when the vessels had been refitted after their arrival out in the spring. Manhattan Island at this time was in a state of nature; herbage was wild and luxuriant, but no cattle browsed in its fertile valleys, and the native deer had been almost exterminated by the Indians. What was true of what is now New York City was equally true of what is now Hudson County, N. J., and, in fact, all the territory covered by this work.

Up to this time (1613) the Dutch traders had pursued their lucrative traffic in peltry without question or interruption. No European vessel but theirs had yet visited the regions around the Mauritius River.³ Their ships returned to Holland freighted with large cargoes of valuable furs, which yielded enormous profits to their owners.

From Manhattan small trading shallops were dispatched into the neighboring creeks and bays of "Scheyichbi," or New Jersey, and up the river as far as the head of navigation. The Dutch had been the first, and hitherto the only, Europeans to visit the Indian tribes in these regions, with all of whom they had continued to maintain a friendly and cordial intercourse. But while the Holland merchants promoted new explorations, they do not appear as yet to have directed the construction of permanent defenses, although it has been said that "before the year 1614" one or two small forts were built on the river for the protection of the growing peltry trade.⁴

Burning of Block's Ship and Building a Yacht, 1613.—By accident Adriaen Block's ship "Tiger" was burned at Manhattan while he was preparing to return to Holland in the fall of 1613. Undismayed by his misfortune, the persevering mariner set about building a small yacht out of the admirable ship timber with which the island abounded. This work occupied Block during the winter of 1613 and spring of 1614. To accommodate himself and his companions during their cheerless solitude, a few huts were now first erected near the southern end of Manhattan Island, near what is now "The Battery," and in the absence of all succor from Holland, the friendly natives supplied the Dutch through a dreary winter with food and all kinds of necessaries.¹

¹ Wassenaar, ix. 14. It seems from Wassenaar's account that the native species of dogs in New Netherland was quite small, for when Lambertus Van Tweenhuysen, one of the owners of Christiaensen's and Block's ships, gave one of those captives a "large dog" to take out with him, the Indians, coming on board the ship, were very much afraid of the animal, and called him "the sceler of the dogs," because he was one of the largest they had ever seen. The translation in Doc. Hist. N. Y., iii. 40, is inaccurate. Van Tweenhuysen gave the dog to his "schipper," himself being but a "reeder," or ship-owner, and he does not appear to have ever visited Manhattan.

Adriaen Block, when he had completed his yacht, appropriately named it the "Onrust," or "Restless." With this small vessel, about sixteen tons burthen, and the first ever constructed by Europeans at Manhattan,² Block proceeded to explore the bays and rivers to the eastward, into which the larger ships of the Dutch traders had not yet ventured. With his little craft he sailed boldly through the then dangerous straits of the Hell Gate into the "Great Bay," or Long Island Sound, at what is now the town of Stratford, whence he visited the "River of Roodenberg," or Red Hills, now known as the Housatonic, which he described as about a bow-shot wide, and in the neighborhood of which dwelt the indolent tribe of Quipsiuy Indians.

He next explores Connecticut River, by the natives called "Connittecock" or "Quonehtacut." From the mouth of this river he came to the "River of the Siccamos," afterwards by the English called the Pequod or Thames River. From there, stretching "over across the Sound," he visited the "Visselier's Hooek," or "Cape de Baye," now known as Montauk Point, which he discovered to be the eastern extremity of "Sewan-hackey," or Long Island, on which the "Matouwacks" had their abode. A little to the northeast of Montauk Point he discovered a large island, to which the Dutch immediately gave the name of "Block's Island," in honor of their countryman, and which still bears his name, though it was first discovered by Verrazzano, and by him named "Claudia," in honor of the mother of King Francis I.

² The "Restless" was forty-four and a half feet long, eleven and a half feet wide, and about eight, ten, or sixteen tons burthen. (De Laet, book iii. cap. x.; Hol. Doc., i. 33.) Mr. Cooper, in his "Naval History" (i. p. 41), speaks of Block's yacht as "the first-decked vessel built within the old United States." But the honor of precedence in American naval architecture must fairly be yielded to Paphamus' unfortunate colony on the Kennebec. The "Virginia" of Sagadahoc was the first European-built vessel within the original thirteen States, if Maine be considered a part of Massachusetts. The "Restless" of Manhattan, was the pioneer craft of New York.

Thence, following the track of Verrazzano, he explored Narragansett Bay and Rhode Island and visited what is now Martha's Vineyard. South of this Block observed another small island, which he immediately named "Hendrick Christiaensen's Island," in compliment to his early comrade.

This island, which Goswold had discovered and named Martha's Vineyard, is now called "No Man's Land."

Sailing onward through the "Zuyder Zee" to the north of the island of "Vlieland," or Nantucket, Block passed near the "Vlacke Hooek," or Cape Malebarre, and ran along the shore of Cape Cod until he reached its northern point, which he named "Cape Bevechice." Thence he coasted along the "Puyck" or "Wyck Bay," or "Staten Bay," which names the Dutch gave to the waters now known as Cape Cod Bay, and explored the shore of Massachusetts as far north as "Pye Bay, as it is called by some of our navigators, in lat. 42° 30', to which the limits of New Netherland extend."

We have thus followed Block in his explorations to the eastern or northeastern bounds of New Netherland, of which Hudson County is nearly the central point along the coast, and now turn to the results of reports made by Block upon his return to Amsterdam, soon after leaving Pye Bay.

Amsterdam Trading Company Formed.—Upon his return to Amsterdam with the details of the Dutch explorations on the coast of America, the merchants of North Holland, whose enterprise had been rewarded by such interesting results, hastened to appropriate to themselves the advantageous trade opened to them there, and to exclude all other rivalry.

Uniting themselves into a company, they took the necessary steps to obtain the special privilege which had been promised in a general ordinance of March 27, 1614. The associates then deputed some of their number to go to the Hague, and lay before the States-General an account of their discoveries in America, and to obtain the desired special and exclusive license to trade to those regions.

The deputies, probably accompanied by Block, accordingly proceeded to the capital. Unlike other Dutch cities, the Hague owed its importance not to commerce or manufactures, but to having early been made the seat of government of the United Provinces, and to the constant presence of the officers of state and the foreign ministers accredited to the republic.

For four centuries the abode of the courts of Holland, it derives its name from the "Haeg" or hedge encircling the magnificent park which formed their ancient hunting-ground, and the majestic trees in which at this day attract the admiration of Europe.

New Netherland Formally Named and Charter Granted.—To the Hague came the deputies of the Amsterdam Company to tell their story of adventure and discovery, and to ask the reward promised to their successful enterprise. Around the oval council table sat twelve "high mighty lords" of the States-General. One of the assembly was John van Olden Barnevelt, the advocate of Holland. Spreading upon the council board the "figurative map" (made no doubt under the supervision of Adriaen Block) of their transatlantic discoveries, the petitioners related to the statesmen of Holland the adventures of their agents in the New World, and detailing the heavy expense and damages they had suffered during the current year from the loss of ships and other great risks, they asked a special and exclusive license to trade to the region which they had explored. The assembled statesmen listened to the narrative with interest and favor. The Dutch commercial enterprise had now achieved the exploration of unknown and extensive regions in North America, which might soon become of great political importance to the republic. No Europeans but the Dutch were in possession of any part of the territory. Why should not the Amsterdam Company now receive their promised charter?

The States-General promptly complied with the prayer of their countrymen, and the greffier, Cornelius Aenssen, at once drew up the minute of a special trading license or charter, the original of which yet records, in almost illegible characters, the first appearance of the term "New Netherland" in the annals of the world.

The formal instrument, bearing date Oct. 11, 1614, was immediately afterward duly sealed and attested;¹ and thus the government of the United Provinces, by its solemn act officially designated the unoccupied regions of America lying between Virginia and Canada by a name which they continued to bear for half a century, until, in the fullness of time, right gave way to power, and the Dutch colony of New Netherland became the English province of New York.²

The special charter thus granted by the States-General licensed the memorialists "exclusively to visit and navigate to the aforesaid newly discovered lands lying in America, between New France and Virginia, the sea-coasts whereof extend from the fortieth to the forty-fifth degree of latitude, now named NEW NETHERLAND (as is to be seen on the figurative map prepared by them), for four voyages within the period of three years, commencing on the first day of January 1615, next ensuing, or sooner;" and it expressly interdicted all other persons, directly or indirectly, from sailing out of the United Provinces to those newly discovered regions, and from frequenting the same within the three years reserved, under pain of confiscation of vessels and cargoes, and a fine of fifty thousand Netherland ducats, to the benefit of the grantees of the charter.³

CHAPTER IV.

Preparations for Colonizing America—Pioneer Colony—First Director of the Colony—French Intruders Driven Away—Pemmican Taken for West India Company—First European Child Born in New Netherland—Mey Installed as Director—Domestic Animals Introduced into New Netherland—Second Colony, 1622—Verhulst Succeeds Mey as Director-General—Treaty between English and Dutch—Peter Minuit Succeeds Verhulst—Purchase of Manhattan Island—Minuit Re-called—Minuit's Administration of New Netherland—Van Twiller Succeeds to the Directorship—First House at Pavonia—Van Twiller Succeeded by Kieft.

At length, after two years of preliminary preparation, and the obtaining of their charter in June, 1623, the West India Company began to prosecute with energy the objects of its incorporation. The same month three pioneer ships (the "Orange Tree," the "Eagle" and the "Love") were dispatched to the West Indies "to maintain the course of traffic, and in hope of realizing their first returns."⁴

The colonization of New Netherland, however, became the first care of the company. That somewhat indefinite territory was formally erected into a province, and "honored" by the States-General with a grant of the armorial distinction of a count.⁵

As soon as the stock of the company was secured, and the several boards of directors were chosen, the College of the XIX. assigned the particular management of the affairs of the province to the Chamber at Amsterdam. Among the prominent members of the Chamber were Jonas Witsen⁶ (one of the grantees of the original trading charter of 1614), Hendrick Hamel, Samuel Godyn, Samuel Blommaert, John de Laet (the historian), Killian van Rensselaer, Michael Pauw and Peter Evertsen Hulft, whose names are identified with the first European possessions of the five States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania and Connecticut.⁷

The Pioneer Colony.—The spring of the year 1623 was the era of the first permanent agricultural colonization of New Netherland, under the authority of the West India Company. Anxious to commence and captains, as follows: "Gerrit Jacobsen Witsen, former burgmaster of the City of Amsterdam, Jonas Witsen, and Simon de Rison, owners of the ship the 'Little Fox,' Captain Jan de Witt, Hans Bonger, Paulus Polgrom and Lambertus van Tweeshuyzen, owners of the two ships named the 'Tiger' and the 'Fortune,' whose Captains are Adriaen Block and Hendrick Christmannen, Arnoldus van Lyllergon, Wessel Sibenick Hans Claesen and Baront Swetsen, owners of the ship named the 'Nightingale,' whose Captain is Theys Volkertsson, merchant of the aforesaid city of Amsterdam; and Pieter Clementen Brouwer, Jan Gombien Kie and Cornelis Volkertsson, merchants of the city of Hoorn, owners of the ship 'Fortune,' whose Captain is Cornelis Jacobsen Mey." Ibid., Doc. 1, 47. ³ The charter sets forth the names of the grantees, and of their vessels their colony with willing and active emigrants, the Amsterdam Chamber equipped the "New Netherland," a ship of two hundred and sixty tons burthen, and embarked on board it a company of thirty families. The greater part of these colonists were Walloons, who, disappointed in their first application to Carleton, now emigrated to America under the auspices of the West India Company.

First Director of the Colony.—The superintendence of the expedition was intrusted to the experienced Cornelis Jacobsen Mey, of Hoorn, who was to remain in New Netherland as the first director of the colony, while Adriaen Joris went out as second in command.¹

The "New Netherland" sailed from the Texel in the beginning of March, and shaping her course by the Canary Islands and the coast of Guiana, arrived safely in the beginning of May at the North River.

French Vessel Driven Away.—At the mouth of the river a French vessel was found lying at anchor, whose captain wished to set up the arms of the King of France, and take possession in the name of his sovereign. But "the Hollanders," faithful to the States-General and to the directors of the West India Company, whose designs they were unwilling to see frustrated, "would not let him do it." The yacht "Mackerel," having just then returned from up the North River where she had been trading with the Indians, was armed at once with a couple of pieces of cannon, and under her convoy the Frenchman was forced out to sea.

Take Possession for West India Company.—This affair having been satisfactorily accomplished, eight men were left at Manhattan to take possession for the West India Company. Several families and a number of sailors were detailed for a like service to the eastward of Manhattan, while others—about eighteen families—were sent up the river to what is now called Albany, N. Y., then called Fort Orange.

Whether any of this colony located in what is now Hudson County is not definitely ascertained; however, these colonists forthwith "put the spade in the earth," and began farming operations so vigorously that before the yacht "Mackerel" returned to Holland their corn "was nearly as high as a man, so that they were getting along bravely."

Another portion of this first colony settled at a "bight" or small bay, on the west side of Long Island, nearly opposite to "Necktonck," or Corlaer's Hook. This settlement, which was just north of "Marechkawieck," or Brooklyn,² before long became familiarly known as the "Waal-boght," or Walloon's Cove.

First European Child Born in New Netherland.—The colonists thrrove apace, and other emigrants soon followed the first adventurers from Holland; and here, in the month of June, 1625, Sarah Repelje was born,—the first ascertained offspring of European parentage in the province of New Netherland.

Mey Installed as Director.—Cornelis Jacobsen Mey was by this time formally installed in his office as the first director of New Netherland, under the Dutch West India Company; his administration lasted, however, but one year. During his brief directorship Fort Orange was completed on the North River and Fort Nassau on the South River. The fur trade was systematically prosecuted, and the West India Company was soon gladdened with the favorable intelligence which reached them from their infant colony. On his return to Amsterdam, Joris reported that "all was in good condition" in New Netherland, where the colonists "were getting bravely along" and cultivating friendly relations with the savages. The Dutch received very favorable reports aside from those from their chosen representatives. De Laet published a glowing sketch of the "New World," while Wassenaar issued his "Historical Relation," or "Historische Verhael," all of which tended to create enthusiasm in the hearts of the Dutch merchants, ship-owners and others, and it was not long before other ships were seen bearing away towards the shores of this newly discovered Eldorado.

Domestic Animals Introduced into New Netherland.—The capacity of New Netherland for cultivation and production being now favorably known to the public, the West India Company determined to prosecute vigorously the work of colonization. The yacht "Mackerel" was again dispatched to Manhattan with a cargo of necessaries for the use of the colonists already there. But when only two days out from the Texel the vessel was captured in a fog by some of the enemy's privateers, and carried a prize into Dunkirk.³ This mischance was, however, soon repaired. Peter Evertsen Hulft, one of the directors of the Amsterdam Chamber, promptly undertook to convey to the colony, at his own risk, such necessary articles as might be provided. Two ships, each of two hundred and eighty tons burthen, were accordingly fitted out in the same spring (1625), and loaded with one hundred and three head of cattle, among which were stallions and mares, bulls and cows for breeding, as well as swine and sheep.⁴ The animals were carefully provided for on shipboard, almost as well as on shore. "Each beast," says the exact Wassenaar, "had its own separate stall," arranged upon a flooring of sand three feet deep, which was laid upon a deck specially constructed in the vessel. Under this deck each ship carried three hundred tuns of fresh water, for the use of the rattle. Hay and straw were provided in abundance for the voyage, and all kinds of seeds and plows and wagons and other farming implements were sent on board for the use of the colony.

The voyage was entirely successful; only two of the beasts died at sea. On their arrival they were first landed at "Nuttin," now Governor's Island; but that place not furnishing sufficient pasture, they were taken away a day or two afterwards, by shallops and barges, to Manhattan.¹ There they thrived at once on the rich grass, "as beautiful and long as one could wish," which abounded in the valleys. But being at first allowed to run wild, about twenty in all died from eating some poisonous herbage which covered the fallow soil with its rank luxuriance.

Second Colony, 1625.—Hulft also added a third ship to the expedition, "that there should be no failure in carrying out the enterprise he had undertaken." Along with these three vessels went a fast-sailing yacht or "fluyt," fitted out by the directors of the company on their own account. These vessels carried out six entire families, besides several free emigrants ("vrye personen"), so that forty-five new settlers were thus added to the population of New Netherland.

Strengthened by his last arrival, the growing colony now numbered over two hundred souls.

Verhulst succeeds Mey as Director-General.—Cornelis Jacobsen Mey, who had for one year been so faithful to his duties and administered the simple government of the colony with such signal ability, was succeeded in 1625 by William Verhulst, who became the second director of New Netherland. His administration lasted, however, but one year. During that year he visited the South, or Delaware River, and examined into the state of affairs there. His name was for a long time commemorated by "Verhulsten's Island," near the bend of the Delaware at Trenton. Here the West India Company had a trading-house for a while, and here also settled three or four families of Walloons, who remained on this then lonely frontier but a year or two.

During Verhulst's brief administration several notable events transpired in Europe. King James I. died March 27, 1625, which caused the accession to the throne of Charles I. April 23d, Maurice, Prince of Orange, the "Fabius of the Netherlands," died at the Hague. Upon the death of Maurice, the States-General conferred the vacant offices of captain and admiral-general on his brother, Frederick Henry, who succeeded him as Prince of Orange, and who was soon afterward created stadtholder by a majority of the provinces.

Treaty Between the English and Dutch.—During this year, also, Charles I. concluded, at Southampton, a treaty with the States-General, by which he entered into an offensive and defensive alliance with the Dutch, to continue as long as the King of Spain should prosecute his designs "against the liberty and rights of the United Provinces," and occupy the Palatinate with his troops.² The allies bound themselves to equip fleets for the purpose of destroying the Spanish commerce in the East and West Indies, and the treaty expressly stipulated that the ports of the two countries should be reciprocally open to the war and merchant vessels of both parties. The King, however, accompanied his ratification of the treaty of Southampton with a protest that it should not prevent his demanding proper satisfaction for the injuries which the Dutch were alleged to have done the English at Amboyna the year before.

Peter Minuit succeeds Verhulst as Director.—Great Britain and the United Provinces were now allies: a circumstance which favorably affected the rising fortunes of New Netherlands. The West India Company, presuming that the same causes that had induced Charles to open his ports to their vessels and postpone retaliation for the alleged barbarities at Amboyna, would prevent his interfering with their design to found a stable colony in America, immediately commissioned Peter Minuit, of Wasel, to succeed William Verhulst in the chief command in New Netherlands, as its director-general. Minuit left Amsterdam toward the end of December in the ship "Sea-Mew," Capt. Adriaen Joris. The ship sailed from the Texel on the 9th of January 1625, and arrived at Manhattan on the 4th of the following May.

During Minuit's direction of affairs his Council consisted of Peter Byvelt, Jacob Elbertsen Wissinck, Jan Janssen Brouwer, Simon Dircksen Pis, and Reynest Harmenssen.

Purchase of Manhattan Island.—Up to this period (1626) the Dutch had possessed Manhattan Island only by right of discovery and occupation. But it was now determined to superadd a higher title, by purchase from the aborigines. As soon as Minuit was installed in his government he opened negotiations with the savages, and a mutually satisfactory treaty was promptly concluded, by which the entire island of Manhattan, then estimated to contain about twenty-two thousand acres of land, was ceded by the native proprietors to the Dutch West India Company, "for the value of sixty guilders," or about twenty-four dollars of our present currency.³

The island of Manhattan having now become by purchase the private property of the West India Company, no time was lost in providing for its permanent security. This was done by building a large fort "with four angles" on the southern point of the island.¹

Minuit Recalled.²—While the patroons were vigorously commencing agricultural colonization on the North River, they determined, under a liberal construction of the Charter of Freedoms and Exemptions, to participate in the reserved traffic with the Indians. Pleading that the Amsterdam Chamber "had no factories" at certain points, the patroons assumed that they had the right to engage in the peltry trade, which the company had certainly intended to retain in its own hands. But the directors, already jealous of their colleagues, who had secured such ample estates, could not quietly permit their darling monopoly to be thus invaded. Articles were soon prepared limiting the fur trade to an extent which excited their bitter complaints; the Charter of Freedoms and Exemptions itself was attacked, and "drawn into dispute," and feeling ran so strongly against all who were supposed to favor the pretensions of the new colonial proprietors that Minuit, with whose knowledge and approbation these large appropriations of territory had been secured, was recalled from his directorship. But no successor was immediately appointed, and the post of director remained vacant for more than a year. Lampo, the schout at Manhattan, was, however, superseded at once by the appointment of Conrad Notelman, who sailed for New Netherland late in the summer, in the ship "Eendragt," bearing with him Minuit's letters of recall.

Upon the arrival of Notelman, Director Minuit resigned the government into the hands of the Council, at the head of which was Van Remund, who had acted as secretary of the province since the departure of De Kasieres. Embarking on board the "Eendragt" with several families of colonists who were anxious to return to Holland, the recalled director and the superseded schout set sail from New Netherland early in the spring of 1632.

Minuit's Administration of New Netherland.³—Notwithstanding the abuses which had induced Minuit's recall, his administration of the government of New Netherland was, upon the whole, prosperous and successful. Honest purchase had secured Manhattan Island to the West India Company; industry had flourished around the walls of Fort Amsterdam; the western shore of Long Island had become studded with the cottages of its Walloon settlers; the bouweries and planters in what is now Hudson County were in a very prosperous condition, and peace and quiet reigned throughout all the borders of New Netherland. During Minuit's six years of dictatorship the exports were trebled. The value of the commodities sent out from New Netherland in 1626 was about forty-six thousand guilders, while in 1632 it had increased to more than one hundred and forty-three thousand guilders, the imports from Holland being proportionately large.

Minuit's return to Holland did not quiet the differences between the West India Company and the patroons, the company having intended to reserve all the peltry trade to itself, but found great difficulty in preventing, or trying to prevent, speculations in the business by the patroons, who felt that they had a moral, if not a legal, right to a share of the trade, although they had secured the patroonship with the understanding that they were not to interfere with the peltry trade.

To make the traffic more secure to themselves, November, 1632, they issued a proclamation forbidding all "private" persons in New Netherland from dealing in any way in sewan, peltries or maize. The patroons instantly protested against this decided step, claiming that they were "privileged," and not "private" persons.

Although Minuit left the colony in peace among themselves, and on terms of intimacy with the Indians, it was but a short time before disturbances arose that brought ruin and desolation to many homes.

We will now give a brief notice of Minuit's successor,—Wouter Van Twiller, whose government was very unlike that of his predecessors.

Van Twiller Succeeds to the Directorship.⁴—The person selected to succeed Peter Minuit as director-general of New Netherland was Wouter Van Twiller, of Niewkerke, one of the clerks in the West India's warehouse at Amsterdam. He had married a niece of Van Rensselaer, and had been employed by the patroon in shipping cattle to his colony. These were Van Twiller's recommendations,—the influence of kinsmen and friends, rather than acknowledged fitness for the important position under the West India Company. He was without experience in the details of the trade, except that which he had learned in a counting-room. Incompetent, narrow-minded, irresolute and singularly deficient in knowledge of men, Van Twiller was rashly intrusted with the command of a province. Embarking in the company's ship "Soutberg," of twenty guns, with a military force of one hundred and four soldiers, the raw Amsterdam clerk set sail to assume the government of New Netherland.

Van Twiller arrived at Manhattan in the spring of 1633, and commenced his administration, assisted by the experienced secretary, Van Remund and Schout Notelman. The Council consisted of Jacob Jansen Hesse, Martin Garritsen, Andries Hudde and Jacques ricatyn. Cornelis Van Tienhoven, of Utrecht, was made the company's book-keeper of monthly wages at Fort Amsterdam, and Michael Paulusen was commissary of Paauw's "Colonic," at Pavonia.¹

Van Twiller's chief objects seem to have been the maintenance and extension of the commercial monopoly of his principals. In many respects he was perhaps their faithful representative. He was acquainted with trade, but ignorant of public affairs. From the dealing with wares and the shipping of cattle he had been suddenly exalted to the command of men and the management of a province. It was only natural, that from the moment he began to administer the government of New Netherland, he should have given constant proofs of the folly and danger of intrusting to inexperienced and incompetent hands the interests of a community and the well-being of a State.

Van Twiller's insolent conduct towards De Vries lost him that influential gentleman's friendship, or rather gained his ill will, which was one of the main causes of Van Twiller's removal from the dictatorship. His little episode with the Englishman, Elkins, of the ship "William," of London, as it sailed up the North River, contrary to his positive orders, made him the laughing-stock of his fellow-associates, and especially of the people generally. In the latter part of 1633 he finds himself in trouble with the English at Plymouth, who claim the territory. Van Twiller puts in a counter-claim, which he does not sustain. He next has a tilt with the Pequods, where he is again brought to disgrace.

First House at Pavonia.—From his first appearance at Manhattan he seems to have formed an extravagant estimate of the wealth and resources of his commercial employers. They had authorized him to make large expenditures at the points where their fur trade centred, and where their revenue offices were stationed. Besides other costly works which he undertook at Manhattan, two houses were ordered to be built at Pavonia. These were the first houses erected on the west side of the river, or in what is now Hudson County.

Van Twiller Succeeded by Kieft.—From the day that Van Twiller landed at Manhattan, in the early part of 1633, to the day of his supersession, in the latter part of 1637, his path was not a bright and shining one. He developed no ability whatever as one worthy the position he held, and it became apparent, even to the Amsterdam Chamber, that a change must be made in the government of New Netherland. The constant charges against their chief provincial officer damaged the reputation of the company at home and abroad, and finally the College of XIX. resolved to remove him at once and appoint a successor, who, perhaps with more capacity and experience, seems to have been quite as unfit to direct the affairs of the province as his predecessor.

New Netherland to 1629.—Patrons and their Privileges.—Paauw's Purchase.—Patent given Paauw for Hudson Hook.—Patent for Staten Island granted to Paauw.—Patent granted to Paauw for Ahahimus and Island of Vroesick.—First Form of Government in New Netherland.

WE here leave Manhattan entrenched behind the walls of what the inmates thereof supposed to be an impregnable fortress, and cross to the west bank of Hudson River, where we will take a bird's-eye view of the first purchase of real estate in the municipality now known as Hudson County, N. J.

First, it will be proper to state that up to 1629 the Dutch territories in America were enormously expensive, and thus far the colonists who were settled in New Netherland had been "not a profit, but a loss to the company," and did not by any means meet its expectations. The Manhattan population had not increased as desired, and the trading at the two other important points, viz., South River and Fort Orange, was insignificant compared with the expense that had been incurred. The cultivation of the soil was a thing unknown, save here and there a small patch, just enough to partially supply those in and around the forts. Plans were now devised for larger colonization schemes and the development of the resources of the country. On June 7, 1629, the Assembly of the XIX. granted "to all such as should plant any colonies in New Netherland" certain "freedoms and exemptions."² It was obvious, however, that the rural tenantry of Holland did not possess the requisite means to sustain the expense of emigration. To private persons disposed to settle themselves in any other part of New Netherland other than Manhattan the company offered the absolute propriety of as much land as the emigrant might be able "properly to improve."

Patrons and their Privileges.—The associated directors thought that the permanent agricultural settlement of their American province could be best accomplished by the organization of separate subordinate "colonies," or manors, under large proprietaries. To tempt the ambition of capitalists, peculiar privileges were offered to them; these, however, were carefully confined to members of the West India Company. The charter provided that any such member who should, within four years, plant a colony of fifty adults in any part of New Netherland other than Manhattan Island should be acknowledged as a "Patron," or feudal chief of the territory he might thus colonize.

Purchases of Paauw Unpopular.—The purchase of Nov. 22, 1630, was one of vast importance. Then, as now the shore between Communipaw and Weehawken was of great commercial value. The Indians held it in high estimation as a place of resort, from which they conveyed their peltries directly across to the fort. The purchase was unpopular with the company, and his ownership of the tract occasioned much quarrelling and jealousy, and prevented the colonies prospering as they would have done." Those of the directors of the Dutch West India Company who had failed to obtain a share of the newly acquired spoils looked with a jealous eye upon those who, by reason of their large and well-selected possessions, had become patroons. This strife between the "ins and outs" waxed warm and warmer, until finally the fortunate directors (except the patroon of Pavonia), preferring peace to their wild acres in New Netherland, divided with their clamorous associates.

Up to this time there is no evidence that a settlement had been made on the west side of the Hudson. Some writers have supposed that buildings were erected within this county as early as 1618.³ It is, however, mere supposition. It will be borne in mind that in 1623 there were only a few bark huts erected on the lower end of Manhattan Island, and it is not at all likely that the very few whites then in the country would have weakened their power of defense by separate settlements.

Michael Paauw Summoned to Appear.—The feeling continued so strong in the minds of those interested, and the prejudice so great and the clamor of the people so loud, that coming to the ears of the Assembly of the XIX., they resolved, on Dec. 17, 1633, to call Paauw and the other patroons to give an account of their purchases to that body. It was an easy matter for the patroons to satisfy themselves that the position they held was an impregnable one. But to satisfy those who thought they had reason to feel aggrieved by the unhappy condition of things, as they appeared to them, and especially in Pavonia, was another thing; therefore a committee of five was appointed to negotiate on the part of the West India Company with the patroons, the result of which was to call Mr. Paauw to an account, as follows:

"TO MR. MICHAEL PAAUW, LORD OF ACHTIENHOVEN, CO-PATROON IN NEW NETHERLAND, THE 13TH MAY, 1634.

our deputies, as the day for the business; we have, therefore, resolved to notify you thereof, commanding you to attend here at the Hague, duly provided in all things, as the case requires, on the evening of the twenty-first instant, in order to appear on the next day for the purpose aforesaid, before the above mentioned Lords, our deputies, who will then proceed to business. Wherein fail not; giving notice hereof to the other patroons, planters, who are also interested in the aforesaid differences.¹

The matter was not so easily settled as some of the contentants imagined. Although the other patroons, Van Rensselaer, Blommcart and Godyn, had acquiesced in the demands of the "outs," the patroon of Pavyonia, although never having complied with the letter or spirit of the "freedoms and exemptions," was not so easy a Dutchman to deal with; and it was not until after repeated trials to negotiate that he finally acceded to the demand, and sold his colonies to the company for the sum of twenty-six thousand florins.² Thus Mr. Pauw ceased to be both a patroon and a disturbing element in New Netherlands.

First Form of Government in New Netherland.—Of whatever importance to the prosperity of the Fatherland were the conquests of the West Indies from the Spanish, Portuguese and natives, they were not left to the arbitrary whims of the conquerors and naval commanders. No; the States-General established, about the year 1629, some articles of order and government, whose prompt and faithful execution they required in the conquered places.

They authorized the different departments of the West India Company to appoint a council of nine persons, who should be intrusted with the command of the whole.³ The precautions which had been taken to secure its success may be seen from the privileges and exemptions for patroons, masters and private individuals, who shall plant colonies in New Netherland, or import there any cattle, etc., from March 10, 1628.⁴

The following were the principal points:

"The West India Company should reserve to itself besides the fur trade, the island of Manhattan also, both to cultivate it and to erect there a place for staple commerce, while the colonists were privileged to settle four miles along the coast, or along navigable rivers, or two miles on both sides of these; provided, they did satisfy the natives for the lands of which they had taken possession.

"The colonists might navigate along the whole coast of Florida to Newfoundland; provided, they imported their merchandise to the Mannhattans and paid a recognition of five per cent.

"They were privileged to sail for fishing cod all along the coast of New Netherland; provided, they carried it directly to Italy and paid six guilders per last to the company.

"Whenever they took any vessels of the enemy within the limits of the grant, they were holden to conduct them to the Fatherland, enjoying there two-thirds of their value.

"The colonies were further entitled to send from each river or island a deputy to the Council of the director-general and his councillors in New Netherlands."

The States-General added another restriction to these measures of the West India Company for the encouragement of merchants and colonists, viz., when they published, in the year 1638, an order and regulation in conformity with which all armed vessels, privateers, were permitted to sail from the United Netherlands within the limits of the grant to the West India Company, "except the coast of Africa, New Netherlands, and all other places whatsoever to which the company was trading."⁵

WILLIAM KIEFT, the third director-general of New Netherland, arrived at Manhattant, March 28, 1638, in the vessel "Herring," one of the West India Company's ships, of two hundred and eighty tons burthen, carrying two metal, sixteen iron and two stone guns. Upon his arrival he found demoralization upon every hand; the fort that had been built about three years before, at a heavy expense, was in a state of decay,—open at every side, the guns off their carriages,—the public buildings out of repair, and everything around displayed the most utter neglect.

His first step on the assumption of the reins of government was to organize a Council, of which he should retain the entire control. With this end in view, he appointed to a seat in the board Doctor Johannes La Montague, a learned Huguenot gentleman, to whom he gave one vote, while he reserved two for himself.⁶ Cornelius Van Tienhoven, a native of Utrecht, and one of the oldest residents of the province, was promoted from book-keeper of monthly wages to colonial secretary, with a salary of about two hundred and fifty dollars per annum and sundry fees, and Ulrich Lupold was continued as schout fiscal or sheriff, and attorney-general.

Appointment of Officers.—Among the other officers appointed by Kieft, we find the names of Claes Van Elstrand and David Provoost, commissaries of pro-

The Rev. Everardus Bogardus continued to officiate as clergyman at Fort Amsterdam, where Adam Roelantson was school-master.²

Officers' Salaries.—The following were the salaries of some of the above-named officials, which is somewhat less than salaries for the same work two hundred and forty-six years later.

La Montagne, as member of Council, thirty-five guilders, or fourteen dollars per month.

The book-keeper at monthly wages, thirty-six guilders, or $14.40 per month, and two hundred guilders, or eighty dollars a year, for board.

Mason, thirty guilders, or eight dollars per month.

Gunner, sixteen guilders, or $6.40 per month.

Commissary of stores, thirty-six guilders per month.

Carpenter, eighteen guilders, or $7.20, and one hundred guilders a year for board.

Overseer, thirty guilders, or twelve dollars per month.

Indian interpreter, twelve guilders per month, and one hundred guilders a year for board.

House carpenter, thirty-six guilders per month.

The government having been thus far organized, or, rather, reorganized, Kieft proceeded to introduce some order into the affairs of the colony, which had been for a few years past in a chaotic state. Those of the colonists or immigrants desiring land were provided for, and good titles given. Kieft's first conveyance of land in what is now Hudson County was to Abraham Isaacsen Verplanck (sometimes written Pianck),³ who took up a tract of land at Paulus Hoek. At this time and under the judicious management of Kieft, there was every prospect that settlements would multiply and the trade of the country be increased.

"In my presence

"CORNELIS VAN TIENHOVEN, Secretary."

Kieft's Weakness.—Although Kieft was a reformer in many respects, yet, like our modern reformers, he was powerless for good when impetuous by those of his political household. He had granted favors to one and another in the shape of offices and lands. To Abram Isaacsen Planck he had sold Paulus Hoeck for the trifling sum of two hundred and fifty guilders, and to Jan Evertsen Bout he leased the company's farm in Pavonia, and to De Vries he gave the whole of Staten Island on which to establish a colony.

Although he was director-general of New Netherland, where every one was supposed to be subject to his command, yet he was in the country of a race of people of whom he knew comparatively nothing and seemed to study their natures, character and habits loss. Knowing nothing of the wild and savage natures of the sons of the forest, he consoled himself with the idea that they were as much subject to his caprices as were the mild-natured and thrifty Dutch, over whom he had supreme control.

The Indians felt that a grievous wrong had been committed by the Swanckins¹ in their dealings with them; and socially they had not only been ignored, but scorned. And well might they live in fear of the coming time when, unless they defended themselves now, while their enemies were yet few, they should be driven from their homes and the graves of their fathers.

Tribute Demanded from the Indians.—Regardless of the situation of affairs, Kieft, in a moment of avaricious weakness, placed a match to the train, and hastened an explosion that might otherwise have been averted. Sept. 15, 1639, a year and a half after his arrival in the country, he issued an edict demanding of the Indians a tribute or tax levy, consisting of wampum, maize and furs, and in case of the unwillingness of the Indian to bring forth from his small treasure, Kieft proposed to employ all necessary force at his command with which to remove any reluctance on the part of the red man of the forest. A more foolish and uncalled-for exhibition of avarice was never perpetrated upon the human race.

These free sons of the forest, who were born free men, scouted the idea of becoming slaves to the avarice of a Dutchman, who had not only cheated them out of a large portion of their hunting and fishing grounds, but now proposed to demand tribute of what they had left. In speaking of Kieft, they said, "He must be a mean fellow," for "he has not invited us to live here, that he should take away our corn."²

They had extended their simple, yet hearty hospitality to the strangers who had come from an unknown land, and now their guests would impose upon them a degrading tribute. They had endured many rebuffs, and suffered many inexcusable encroachments from the domineering and grasping dispositions of the whites, and now they were to be forced to contribute what before they had willingly given or sold.³

Indians Oppose the Tax Levy.—To meet the impending danger and resist the threatened imposition, the Indians were not wholly unprepared. Commercial intercourse, social familiarity and domestic service among the settlers had acquainted them with the habits, dispositions and numbers of the whites. Their skill in the use of the guns they had obtained in exchange for peltries made them confident in their strength, and their sense of right convinced them of the justice of their cause.¹ Hence they were not in a mood to submit to every indignity and outrage which the impolitic Kieft would heap upon them.

They refused to pay the contribution, because the soldiers in Fort Amsterdam were no protection to the savages, who should not be called upon for their support; because they had allowed the Dutch to live peaceably in their country, and had never demanded recompense; because, when the Hollanders "having lost a ship there, had built a new one, they had supplied them victuals and all necessaries, and had taken care of them for two winters, until the ship was finished," and therefore the Dutch were under obligations to them; because they had paid full price for everything they had purchased, and there was, therefore, no reason why they should supply the Hollanders now "with maize for nothing;" and, finally, said the savages, because, "if we have ceded to you the country you are living in, we yet remain masters of what we have retained for ourselves."²

Up to this time the inter-course between the Dutch and Indians had been quite friendly, and with the opening of the fur trade in the spring of 1649 prosperity loomed up on every hand, and New Netherland promised to become the "Eldorado" of the time. The Indians were allured to the homes of the whites, and thus a friendly feeling sprang up which soon brought the Dutch into contempt with the Indians, who, not always being treated with impartiality, naturally became jealous. Some of the Indians were also employed as domestics by the Dutch, which unwise conduct only produced evil.

Difficulties with the Indians.—The Dutch, in their avidity to procure peltries, neglected their cattle, which, straying away without herdsmen, injured the unfenced fields of the Indians. Finding this the cause of much complaint, Kieft issued a proclamation requiring all the inhabitants whose lands adjoined that of the Indians to inclose their farms, so as to prevent trespass upon the red man's crops. The evil, however, continued, and the Indians avenged themselves by "killing the cattle, and even the horses," of the Dutch.

The Iroquois Supplied with Arms causes Jealousy in other Tribes.—One of the most unhappy results during Kieft's administration was the supplying Indians with fire-arms, to them a new weapon of defense. The Iroquois warriors from the day they first recoiled before the arquebuses of Champlain dreaded the superiority of the Europeans. At first they considered a gun "the devil," and would not touch it. But the moment they became acquainted with it and accustomed to its use they were eager to possess it, and no merchandise was more valuable to them. For a musket they would willingly give twenty beaver skins, and for a pound of powder they were willing to barter the value of ten or twelve guilders.

Knowing the imprudence of arming what they feared might turn out to be a foe, the West India Company, in wise sympathy with the English government, had declared contraband the trade in fire-arms, and had even forbidden the supply of munitions of war to New Netherland Indians, under penalty of death. But the lust of larger gains quickly overcame prudence, and the extraordinary profits of the traffic became generally known, and the "free traders" from Holland soon bartered away to the Mohawks enough guns, powder and bullets for four hundred warriors.

The Manhattan Indians Offended.—The furnishing the Iroquois with arms and ammunition, while the Indians near New Amsterdam were under a more rigid police regulation, only excited more intensely their hatred towards the Dutch. The Iroquois, now conscious of their renovated power, not only carried open war into their enemies' country along the Great Lakes, but more haughtily than ever exacted tribute from the subjugated tribes between the Mohawk and the sea.³

While the Manhattanians were brooding over what they deemed the unjust partiality of the Dutch towards the Iroquois, a new and last feather was added to the weight already breaking their hearts. Kieft alleged that he had "express orders" from Holland, and unwisely determined to exact the contributions of corn, furs and wampum from the Indians in the vicinity of Fort Amsterdam, which he had resolved upon the previous autumn. Although the directors of the Amsterdam Chamber stoutly denied having ever authorized the measure, or even knew that Kieft had demanded a tribute from the Indians, the mischief had already been done.

Kieft Anticipates Trouble, and Orders the Dutch to Arm Themselves.—By the wild and unstable policy of Director Kieft, the Indians near Fort Amsterdam had now become totally estranged. The Hollanders, said the irritated Indians, are materially men of blood; though they may be something on the water they are nothing on the land; they have no great sachem or chief.⁴ Kieft, perceiving the temper of the Indians in his neighborhood, and in apprehension of a sudden attack, ordered all the residents of Manhattan and vicinity to provide themselves with arms, and at the firing of three guns to repair, under their respective officers, "to the place appointed," properly equipped for service.

The Raritans, Wrongfully Accused, Attacked by Kieft's Soldiers.—Without waiting to be attacked, Kieft, the imprudent director, soon found an opportunity to become the aggressor. It happened that some persons in the company's employ, while on their way to the South River, landed at Staten Island for wood and water, and on re-embarking stole some swine belonging to De Vries and to the company, which had been left there in charge of a negro. The blame was thrown on the innocent Raritan Indians, who lived about twenty miles inland.¹ These Indians were also accused of having attacked the yacht "Vrede," which had been sent among them to trade for furs.

Kieft rashly resolved to mete out to the alleged offenders the punishment he thought deserving; therefore he sent Van Tienhoven, the provincial secretary, to lead a party of fifty soldiers and twenty sailors to attack the Indians and destroy their corn, unless they should make prompt reparation.²

When Van Tienhoven reached his destination, he demanded satisfaction, which, of course, as innocent Indians, was refused him. This refusal at once exasperated the men under his command, and they wished to kill and plunder the Indians, which they knew would please Kieft. Van Tienhoven remonstrated, but at last, showing his weakness as a commander, left the party, protesting against their disobedience. Several of the Indians were killed, their crops destroyed and such tyranny was perpetrated by the company's servants that there was now little hope of ever regaining the friendship of the Indians. Thus was laid the foundation of a bloody Indian war, which before long desolated all New Netherlands, and made Kieft's administration a hissing and a by-word among the people.

Had the government of New Netherland been in the hands of a "prudent" director, its prosperity would, perhaps, have been by that time permanently established. But prudence was not an element in Kieft's character. His levy of contributions had already alienated the Indians around Manhattan, and the cruelties inflicted upon the Raritans had aroused a feeling of revenge, which only waited a fitting moment for its display.

The Raritans attack De Vries on Staten Island.³—The moment for retaliation had now come. While the Raritans cajoled Kieft with peaceful messages, they suddenly attacked De Vries' unprotected plantation on Staten Island, killing four of his planters and burning his dwelling and tobacco-house. Thus De Vries' feeble colony was smothered in its birth through the blind folly of Kieft in inflicting upon the Indians a punishment for wrongs done by his own people.

Folly breeds folly. No sooner had Kieft heard how the Raritans had avenged the wrongs done them than he issued a proclamation for the extermination of the race of Indians, forgetting in his blindness that the Indians were as good players at the game of extermination as were the Dutch. In his "state paper" he begins by saying, "The Savages of Raritan daily grow bolder," and goes on with his braggadocio, offering ten fathoms of wampum for the head of every one of that tribe, and twenty fathoms was offered for the heads of the actual murderers.

River Indians attack the Raritans.⁴—Incited by the offered bounties, some of the River, or Manhattan, Indians attacked the Raritans. In November, 1641, a chief of the Tankitekes, or Haverstraw tribe, named Pocham, "who was great with the governor at the fort," came in triumph to Manhattan with a dead man's hand hanging on a stick. This he presented to Kieft as the hand of the chief who had killed the Dutch on Staten Island. "I have taken revenge for the sake of the Swannekens" said Pocham, "for I love them as my best friends."⁵

Other murders were committed by both parties and equally justified by each, and more especially by the Weckquaesgeeks, who complained bitterly of the treatment they had received at the hands of the Dutch.

Kieft, in his hatred to the Indians, feared to exasperate the people, who charged him with seeking a war in order to make "a wrong reckoning with the Company," and who now began to reproach him for personal cowardice. "It was all very well," they said, for him, "who could secure his own life in a good fort, out of which he had not slept a single night in all the years he had been here."

Meeting Called.—Kieft, perceiving that he would have to bear the whole responsibility of the proposed war, reluctantly sought the counsel of the community; he therefore ordered all the masters and heads of families to meet at Fort Amsterdam, "to resolve there on something of the first necessity."⁶ At this meeting several questions of an incendiary character were proposed by Kieft, whereupon the meeting chose "twelve select men" to consider the propositions submitted by the director.

The Twelve Chosen—First Representatives of the People.—The following-named persons were chosen to act upon questions of Director Kieft: Jacques Benteu, Maryn Adriaensen, Jan Jansen Dam, Hendrick Jansen, David Pietersen de Vries, Jacob Stoffelsen, Abram Molenaar, Frederick Lubbertsen, Jochem Pietersen (Kuyter), Gerrit Dircksen, George Rapelje and Abram Planck.

Of these first representatives of the people of New Netherland, De Vries was made president. The twelve men were all Hollanders, or emigrants from Holland.¹

The popular representatives did not delay their answers to Kieft's questions. While they agreed that murders should be avenged, they thought that "God and the opportunity" ought to be taken into consideration, and that the director should make the necessary preparations, and especially procure a sufficient number of coats of mail "for the soldiers, as well as for the freemen, who are willing to pay their share in these expenses." They also thought that trade should be temporarily kept up with the Indians, and on the whole, the "twelve men" took a very sensible and conservative view of the matter.

De Vries, who had been the principal loser by incursions, took the same view, only in stronger terms. But Kieft did not wish to listen to conservatism, and demanded war. To accomplish his favorite design, he questioned each of the twelve men separately, and found, as before, that peace reigned in their breasts, and De Vries, the president of the twelve, was decidedly opposed to war.

Indians turn to the Dutch for Protection and are Butchered.²—The war that had been going on at intervals between the lower river Indians and their powerful enemies of the north was at this time (1643) just breaking out afresh; as the northern tribe came down upon their weak brethren in the vicinity of Manhattan, the river Indians, as they were called, fled to the Dutch for protection. This the weak-minded Kieft thought was his opportunity for which he had waited long. He had dissolved the representative "twelve," and yet he feared the people, should he attack the Indians. Well he might, for besides the retaliation which would fall upon the scattered whites and outlying plantations, the Indians were now the guests of the Dutch. Violent and unscrupulous men, however, soon opened a way for the slaughter of the Indians. Among the former "twelve" were Jan Jansen Dam, Maryn Andriaensen, and Abram Isaacsen Planck, "three inconsiderate boors." Kieft's secretary, Cornelis Van Tienhoven, was a crafty, subtle, intelligent, sharp-witted man. "He was an adept in dissembling. When he laughed heartiest he bit most; when he hated most he pretended the warmest friendship. In words and dealings he was loose, false, deceitful and lying, promising every one, but when they came to the point, he was not at home."³ He and Planck were brothers-in-law and sons-in-law of Dam. Planck, Dam, and Andriaensen were the cronies of Kieft. As Kieft was dining with Dam at Shrovetide on the night of Feb. 24, 1643, and had become mellow with drinking "mysterious toasts," and so open to the approach of evil counsel, the host, with Planck and Andriaensen, assuming to speak for the people, presented to Kieft the following cruel petition drawn up by Van Tienhoven for the immediate slaughter of the unsuspecting Indians:

"TO THE HONORABLE WILLIAM KIEFT, DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF NEW NETHERLANDS, AND HIS HONORABLE COUNCIL.

"The whole of the freemen respectfully represent, that though heretofore much innocent blood was spilled by the savages without having had any reason or cause therefor, yet your Honors must perceive it would be that the Chiefs should deliver the number into your hands, either dead or alive, whereas they have failed, up to the present time, the reputation of which our nation hath in other countries has thus been diminished, even notwithstanding innocent blood hath been shed for vengeance, we therefore request your Honors to be pleased to authorize us to attack the Indians as enemies, whilst God hath fully delivered them into our hands, for which purpose we offer our persons. Although the "twelve" had been dissolved by Kieft himself, and he therefore well knew that no one could speak for them, he was weak enough to heed the voice of these men who falsely spoke in the name of "the whole of the freemen." In his anxiety to perform what he thought a great and heroic deed, he yielded to their counsel, and resolved to "make the savages wipe their chops." On the following day Van Tienhoven and Hans Stein, at one time a deputy jailor in New Amsterdam, came over to Pavonia to reconnoitre the bog of the Indians.⁴ Capt. De Vries and Dominic Bogardus having been informed of what was going on, remonstrated against the whole proceeding, but in vain. Kieft, however, was ambitious "to perform a feat worthy of the ancient heroes of Rome,"⁵ and immediately issued the following order:

"Sergeant Rusk is commanded and authorized to take under his command a troop of soldiers and lead them to Pavonia, and drive away and destroy the savages being behind Jan Evertsen's, but to spare as much as is possible their wives and children, and to take the savages prisoners. He may watch these for the proper opportunity to make his assault successful; for which end Hans Stein, who is acquainted with every spot on which the savages are skulking, accompanies him. He, therefore, shall consult with the aforesaid Hans Stein and the corporals. The exploit ought to be executed at night with the greatest caution and prudence. Our God may bless the expedition.

De Vries, 169, says that Kieft caused the election of the twelve men, "to aid him in managing the affairs of the country," but Van der Donck, in his "Verzoek," written eight years afterwards, affirms that they "had in judicial matters neither vote nor advice, but were chosen in view of the war and some other occurrences, to serve as clerk, and outspaw." (H. N. Y., II, 8, Col., 300.) Of these "Twelve Men," Ben Jyn was one of Van Twiller's Council; Andriaensen came out as a colonist to Rensselaerswyck in 1631; Dam was also a colonist there, in 1634; Hendrick Jansen was a tailor at Manhattan; Stoffelen was one of Van Twiller's commissaries, and had married the widow of Van Voort, of Pavonia; Lubbertsen was "first boatswain;" Pietersen, or, as he was called, Kuyter, came out in 1639; Rapelje was one of the original Walloons that settled at the Waul-boght; Planck, or Verplank, was a farmer at Paudus Hoek; of Molenaar and Dircksen the records say little, of De Vries, much.

"Dutch 25 February, 1643."

With such revolting blasphemy did the weak director end such a cruel order. The settlers were scattered and entirely without notice of the impending blow. Their position and want of preparation for defense rendered them an easy prey to the savages. Under these circumstances the Dutch were entering upon a course the end of which was only destruction.

The Massacre of Pavonia.—The light of Feb. 25, 1643, was fading, and the shadows of the black winter night were fast drawing over the beautiful bay. Huddled and shivering on the western slope of Jan de Lacher's Hoeck, under the protection of the Dutch, the unsuspecting Indians thought themselves safe from the fierce Mohawks and Iroquois. But while they drew around the camp-fires, and talked or dreamed of their forsaken wigwams, Manhattan was all astir with the movement of troops and citizens. The noble-hearted De Vries stood beside the director when the soldiers, under Sergt. Rodolf, passed by the fort on their way to Pavonia, and said to Kieft, "Let this work alone; you will go to break the Indians' heads; but it is our nation you are going to murder." Kieft doggedly replied, "The order has gone forth; it shall not be recalled."

The sergeant, with his eighty soldiers armed for the slaughter, marched down to the river, and, embarking in boats prepared for the purpose, silently rowed towards the shores of Pavonia. Rounding the southerly point of Paulus Hoeck, under the guidance of Hans Stein, they pulled for the high point at the mouth of Mill Creek. Here they landed. Climbing the bank, they passed close to the house of Egbert Woutersen, and cautiously approached their sleeping victims. Suddenly the sound of musketry was heard, and the wild shrieks of the Indians rang out upon the midnight air. Capt. De Vries, who, in contemplating the consequences of the expedition, could not sleep, says: "I remained that night at the Governor's, and took a seat in the kitchen near the fire, and at midnight I heard loud shrieks. I went out to the parapets of the fort and looked toward Pavonia. I saw nothing but the flash of the guns, and heard nothing more of the yells and clamor of the Indians, who were butchered during their sleep." Neither age nor sex could stay the hand of the unrelenting Dutch. Sucklings were torn from their mothers' breasts and butchered in the presence of their parents, and their mangled limbs thrown into the fire or water. Others, "while fastened to little boards,"— the rude cradle of the papoose,—were cut through, stabbed and miserably massacred. Some were thrown alive into the river, and when their fathers, obeying the promptings of nature, rushed in to save them, the soldiers prevented their coming to the shore, and thus parents and children perished. The babe and the decrepit old man shared the same fate. Some succeeded in hiding among the bushes from their destroyers, but the next morning, driven out by hunger to beg for bread, were cut down in cold blood, and thrown into the fire or river. De Vries says: "Some came running to us from the country having their hands off. Some, who had their legs cut off, were supporting their entrails with their arms, while others were mangled in other horrid ways, in part too shocking to be conceived, and these miserable wretches did not know, as well as some of our people did not know, but they had been attacked by the Mohawks." Isaac Abramson, a captain of one of the vessels which had brought over the soldiers, and was waiting for their return, saved a little boy and hid him under the sails; but towards morning the poor child, overcome with cold and hunger, made some noise. Instantly he was "heard by the soldiers. Eighteen Dutch tigers dragged him from under the sails in spite of the endeavors of the skipper, who was alone against eighteen, cut in two, and thrown overboard."² Eighty Indians were slaughtered at Pavonia during that night, and this, says De Vries, was "the feat worthy of the heroes of old Rome."

Retaliation of the Indians.—Great was the rejoicing on Manhattan when the soldiers returned from the butchery, bringing with them the ghastly heads of some of their victims. While yet the smoke of battle filled the air, and the blood of the innocent Indians was yet coursing down the hillside, the work of retaliation had commenced by a few surviving Indians, who had secreted themselves in the bushes.

Immediately after the slaughter Dirck Straatmaker, his wife and a few Englishmen, arrived on the field of slaughter, with the view of plundering the dead and wounded. They were discovered, however, by the few Indians that had escaped slaughter, who fired upon Dirck and his companions, killing Mrs. Straatmaker and wounding Dirck, who died shortly after. The soldiers heard the firing and returned in time to save the Englishmen and the babe of Mrs. Straatmaker.³

at the request of the Fiscal Cornelie van Hoykens, that on the — of February 1643 (in the morning after having attacked according to orders a party of savages behind Egbert Woutersen's Dirk Strauteraker, his wife and some Englishmen came to the place, where the dead were lying, to steal corn or something else. We declare with promise to confirm our statement with a solemn oath, that we have warned the said Strauteraker and his wife and said to them "Go to your houses," whereupon the said Dirk answered "We are not in danger; even if there were one hundred savages, they could do me no harm." The witnesses then moved away, going according to their instructions to Egbert's house. Arrived there they heard cry and the Sergeant ordered some soldiers to go there, who found the said Dirk wounded (he finally died of his wounds) and his wife dead. They rescued the Englishmen, who had only one gun among them.

"Thomas Willett declares, that the said Dirk was asked 'Why did you not come with us when we warned you' and that he answered 'I might have escaped, but I would not leave my poor wife.'

So unsuspecting were the Indians of the treachery of the Dutch at the time of this massacre that some of them fled from Pavonia to the fort in New Amsterdam for protection, believing for a time that they had been attacked by the Mohawks.¹ They were soon undeceived, however, and forthwith entered upon a relentless war, by the consolidation of eleven tribes, who resolved upon the work of destruction. They murdered all the men they could find, dragged the women and children into captivity, burned houses, barns, grain, hay-stacks, and laid waste the farms of the whites. From the Raritan to the Connecticut not a white person was safe from the tomahawk and scalping-knife, except those who clustered around Fort Amsterdam.

A Supposed Peace Treaty.—In the spring of 1643 a peace was talked of and agreed upon between the whites and Indians, but it was of a character not calculated to last long. The river tribes were uneasy under the great injuries inflicted upon them by the hated Swannekins, which had not been avenged or atoned for, and nothing but blood or a full satisfaction could extinguish the fierce hatred which they nursed. Early in August, 1643, the war-whoop was sounded above the Highlands, and thence it rolled southward. In some instances by stealth, and in others by open violence, the Indians waged a vigorous and relentless war of retaliation. Seven tribes had by this time joined the coalition, which spread terror on every hand.

Kieft Calls upon the People for Assistance—The War still goes on, and Bouweries are Laid Waste—Another Treaty of Peace.—In his hour of peril Kieft called upon the people, whom he had previously slighted, to come to his assistance. They selected eight representatives to confer and advise with the Director and Council. In this body was Jan Jansen Dam; but for the part he had taken in bringing about the tragedy in February he was expelled, and Jan Evertson Bout, of Communipaw, chosen in his stead. The eight resolved on war, and Kieft proceeded to arm the people and stationed them in small companies to protect the outlying settlements. But the Indians were alert, and gave the Dutch but little time for preparation. The force detailed to defend Lord Nederhorst's colony were routed on the night of September 17th, and the house in which they took refuge was burned. Jacob Stoffelsen, then living near what is now the corner of Henderson and Third Streets, in Jersey City, fearing his place might be injured, had three or four soldiers detailed for its protection. October 1st nine Indians came to his house and were kindly disposed toward him, and did not wish to injure his person, and by some means induced him to cross over to the fort. They then approached the soldiers as friends, and, being thrown off their guard by this show of friendship, gave no attention to their fire-arms; they were attacked, killed, and the building burned. The Indians took young Ide Van Vorst prisoner, and carried him to Tappaen.² Aert Tunisen, of Hoboken, out on a trading excursion, was killed near Sandy Hook,³ and afterwards his farm was laid waste and his cattle destroyed. The four bouweries in Pavonia—Bout's at Gamonepaen, Woutersen's at Jan de Laecker's Hoeck, Stoffelsen's at Alasinus, and Teunisen's at Hoboken—were laid waste and the buildings destroyed, not generally by open force, but by creeping through the bush and setting fire to the roofs, which were constructed either of reeds or straw.⁴ Before leaving they burned every house in Pavonia except the brew-house in Hoboken,⁵ and destroyed every bouwerie and plantation, with twenty-five lasts of corn and other produce, and killed or drove away the cattle.⁶ Pavonia and adjoining districts suffered more than any other section. So complete was the destruction and demoralization that the whole of what is now New Jersey was again in possession of its original owners and occupants.

This condition of affairs caused much discontent among the colonists, and poverty became the legitimate child of war. While the company's treasury was empty Kieft very foolishly tried to replenish its depleted coffers by another tax levy, which, added to the war, kept the country in a disturbed condition until the spring of 1645, when several of the tribes of Indians concluded a treaty of peace with the Dutch. The treaty, however, was not signed till Aug. 30, 1645, and was in the following language:

¹ This day being the 30th day of August, 1645, appeared in the Fort Amsterdam, before the Director and Council, in the presence of the whole

Commonalty, the sachems or chiefs of the savages, as well as in their own behalf as being authorized by the neighboring savages, namely: Orataney, chief of the Aekinkes-hacky; Sossukenick and William, chiefs of Tappan and Beckgawa-wauk, Pachan and Pennewick (who were here yesterday and gave their power of attorney to the former, and also took upon themselves to answer for those of Onany and the vicinity of Majanus-tennin, of Marechowitz, of Nyack and its neighborhood, and Aijjen, who personally appeared, speaking in behalf of Wappinx, Wiquaskecks, Sintinicks and Kichtawons:

"First.—They agree to conclude with us a solid and durable peace, which they promise to keep faithfully, as we also obligate ourselves to do on our part.

"Second.—If it happen (which God in his mercy avert), that there arise any difficulty between us and them, no warfare shall ensue in consequence, but they shall complain to our Governor, and we shall complain to their sachems.

"If any person shall be killed or murdered, justice shall be directly administered upon the murderer, that we may hereafter live in peace and amity.

"Third.—They are not to come on Manhattan Island, nor in the neighborhood of Christian dwellings with their arms; neither will we approach their villages with our guns, except we are conducted thither by a savage to give them warning.

"Fourth.—And whereas, there is yet among them an English girl, whom they promised to conduct to the English at Stamford, they still engage, if she is not already conducted there, to bring her there in safety, and we promise in return to pay them the ransom which has been promised by the English.

"All of which is promised to be religiously performed throughout the whole of New Netherlands.

"Done in Fort Amsterdam, in the open air, by the Director and Council in New Netherland, and the whole commonalty, called together for this purpose, in the presence of the Mapas ambassadors, who are solicited to assist in this negotiation as arbitrators, and Cornelis Anthonissen, their interpreter, and an arbitrator with them in this sad affair.

"Done as above."

This treaty was signed by Sisendogy, Claes Norman, Orataney Sessekennis, William of Tappan, Jacob Stoffelsen, Aepjen, sachem of the Mohicans, and Cornelis Tennisen, all of whom affixed their marks; and by William Kieft, La Montagne, Jan Underhill, Francis Doughty, George Baxter, Richard Smith, Gysbert Opdyke, Jan Evertsen Bout, Oloff Stevensen and Cornelis Haykins.

FIRST THANKSGIVING DAY.—"COUNCIL MINUTE.—PROCLAMATION TO BE ISSUED ORDERING A DAY OF THANKSGIVING TO BE OBSERVED ON ACCOUNT OF THE PEACE WITH THE INDIANS.

The 31st August 1645.

"It has been resolved in Council to issue a proclamation for a day of general thanksgiving, which shall take place on the 6th of September next in all the Dutch and English churches within the limits of New-Netherland. The proclamation reads as follows:

"As it has pleased the Almighty God in his infinite mercy and clemency, in addition to many previous blessings, to allow us to obtain the long desired peace with the savages, we have found it necessary to announce it to all the people of New-Netherland, in order that in all places, where Dutch and English churches are established, the Almighty God may be specially thanked, lauded and blessed next Wednesday, the 6th of September, the text taken to be appropriate and the sermon applicable thereto. You will please to announce this matter to the congregation next Sunday, that they may know it."

Thus closed the first Indian war, and in it Hudson County, or the territory now covered by that municipality, played an important part as a sufferer, not only in the loss of life, but property as well. The war had been brought on through the weakness of Director Kieft, and through his mismanagement it had continued for a year and a half, with results the worst that could be pictured. At the close of the uncalled-for conflict some of the colonists returned to their bouweries, only to find them a desolate waste, while now and then one found his real estate but little damaged. Among the latter was Jan Everts Bout. Before he had reconstructed his dwelling he sold his farm, with some few cattle, to Michael Jansen for eight thousand florins.¹ He sold, however, only a part of his farm to Jansen; the other portion he sold to Claes Comptah, alias Claes Pietersen Cos, for one thousand four hundred and forty-four florins, three stivers.²

Kieft superseded by Stuyvesant³—Proposition of Indians to Live in Peace—Extracts from Letters of the Directors to Stuyvesant—Other Correspondence—Return of Prisoners—Application to Remove Building from Hoboken to Atitstenlam—Indian Deed—William Jansen, Ferryman between Bergen and Manhattan—Petition for a Clergyman, and Subscription List—Magistrates Appointed for Bergen—Summons of Sheriff and Magistrates to Answer Complaint—Order for Survey of Land at Bergen—Letter from the Military Officers at Bergen to Director-General.

Kieft superseded.—When it was determined, in 1645, to supersede Director Kieft, the resolution was currently taken to modify, in accordance with the report of the preceding year, the system under which the affairs of New Netherland had previously been administered. The government of that province was henceforward to be entrusted to a director-general and a Council composed of a vice-director and the fiscal; with this understanding: that when the latter acted as a public prosecutor, or conservator of the rights of the company, the military commandant should sit in his place, and when accusations of a criminal nature were brought forward, two capable persons were to be adjoined from the district in which the offense was committed. Means were to be adopted to induce the colonists to form towns and villages, and to provide themselves with arms for their security and defense, whilst the privilege of delegating one or two persons to give information to the provincial government on the state and condition of such settlements was now solemnly confirmed. Instructions embodying these and other beneficial regulations were drawn up by the Assembly of the XIX., and immediately afterwards Petrus Stuyvesant was appointed director-general. It was not, however, until the summer of the succeeding year that his commission was obtained from the States-General, viz., July 28, 1646.

The new director-general was duly sworn before their High Mightiness on the above day, when the Hon. Lubbertus Van Dinclage, who had been appointed in the course of the preceding year, vice-director of New Netherland and first counsellor at Fort Amsterdam, also took the oaths. The other officers who were to proceed to New Netherland were Hendrick Van Dyck, schout-fiscal; Bryan Newton, an Englishman who had already served the company some twenty years, and had held office, both civil and military, under Stuyvesant at Curaçou; Commissary Adriaen Keyser, and Jesmar Thomas, captain in the navy, afterwards appointed commander-in-chief, in the absence of the director-general, of all the company's ships at New Amsterdam.

All preliminaries having thus been at length arranged, four ships—the "Great Gerrit," "Princess," "Zwail," and the "Baet"—sailed from the Texel on Christmas day, 1616, with the director-general, the other servants of the company, some soldiers and a number of private traders and freemen, who were proceeding to New Netherland to improve their fortunes. At length the fleet arrived at Manhattan, where the new director-general, on making his public entry, was received by the whole community under arms, among whom he diffused great joy by declaring, on accepting Kieft's resignation, that he "should be in his government as a father over his children for the advantage of the privileged West India Company, the Burghers and the country."

Stuyvesant found matters on his arrival in any but a satisfactory condition. Torn internally by contending factions, externally threatened by pretensions and usurpation of foreign rivals, the company's possessions seemed on the point of falling from their hands, while crime and lawlessness were the order of the day. Ways and means became necessary, municipal regulations were crowding themselves upon his attention, nuisances had to be abated, courts organized, and, in fact, the whole colony had to be renovated and reorganized. Troubles arose on every hand, which at times seemed to engulf him; but he rose above them all, and having had a military training, and possessed of indomitable will, he overcame all obstacles, removed abuses, transformed the government and thus became a genuine reformer. Stuyvesant's administration extended over a period of nearly eighteen years, and on the whole was quite creditable.

During his administration there were many acts of his and proceedings of meetings proper to be placed on record and in history, of which the following are a few items found among the archives of the New Jersey Historical Society, and are given here in their chronological order, as near as can be conveniently:

"PROPOSITIONS MADE BY THE CHIEFS OF THE SAVAGES LIVING IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD OF THE MANHATTANS, NAMELY SEINKE HADU, ORY-TAMIN, WILLEM OF TAPPAN, AND PENNECK FROM 'BEHIND THE COL' IN THE HOUSE CHAMBER AT FORT AMSTERDAM IN PRESENCE OF DE. JOHANNES MOGILDONCK, MINISTER OF HESSELADREWAÏK, ABERT VAN CURELOR AND JOHANNES VAN TWILLER.

"1. Penneckeck, the Chief "behind the Col" made a speech in the Indian tongue, which was translated and said, the Southern Minquas had asked them to live in friendship with the Dutch, which they were willing to do and for that purpose they had brought a present to the Hon^{ble} Director.

"2. An Indian of Moshoghekan, had involuntarily or unknowingly lately done mischief at Paulus Hook, which they requested us to excuse.

"3. Penneckeck and the tribe called Kestannos, formerly living at Wiquaskeek, had a chief, therefore he speaks for their, who would also like to be our friends, and that through their greetings to the Hon^{ble} General. Threw 3 beavers to the ground as a present.

"4. Molybrin, the chief of Noyck, was included with his people into the agreement and would be like them, our friends. They threw 3 beavers down.

"5. He speaks for the tribe of Repalamin, as for the above with a like present.

"6. Penneckeck threw down 2 beavers, declaring in the name of all that their heart was drawn and that they desire to live in friendship with us, forgetting, on either side, what was past.

"7. Penneckeck said, "I wish you could see my heart, then you would be sure that my words are sincere and true." He threw down two beavers saying, "This is my confirmation."

"8. The Hon^{ble} Director had it longer than desired to speak with them, it was long now and they had shown their good intentions, they are now waiting to see what he would do, laying down two beavers.

"9. Penneckeck said, although the Hon^{ble} General could not understand them, they did not doubt his good intentions.

"10. In conclusion Penneckeck said, "It is the wish of the Minquas, that we and you should be as a man and his wife, we are ready for it."

"The Hon^{ble} Director-general first expressed his thanks to the chiefs, that they had come to visit him with a desire of neighborly friendship, and he then told them that he was pleased to hear such a request. He promised, that nothing whatever should be wanting on our part and that he was willing to live with them in mutual friendship and intercourse. No cause for complaints should be given, and if somebody in their tribes, they should themselves report it to the Director, in order that they should receive justice in accordance with the case. In token of his good will he accepted their presents on the foregoing propositions with thanks and in due time he would return the compliment.

"The same present worth about 20 guilders was then given to the common savages and some tobacco and a gun to the chief Orattain, and so the savages departed well pleased.

"EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF THE DIRECTORS TO PETERIS STUYVESANT: LAND-GRANTS ON THE RAEPJAN, KIL VAN OBE, CAERKIL; FISH NAVIGATION OF THE NORTH RIVER; BARREN VAN DER CAPELLER'S COLONY, MORAWKS INVADE CANADA. 21st March, 1651.

"We observe that many people do not scruple to take possession of all the best land there, without formality and without determination by survey, as if the Company and its officers had nothing to say about it, and had been robbed or deprived of their prerogative; we have therefore thought it necessary to direct your Honor herewith, not to grant land to any one without his acknowledging properly the authority of the W. I. Company and your Honor, who especially take care that henceforth no more land is granted to people, than what in your opinion after a thorough examination of their means they will be able and intend shortly to populate, cultivate and bring into a good state of tillage. Several instances prove, that by non-observance of these rules many pieces are now claimed as property of many years standing, although very few improvements in regard to setting, cultivating, tilling or planting have been made. Thus we see it in Cornelis Melyn's, Wouter van Twiller's and others' cases; Melyn, owning an island of 7 or 8 leagues length, of which only eight morgens of land are under plough; and Wouter van Twiller is not only not satisfied with adding Hellegate to Nooten Island, but he endeavors also to get possession and make himself master of the creek, in addition to which he has stretched out his hand for the two flats in Long Island, one called Twyller's and the other Orler's flat, containing together 1600 to 2000 morgens.

"Wolffert Gerritson's and Andries Hudde have done the same; they took possession of about 1800 morgens on the same island, while they cannot settle the fifth part of it: this is quite against our intentions, for many valuable pieces of land might be claimed as property (with great prerogatives) in such manner and the land itself would remain unpeopled. We direct your Honor therefore expressly not to allow or grant any more land to anybody, except under the conditions stated above, and to keep Long Island, (which we believe to be the most important and best piece) for the Company, to divide it upon occasion for the accommodation of farmers and planters, until a rule shall be made, as to how much land shall be surveyed for each colonist.

"We are astonished beyond measure to hear, that your Deputy, Dinklage, has made common cause with these invaders, especially with Govert Lockermans or others, who have bought much land from the Baritans on the Kill opposite Staten-Island, without considering in whose name they are to get a conveyance from their High: Macht; without knowledge of the Company; we cannot believe it and intend to resist it with all proper means, as far as we are concerned.

"Brant van Slechtenborst's remonstrances receive no more consideration from us, than to notify us in regard to the taking possession of the Katskill, which had been conveyed to others long before he took possession of it and we have so far not been able to discover, by what right he or his principals lay claim to this property, for they have never asked the Company for it in proper form.

"'Tis true, that the Notary Jan van de Venne has made several applications to have a large tract of land, which your Honor thinks might be granted to him without any great prejudice to our interests: we would like to consent to his request, if he only would desist from his extravagant demand of highest and lowest jurisdiction, which we deem inconvenient and are still resolved to keep for the Company by all proper means; but we are willing to grant to everybody as much land as he shall need. Many people are again going over in the ships now ready to sail, who intend to settle there and you must accommodate each according to his position and the number of souls with him, consulting your own discretion and the requirements of their families, for it is our aim to promote the increase of population there by all means. You will also accommodate the Honorable Hendrick van der Capelle with favorably located lands, as far as he is inclined to take possession of and cultivate and people any land there, which he seems to intend judging from his letters, for we desire very much, that so wealthy people might take a fancy to these lands.

"We were very sorry to hear, that the Magiques savages had invaded the territory of the French in Canada and captured 8 or 9 Christians, for whom they are said to have demanded a large ransom or they would cruelly torture them, which excited your Honor's compassion. That is the duty of all Christians, but every one is bound to care for himself and his own people; your Honor cannot be ignorant, that some time ago men of this nation have been ransomed at the expense of the Company and by the contributions of the community, for which we have never been repaid; so that we think, that when the complaints reach France, they will take care of their own countrymen."

* LETTER FROM CORNELIS VAN WERCKHOVEN TO ? ENTERING A CAVEAT AGAINST THE GRANT OF THE BARITAN COUNTRY TO BARON VAN DER CAPELLEN.

"Copy.

"Sir,

"Arriving at Utrecht from Guelderland I received a letter from L. van Seester, chief-clerk of the West-India Company, dated the 11th of March, and with it an extract from a letter written by Baron Hendrick van der Capelle to your Worship and the Honorable Edward May, which said that his Noble Honor asserted to have bought the Baritan from the natives of the country, while this place has been granted and surrendered by your Hon^{ble} Worships to me as a colony. I request therefore to be informed whether I am to look out for another colony.

"But I cannot omit to address myself to your Worship in regard to it and to request with great respect, that I may be sustained in the privileges of a colony, which has been granted to me, since no previous purchase has taken place and only the priority of grant is claimed and even if it were the case, which it is not, that a previous purchase had been made, his Noble Honor would not be able to maintain his claim, for his Noble Honor himself declares, that he has given directions to buy the Baritan and believes or thinks, that it is already purchased. This is not certain, while on the other side I have given directions two years ago, to buy that district for me and have also received letters and information from there, which I will show to your Noble Worship, that the same has been purchased for me from and paid for to the lawful owners and natives of the country, as I stated to your Worships in my request for the grant, and I cannot believe, that, even though they are savages, they will sell a piece of property twice, but rather think, that some persons have made his Noble Honor believe, that this was a good piece of land, most convenient for his purposes, and have therefore acted in this manner to oust me. But I trust, that the Very Worshipful Lords-Directors will uphold me in grant given by them, in which your Worship will please support my interest, to have my privileges confirmed, for I shall not cease nor surrender my claim to Baron van der Capelle. His Noble Honor has himself written to me, to which I answered as your Worship may see by the enclosure. Commending your Worship with my very dutiful respects to the protection of the Almighty I remain, as ever,

"Sir,

"Your Worship's obedient servant,

"CORNELIS VAN WERCKHOVEN.

"LETTER FROM BARON VAN DER CAPELLE TO CORNELIS VAN WERCKHOVEN, INFORMING THE LATTER, THAT HE HAD PURCHASED THE BARITAN COUNTRY.

"Copy of a letter from Baron van der Capelle to the Hon^{ble} Werckhoven.

"I learned from the Directors of the West-India Company, when I Passed through Amsterdam on the 17th of this month, that your Honor had selected two colonies in the country of the Nevevick and Baritans savages, the native proprietors of that district, near Staten-Island; as I have bought from the same natives and proprietors some land near Staten-Island on the mainland a long time ago, to add to the safety of that Island, I informed the Lord Directors thereof, as soon as I heard the above and wish to communicate it also to your Honor, that no trespass may be committed on my territory, bought from and paid for to the lawful proprietors.

"I know, that your Honor will not do anything to my prejudice, for sake of our long and intimate friendship, and therefore trust, that your Honor will, upon receipt of this information, select two other colonies not on the land, bought by me, but at another place, for the extent of New Netherland is very great and just as good soil may be found at other places, as in the aforesaid Nevevick or Baritans country near Staten Island.

"Therefore our correspondence about this matter ought to contribute to a better and more useful promotion of the colonies, which we both intend to establish, and to the advancement of the cultivation of the soil and population of the country for the benefit of the Company and the service of our common country: I expect for these reasons a definite answer and advice, whether your Honor will undertake the journey in the spring notwithstanding the present warlike preparations and reprisals of the English Republic.

(Signed)

"HENR. VAN DER CAPELLE TOE RYSSSEL."

"CORNELIS WERCKHOVEN'S ANSWER TO THE FOREGOING.

"Copy of the answer of the Honorable Werckhoven to Baron van der Capelle.

"I have to state in answer to your Noble Honor's letter dated at Zutphen the 5th of March 1684, that no colonies have been granted to me by the Directors of the West-India Company, the soil of which had been previously to their knowledge been purchased by others from the natives of the country, although, even if it were so, such a claim could not be admitted or have preference, but only the age and priority of the grant, issued for such a colony. If this is to prevail and have force, then I too have given orders two years ago to purchase the Baritan Kill and the land contiguous to it for my benefit from the native and lawful proprietors of the country: I have received letters and communications, that the same has been bought for me and paid for some time ago, also taken possession of, as I can show to your Noble Honor. I had been informed, that your Noble Honor had purchased a bay and land on Long-Island, as well as the land of the Nevevick from the Sand-Point to the Nevevick bay, but not farther, else I would have extended my limits farther into the Nevevick, but I did not do it, because I did not wish to give your Noble Honor the least cause of offense or inflict damage and therefore I request most respectfully to leave me too in undisturbed possession of the land, purchased by and granted to me, and not to interfere, for I would not like to give up the privileges of my colony With further offers of my services, etc.

"MINUTE OF THE RETURN OF 14 PRISONERS [MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN] BY PENNECK, CHIEF OF WARKINKERPAUK.

"Monday the 19th of October 1655.

"Whereas the chief of the Indians of Achtkinkshaky by name Penneck, has sent yesterday the 17th October, with Captain Post, one of the prisoners, thirteen Dutch people, men, women and children, to the Hon^{ble} Director-General as a token of his good heart and intention and said chief requested, that the Hon^{ble} Director-General would show his kindness by sending some powder and lead.

"The Director-General and Council finding the request of Penneck of importance and having considered the present situation of affairs, have resolved and concluded, to send him, as a reward and token of affection two Indians, taken prisoners by our people, although not of his nation, and to give him some powder and lead, hoping, by these means to get the other Christians in a friendly manner and at the same time to inform him, that when all the Christian prisoners have been returned to us, he shall be rewarded courteously. This done in Council of the Hon^{ble} Director-General and Council, date as above.

"MESSAGE OF THE INDIANS SENT WITH SOME PRISONERS AND ANSWER THERETO.

"21st October 1655.

"Some powder and lead for 28 of our prisoners having been brought over to the Indians by Adrian Post and Claes Jansen Ruyter, accompanied by Pieter Wolphertsen, pursuant to the resolution of the 10th October, they return this day and bring the said 28 prisoners according to the promise made by the Indians; and report, that the Sachem Penneck had directed them to tell the Hon^{ble} Director-General, that Claes Jansen de Ruyter must return again to-day and bring with him a quantity of goods, as powder, lead, dulcis, gum, vancouver, etc* to ransom the prisoners, who were still among them, 20 to 24 persons, else he would go with them into the interior. It was resolved, to send the aforesaid persons over again and to ask how much they would take for the whole batch of prisoners or for each single one. Date as above."

"ANSWER OF THE INDIANS TO THE FOREGOING.

"26th October 1655.

"To-day, the 26th of October, Captain Adrian Post and Claes Jansen de Ruyter came over from Paulus Hook and reported, that they had had a conference there with the chief of Achtkinkshaky and his people and other savages of Mochegychlook. They declared on their word of honor to the Council and related, that the said chief Penneck had, in the name of the other savages, directed them to tell and request the Hon^{ble} Director-General, that, if his Honor would be pleased to send him and his people 75 pounds of powder and 40 bars of lead in three kegs, either as ransom or as present, they would immediately surrender the 28 prisoners.

"The Hon^{ble} Director-General and Council and the Burgomasters of this City having heard the report of the aforesaid persons and having further seriously considered the inconvenience of the captured Christians, whose imprisonment rather than our hands, they have with common advice and consent resolved (however unwillingly), for the sake of the prisoners' preservation and in the hope to recover them and the balance of the prisoners, to give to the savages the demanded lead and powder as ransom for the captives, as no other means can at present be discovered to recover them, and the more so, as they are scattered here and there among the Indians in the distant interior and to prove to them our sincere good-will, it is resolved to send them as a present 25 pounds of powder and 10 staves of lead over and above the ransom. Date as above: present were the Noble Director-General, the Hon^{ble} Lamontagne and the Hon^{ble} Fiscal Trenhoven."

"PETITION OF MICHAEL JANSSEN FOR A LOT IN THE CITY, ALL HIS PROPERTY HAVING LATELY BEEN DESTROYED BY THE INDIANS, GRANTED

"To the Noble, Worshipful Director-General Petrus Stuyvesant and the Right Honorable Council of New Netherland.

"Shows with great humility and due respect Michael Jansen, farmer and former resident here, that during the last unexpected disastrous conflict with the Indian natives of this country he was bereft not only of what he had earned here with God's blessing during a period of 17 years, but also of all, what his petitioner, had brought to this country and what had been sent to him. All of which has been cruelly burned or taken away by the aforesaid Indians, so that he, the petitioner, has now no means in this world, to live on with his wife and six children, but as he desires to gain a living, like the other inhabitants of this place, by doing something or another, whereas he first needs besides God's blessing your Honorable Worship's good favor, he, the petitioner therefore addresses himself respectfully to your Honorable Worship's praying that in consideration of the above stated facts your Honorable Worship will favor him with a lot within the city next to Abraham Cloek 39 to 36 feet wide, whereas the same would be very useful to him, the petitioner, for what he intends to undertake for the maintenance of his family, which doing etc shall remain as ever Your Honorable Worship's obedient subject.

SIGNED

MICHAEL JANSSEN

The foregoing petition was read at the meeting and after having put the question, the following decision was made:

"The petitioner is granted a small lot within this city, next to Abraham Martenssen Cloek, measuring in front and rear 28 to 27 feet and as long as the lot of the said Abram Cloek, provided that the petitioner shall fence the aforesaid lot on the side toward the strand in the same manner as the fencing has been begun on the city-gate Done at the meeting in Fort Amsterdam in N. N. date as above."

Below stood:

"The above order was annulled for some reasons on the 1st February 1656 and another lot granted to him."

"ORDER ON AN APPLICATION OF NICHOLAS VARELTH FOR LEAVE TO REMOVE THE FRAME OF A HOUSE FROM HOBOKEN TO AMSTERDAM; DENIED ON ACCOUNT OF THE INDIAN DIFFICULTIES.

"28 March 1655

"Before the Council appeared Nicholas Varelth and requested permission to remove the frame of a house, standing at Hoboken, which he had sold to Michiel Jansen for 230 fl. and asked for 5 or 8 soldiers for defense or protection, which having been taken in consideration several difficulties presented themselves which might arise therefrom and which were suggested to him, among others that upon meeting with savages our men might come to words with them, and from the words to blows, whereby the whole country and all the savages would again get excited, the more so as the savages pretended, according to his own statement, that the said house barring the nails belonged to them, and that our time had not come yet, as the savages still held in captivity about 20 of our children; further, that an order from Holland regarding this matter was expected every day, and several other reasons, which, if they did not satisfy him, he is directed to make his application in writing. Date as above."

"CONFERENCE BETWEEN THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL AND COUNCIL AND THE CHIEFS OF HACKENSACK AND HAVELTSTRAW. AN ARRÊTÉ IS GRANTED TO THE ESOPUS INDIANS.

"31 June 1644.

"Present in Council, the Right Honorable Director-General, Petrus Stuyvesant and Mr. Nicolaus de Sille

"At the meeting appeared

Oratamy, chief of Hackensack and Carruppin, chief of Haverstraw, with some other savages.

"1. The chief Oratamy says that during the last rencontre at the Esopus, 4 or 5 days ago, when only the chief Pennamaker was killed, about 20 Esopus savages were together, who all wished to live in peace.

"2. He says that the Esopus chief, Senwackemamo, who was with them at Geneseeqs and on Staten Island yesterday, was very sad upon hearing of the death of the aforesaid chief Pennamaker, and that he suddenly departed therefrom, whereas he did not know now what to do or not to do, but he had left in haste in order to see whether he could quiet the savages, and would come back in 10 or 12 days

"He states that the aforesaid chief Senwackemamo had told him, and the chiefs herewith, that just before he came here he had spoken with the soldiers that is the fighting savages, who camp by themselves, and had asked them what they desired, they had answered We do not want to fight any more, then he had spoken with the women about what they thought best; they had answered, that we may peacefully plant the land and live in peace. Then he had gone to the unexperienced young men, who camp alone upon another place to ask them what they thought, and they had said to make peace with the Dutch and that they would not kill a pig nor a chicken.

"After the foregoing propositions had been answered to the effect that we thought were insisted to make peace, the chief Oratory replied that he thought it strange then that our people had only lately made an expedition against the savages and killed the chief Premeuckeer. He was told it was our way to do our best as long as we had no firm peace, whereupon he requested that there might be an armistice on both sides during the negotiations for peace. We answered him, that if he would give there himself, with our interpreter Ches de Ruyter, or send somebody in his name, to hear whether the Esopus Indians were minded as they said, we would send him and them in the Company's yacht and keep an armistice until the 1st of return. He accepted immediately to do this, saying he would now see himself, whether the Esopus savages were well disposed. Done at Fort Amsterdam, in N^o Netherland, on the day as above."

"ORDER ON A PETITION OF WILLEM JANSEN, FERRYMAN BETWEEN BERGEN AND THE MANHATTANS, FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF RATES OF FERRIAGE.

"Thursday, the 22^d of December 1661.

"Present in Council his Honor the Director-General Petrus Stuyvesant and the Hon^{ble} Councillors Nicolaus de Sille and Jehan de Decker.

"The petition of Willem Jansen was taken up and read, which substantially states, that the Schout and Schepens of the village of Bergen had given him a provisional permission to work a ferry between Bergen and the Island of Manhattan. He requests, that their Honors, the Director-General and Council will please to ratify it and to order, what he shall ask for ferrriage.

"It is answered,

"The petitioner is referred back to the Schout and Committee of Schepens of the village of Bergen, who are hereby authorized, to enter into a provisional agreement concerning the ferrriage with the petitioner to the best advantage of the inhabitants of said village, and until further orders. Date as above."

"PETITION OF THE INHABITANTS OF BERGEN FOR ADDITIONAL LAND.

"The 22^d of December.

"The petition of Tolman van Vleeck, Harmen Smeeman and Casper Steinitz, proprietors of land in the village of Bergen, was taken up and read, in which they demonstrated, that their bouweries in the said village cannot be larger than 10 or 12 morgens and they request therefore, that a corner of land, situate back towards the woodland, about 8 or 9 morgens, might be given and granted to them, so that with the help thereof they may make convenient bouweries.

"It is answered,

"As the statement of the petitioners is correct, the surveyor is authorized to survey the desired piece of land for the petitioners and to make a pertinent report to the Director-General and Council. Date as above."

"APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES FOR THE VILLAGE OF BERGEN.

"16th October 1662, Monday.

Present in Council their Honors, the Director-General Stuyvesant and Mr. Johan de Decker.

"The nominations made and delivered by the Schout and Schepens of the village of Bergen were received with the request, that the Director-General and Council will please to select from them the Schepens for the said village for the coming year.

"The Director-General and Council have therefore selected and confirmed as Schepens for the said village Engelbert Steenhuyzen, Gerrit Gertissen and Casper Steinitz as continued as first Schepen. Done at Fort Amsterdam. Date as above."

"PETITION OF THE MAGISTRATES OF BERGEN, ASKING TO BE PROVIDED WITH A FERRYMAN.

"To the Noble, Very Worshipful, his Honor, the Director-General and the Honorable Council of New-Netherland.

"Show with due reverence the Schepens of the village of Bergen, that having observed and considered the fatherly direction and care of your Hon^{ble} Worshipships in erecting churches and school-houses, they request, that they may have a God fearing man and preacher, to be an example to and teach the fear of God in the community of Bergen and its jurisdiction. The Schepens have found it advisable, each for himself, to propose it, to learn what every man would be willing to pay yearly of his free will, affection and love for God's holy and blessed word, to have a good teacher, till such a time, when the Noble Lords-Directors of the Incorporated West-India Company shall begin, according to the custom of the country, to levy tithes. After the Schepens had made these propositions, the below named persons have voluntarily declared, that they will give a yearly contribution; the sum to be paid by such voluntary offerings may be calculated at 417 guilders in wampum, but there are among these people some, who have expressed themselves willing to do more according to their abilities if God our Lord would bless them and increase their prosperity; among the others, who stated no sum, there are some very willing, some very dull, those, who are willing, are the majority and declare, that when a preacher comes, they too would do their best according to their circumstances, like the others. Whereas the petitioners do not know, whether the people of Haersimons¹ come under this jurisdiction; therefore the petitioners cannot report, what they would do, but the schepens find it advisable and very necessary, that the village be provided with a preacher and submit to the mature consideration and decision of your Hon^{ble} Worshipships, that it might be notified to the Noble Lords-Directors, our Patrons, by the next ships. Your Hon^{ble} Worshipships know, with what courage the village of Bergen has been established by the community and that the same has maintained itself at great expense to the inhabitants, without any trouble to the Lords-Directors. The community is therefore of opinion, that their Noble Honors should take that into consideration and therefore assist the village of Bergen so much readier according to their discretion and to send one over for one or two years at their expense; during that time the land will with God's help have increased in value, so that then that which the good hearted community will liberally give, can be taken for assistance. Awaiting your Hon^{ble} Worshipships' decision hereon the petitioners remain

"PETITION OF INHABITANTS OF BERGEN AND GEMENOEPE AGAINST FENCING IN CERTAIN LANDS AND ORDER THEREON

"To the Noble, Very Worshipful their Honor, the Director-General and Council of New-Netherland.

"Show with due reverence the inhabitants of the villages of Bergen and Gemenoepe, that they the petitioners have seen, that the Schout van Vleek, Caspar Steelmets and Harmen Smeeman have fenced in a parcel of highland, situate at the south end of the village enclosure, in the best part of the pasture, which they appropriate to themselves: it is also said, that Mr. Nicholas Varlet lacks a piece of highland, situate at the north of the aforesaid village desk of Hookebosch, which, if it is done, would tend to the ruin and destruction of this village, because they would be entirely deprived of an outlet for their cattle and nothing but a marshy underwood would remain to them, where already three or four animals have been smothered: hence there would hardly be any pasture left for the draught beasts, for the Mincekloof-people are fencing in their land, so that this village will be enclosed in a fence all round. They therefore respectfully request, that your Hon^{ble} Worship's will please to make some provision and guard the common interests of the aforesaid village and of Gemenoepe. Awaiting hereupon your Hon^{ble} Worship's favorable decision, etc.

"SUMMONS OF THE SHERIFF AND MAGISTRATE OF BERGEN TO ANSWER A COMPLAINT MADE BY WILLEM JANSEN, THE FERRYMAN.

"28th December 1662.

"Whereas Willem Jansen, ferryman at Bergen over the North River, has informed us in a petition among other points, that Tielman van Vleek, the Schout and Engelbert Steenhuyzen, Commissary in the aforesaid village, had told the community there, that every inhabitant of the place could keep a barge and ferry over whom he pleased, therefore the said van Vleek and Steenhuyzen are hereby ordered and directed to appear before the Honors, the Director-General and Council of New-Netherland, on next Court-day, to give an account of the action. Date as above.

"ORDER FOR THE BUYING OF A CERTAIN TRACT OF LAND IN BERGTE, AT BERGEN.

"4th January 1663.

"Pursuant to the appointment made the 28th of December 1662 at the request of some inhabitants of the village of Bergen, Michiel Jansen, Adriaen Post and Jan Scholten made their appearance as deputies of the said village on one side and Tielman van Vleek, Casper Steelmets and Harmen Smeeman on the other side.

"The said deputies state, that it would cause great damage to their village, if the other party continued with the fencing in of the high ground in question, granted to them 22^d Nov 1661.

"The aforesaid van Vleek and Company maintained on the other side that no obstacle whatever could arise therefrom to the said village.

"After hearing the parties, it was ordered, that the piece of land in dispute, granted to the said van Vleek upon his petition by the order of the 22^d December 1661, should be surveyed and that the surveyor shall make a report of its situation and area to their Honor, the Director-General and Council. After that directions will be given upon the petition. Date as above."

"ORDER IN THE CASE OF WILLEM JANSEN, THE BERGEN FERRYMAN, AGAINST THE SCHOUT VAN VLEEK.

"Pursuant to the order of the 28th Decbr. Willem Jansen, ferryman at Bergen, appeared on one side and the Schout van Vleek and Engelbert Steenhuyzen on the other; the said ferryman stating in his complaint, that the Schout van Vleek and Engelbert Steenhuyzen had given permission to all and every one of the inhabitants there to carry over goods free of others etc.

"Whereupon the said Schout and his companion answered, that they had not done it without reason as the ferryman had refused to carry over.

"The ferryman says, that he left nobody behind, except those who would not pay him etc.

"After hearing the parties, the Schout was directed to assist the ferryman, that he may obtain the ferrage earned by him and if he should forget himself and not becomingly, to report it to the Director-General and Council, who will then issue such orders, as occasion may require. Date as above (4th January 1663)."

"LETTER FROM THE MILITARY OFFICERS AT BERGEN TO THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL EXPRESSING THEIR WILLINGNESS TO COMPLY WITH HIS REQUISITION AND SENDING NAMES OF VOLUNTEERS.

"The Council of War of the village of Bergen in New-Netherland inform his Hon^{ble} Worship, the Director-General, that they have received his Hon^{ble} Worship's letter and heard his request, by which the Council of War find themselves heavily taxed, to contribute some soldiers notwithstanding the weakness of the village, for they think, under the operation, that it too requires assistance, considering the dangerous location.

"However, that your Hon^{ble} Worship may know the affection of the community on this side and learn of its existence, the Council has read your Hon^{ble} Worship's letter to the community and encouraged some as much as possible, as the following list shows; but only under such condition, that, if our village is in need, we shall receive assistance from your Hon^{ble} Worship and the other villages, upon which the request has been carried out, with the understanding, that the volunteers are not to go any farther, than the neighboring villages, if they are in need and attacked and expressly excluding the Esopus and that the volunteers be provided with good arms as promised, upon which a man may rely for his safety in such an adventure, the sum to be delivered here either in the officer's or the Lieutenant's house and to be kept ready for every occasion, when your Hon^{ble} Worship shall need these men. We commend your Hon^{ble} Worship to the protection of God.

CHAPTER VIII.

Capture of New Netherland by the English—Fruitless Appeal to Holland for Assistance—Capitulation of the Dutch—Charter to James, Duke of York—Cartier's Arrival and Reorganization of Courts—Bergen Re-chartered—Stuyvesant's Excuse for the Surrender—Land Grants or Patents in old Bergen Township—Other Ancient Settlements.

THE capture of New Netherland, in 1664, by the English was a bloodless victory, and rather cowardly when we take into consideration the condition of the two powers at the time. Even after its discovery by Hudson, and his reports thereon, the greedy English were desirous of making the territory subject to England's tyranny. England had been at no expense or trouble in its discovery, or thus far in its development, but as soon as it was discovered that there was money in it, England wanted it, and set up a claim of discovery, probably on the slim pretext that it was discovered by a man who was an Englishman by birth, although not in the employ of England at the time of the discovery. It was merely an act of might subduing right, a principle upon which England has ever since acted. Rumors of an invasion by the English were freely circulated, and even encroachments upon the New Netherland territory were actually made, and, finally, with all the bravado of a highwayman, England with four ships-of-war and six hundred soldiers, armed and equipped for every emergency, pounced down upon this then, poor and defenseless colony and demanded a surrender to the British crown. By what right, may we ask? Merely because they had the power to conquer.

Fruitless Appeal to Holland for Assistance.—The people were at once disheartened, discouraged and begged for mercy, and appealed to the home government in Holland in the following remonstrance, or, rather, petition:

"RIGHT HONORABLE: We, your sorrowful commonalty and subjects, beg to represent with all humility, that having, beforehand, for our own vindication before God and man, in these sad and difficult circumstances, maturely considered and deliberately weighed what is necessary to be done and concluded at this critical and urgent conjuncture, we cannot conscientiously foresee that any thing else is to be expected for this fort and city of Manhattan (as your Honors must be convinced) than misery, sorrow, confiscation, the dishonor of women, murder of their children in their cradles, and, in a word, the absolute ruin and destruction of about fifteen hundred innocent, only two hundred and fifty of whom are capable of bearing arms, unless you be pleased to adjust matters according to the conjuncture of the time.

"Your honors are, in the first place, better aware than we that four of the English King's frigates are now lying in the road at Nyack, with six hundred soldiers, not only ordered hither by his Majesty, but bearing also commissions to all the Governors of New England (a populous and thickly inhabited country) to impress troops, in addition to the forces already on board, for the purpose of reducing New Netherland to his Majesty's obedience. In compliance with that commission, the English General hath sent divers letters to your Honors, summoning this city and Fort Manhattan, promising, in case we voluntarily submit, that we shall not experience the least loss or damage, but, on the contrary, should we prove obstinate and headstrong, we must expect the aforesaid miseries and misfortunes.

"These threats would not at all have been regarded, could your honors or we, your petitioners, expect the smallest aid or success. But (God help us) whether we turn us for assistance to the north or to the south, to the east or to the west, 'tis all vain! On all sides are we encompassed and hemmed in by our enemies. If, on the other hand, we examine our internal strength, alas! it is feeble and impotent that, unless we ascribe the circumstances to the mercy of God, we cannot sufficiently express our astonishment that he should have granted us so long a reprieve, inasmuch as he could have delivered us a prey and a plunder to the soldiery after one summons.

"We shall now examine your Honors' fortress. You know in your own consciences that it is incapable of making head three days against so powerful an enemy. Granting even that it could hold out and contend against its assailants one, two, three, four, five or six months (which, to our sorrow it cannot), it is still undeniably that it cannot save the smallest portion of our entire city, our property and (what is dearer to us) our wives and children from total ruin, for, after considerable bloodshed, even the fort itself could not be preserved. Wherefore, to prevent and arrest all the aforesaid misfortunes, we humbly, and in bitterness of heart, implore your Honors not to reject the conditions of so generous a foe, but to be pleased to meet him in the speediest, best and most reputable manner. Otherwise (which God forbid) are we obliged, before God and the world, to protest against and call down on your Honors the vengeance of Heaven for all the innocent blood which shall be shed in consequence of your Honors' obstinacy, inasmuch as the commissioners have to-day informed us that the aforesaid English General has stated and threatened that he shall not wait longer than this day.

"We trust your Honors will not question that to God, who seeks not the death of a sinner, belongs obedience, rather than to man. We feel certain, therefore, that your Honors will exhibit yourselves, in this pressing exigency and sorrowful season, as men and Christians, and conclude, with God's help, an honorable and reasonable capitulation, which, may the Lord our God, in His great mercy, be pleased to grant us! Amen."

Capitulation of the Dutch.—This action of the leading citizens was followed, Aug. 27, 1664, by terms of capitulation, whereby the New Netherlands became subject to His Majesty of England. The terms of capitulation, comprising twenty-three sections, seem on the face of them to be fair and lenient towards the Dutch;¹ and why should they not be?

Charter to James, Duke of York.—This little episode was followed by a grant or charter from Charles II. to his brother James, Duke of York, of the territory from the western side of the Connecticut River to the eastern side of the Delaware River, including New York and New Jersey. In the same year James, Duke of York, by indenture of lease and release, granted and sold to John Lord Berkeley, Baron of Stratton, and Sir George Carteret, of Sultrun, the territory of Nova Casarea, or New Jersey. Under their charter from the Duke of York, Berkeley and Carteret proceeded to establish civil government in New Jersey. For this purpose they had a constitution drawn up in England, entitled "The Concessions and Agreement of the Lord Proprietors of the Province of New Casarea, or New Jersey, to and with all and every the Adventurers, and all such as shall settle or plant there." This instrument was engrossed on parchment, and signed by them on the 10th day of February, 1664. Philip Carteret was appointed Governor of the province, but did not arrive thither till August, 1665. In the mean time New Jersey was placed under the jurisdiction of Col. Richard Nicoll, Governor of New York. During the interval a legislative council or assembly convened at Elizabethtown,² on April 19, 1664. Bergen (now Hudson County) was represented in this assembly, the first ever convened in the province, by Englebert Steenhuyzen and Herman Smeeman.³ This government was continued over the province of New Jersey until the establishment of separate proprietary governments after the division of East and West Jersey.

Carteret's Arrival and Reorganization of Courts.—Philip Carteret, soon after his arrival at Elizabethtown as Governor, in August, 1665, reorganized the court at Bergen, commissioning Capt. Nicola Varlet, who was made president, to "Constitute and appoint a court of judicature for the inhabitants of Bergen, Gomonepaen, Alasymes and Hoboken to be held and kept as often as occasion shall require in the aforesaid town of Bergen." This was the first court under the English rule. Herman Smeeman and Casper Stuyvenius, of Bergen, and Elias Michielsens, of Communipaw, were appointed magistrates to sit in the courts as assistants.⁴ This court had a register or clerk to keep a record of all actions and a sergeant or States' board, to execute all its acts and warrants. All writs and warrants were in the name of the King, and no appeal to the Governor and Council was allowed under the sum of ten pounds sterling. "And this," says the commission, "to continue till we shall otherwise provide for the settlement of those affairs, and no longer."

Bergen Rechartered.—A new charter was granted to Bergen, Sept. 22, 1668, confirmatory of the rights as to land possessed by the "Freeholders and inhabitants" under the Dutch charter of 1658. It also contained some new provisions and privileges, and defined the boundaries of the township of Bergen as follows:

"The bounds and limits of the aforesaid town and corporation of Bergen is, to begin at the north end thereof, from a place called Moravia Meadow, lying upon the west side of Hudson's River, from thence to run upon a northwest line, by a threefool fence, that is now standing, to a place called Lepota, and from thence to a creek surrounding northward west, till it comes into Hackinsack River; containing in breadth from the top of the hill one and a half miles, or one hundred and twenty chains. From thence it runs along said Hackinsack River upon a southwest line, till it comes to a point or neck of land that is ~~near~~ against Staten Island and Shooter's Island, in Arthur Cull Bay, containing in length about twelve miles. From thence to run eastward along the river called Kill Van Koll, that parts Staten Island and the main, to a point or neck of land called Constables Point or Constables Hook, and from thence to run up northward all along the bay up into Hoesen River, till it comes to Moravia Meadow aforesaid, so that the whole tract of upland and meadow property belonging to the jurisdiction of the said town and corporation of Bergen, is bounded at the north, end by a tract of land belonging to Capt. Nicholas Varlet and Mr. Samuel Edsall, on the east side by Hudson's River, on the south end by the Kill Van Koll, that parts Staten Island and the main; and on the west side by Arthur Cull Bay and Hackinsack River. The whole, both upland, meadow and waste land, containing, according to the survey, eleven thousand five hundred and twenty acres, English measure."

This charter granted the utmost liberty of conscience in matters of religion; provided for a court of judicature for the trial of all causes actionable between parties, as well as criminal causes; made provision also for the support of the church, and a free school for the education of its youth. Under this charter township government was maintained until the 14th of January, in the twelfth year of the reign of Queen Anne (1714) when a petition from Andrew Van Buskirk, Barrett Christian, Enoch Freeland, Rutt Van Horne, Hendrick Cuyper, Winder Devericks and John Devericks, freeholders, in behalf of themselves and the other freeholders of the town, setting forth the previous possession and enjoyments of their ancestors of divers lands, tenements and hereditaments and their exercise of divers privileges and immunities by virtue of the charter of Sept. 22, 1668, and that many of the lands were lying undivided and were subject to great damage and waste of wood; and that by said charter sufficient authority was not given to prevent such damage, as well as for other purposes, and that, in consequence, relief was needed from the government. An act was passed of that date, in the reign of Queen Anne, giving the petitioners a new charter as a township or body corporate, by the name of "The Trustees of the Freeholders, Inhabitants of the Township of Bergen," with more extensive powers.

"TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY LORDS STATES-GENERAL OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS.

"Peter Stuyvesant, late Director-General in New Netherland, in the service of Your High Mightiness and of the Hon^{ble} Incorporated West India Company of this country, with humble reverence, represents that, after the violent invasion and conquest of the said Province of New Netherland by the irresistible power of the English, the Petitioner, on repairing hither and arriving in these parts, hath communicated and made known circumstantially to the said Company, at its chamber at Amsterdam, the circumstances and state of said conquest, whereof he, the Petitioner, now exhibits herewith to you, High and Mighty, a Brief, True Account, corroborated by divers certificates and proofs from which it clearly appears that he, the Petitioner, all possible means to put himself in proper defense, but was necessitated to surrender said place through the unwillingness of the Militia, the protests and menaces of the Burgheers, the weakness of the Fort, the scarcity of provisions and munitions of war, and the small number of soldiers. . . .

"Signed, P. STUYVESANT.

"Dated October 19, 1665."

Land Grants or Patents in Bergen Township.—

The following list comprises a few of the earlier patents for lands in what is now Hudson County. It would be a pleasure to ourselves, as well as of interest to the inhabitants of Hudson County, could we trace the ownerships down to the present day. But time and space both forbid us the pleasures of the enterprise; therefore we must be content with the few following scraps gathered from various sources, but mainly from the archives of the New Jersey Historical Society.

Other Ancient Settlements.—We will now notice some of the other settlers or settlements in the county, as well as Bergen town or township.

Communipaw, adjoining Jersey City on the south, was one of the earliest settlements on the west bank of the Hudson River. Its first settler, Jan Evertsen Bout, was there in 1634 as the agent for Michael Pauw, until the patron sold to the West India Company, when, about 1638, he rented the farm, which included all the upland between Communipaw Creek on the south and the meadow on the north. Bout afterwards received a patent for the farm as a gift from the West India Company.²

"Up to 1643," says Winfield, "no settlement had been made north of Hoboken. At this place a farm house and brew-house had been built and a bouwerie cleared and planted. Here Aert Teunissen Van Putten resided." Van Putten was the first white resident of Hoboken. He leased the farm Feb. 15, 1640, for twelve years from Jan. 1, 1641.³

At Ahasimus was the family of Cornelius Van Vorst, deceased, at the head of which was Jacob Stoffelsen, who had married Van Vorst's widow.

At Paulus Hoeck was Abraham Isaacsen Planck and his tenants, Gerrit Dirckson Blauw, Claes Jansen Van Pinnerent, alias Jan Potagie, and Cornelius Arissen.

At Jan De Laecker's Hoeck, or Mill Creek Point, as an under-tenant of Bout, resided Egbert Woutersen with his family.

On the bluff immediately in rear of Aven Point, and just where the Central Railroad crosses the Morris Canal, lived Dirck Streatmaker.

The peninsula of Paulus Hook, on which Jersey City is now situated, belonged from a very remote period to the Van Vorst family. In 1804 it was vested in Cornelius Van Vorst.

In 1785, Mr. George Scott, in his book entitled "The Model of the Government of East Jersey," in speaking of this territory, says,—

"There are other plantations upon Hackensack River, which goes a great way up the country, almost north-west; others also on the east side of another creek or river at Hackensack River.

"To go back to the south part of Bergen Neck that is opposite to Staten Island, where is but a narrow passage of water, which ebb and flows between the said Island and Bergen Point, called Constable's Hook, extending inland about a mile over from the bay on the east side of the neck that leads to New York, to that on the west that goes to Hackensack and Snake Hill, the neck running up between both, from the south to the north of Hudson's River, to the utmost extent of their bounds. It was first settled by Samuel Ebsall, in Col. Nichol's time, and by him sold for six hundred pounds."

Other small plantations along the Neck to the east are named. Among them one "Belonging to George Umpan (Gommonespan), which is over against New York where there is about forty families, within which, about the middle of the neck which is here about three miles over, stands the town of Bergen, which gives name to the neck. Then again northward to the waters side, going up Hudson's River, there lies out a point of land where is a plantation and a water-mill belonging to a merchant in New York.

"Southward there is a small village of about five or six families which is commonly called the Duke's Farm. Further up is a good plantation in a neck of land almost an island, called Hobock; it did belong to a Dutch merchant, who formerly, in the Indian war, had his wife, children and servants massacred by the Indians, and his house, cattle and stock destroyed by them. It is now settled again, and a mill erected there, by one dwelling at New York.

"Up northward along the river side are the lands near to Mr. William Lawrence, which is six or seven miles further. Opposite thereto is a plantation of Mr. Ebsall, and above that Capt. Biefield's plantation, this last is almost opposite the north-west of Manhattan's Island.

"Near the mouth of the bay, upon the side of Overpeck's Creek, adjoining Hackensack River, several of the rich valleys were settled by the Dutch; and near Snake Hill is a fine plantation owned by Pinborne and Eekle, for half of which Pinborne is said to have paid five hundred pounds."

That portion of the ancient territory of Bergen known as New Barbadoes Neck was probably first settled by the Kingslands soon after the settlements above described. It is not certain that Judge William Sandford ever settled upon his patent in the northwest section of what is now Hudson County. He was presiding judge of the court at Bergen in 1673, and died some time prior to 1709, as in that year his widow, Sarah Sandford, conveyed to her friend, Katharina Van Erburgh, a portion of the estate left her by her husband, between the Passaic and Hackensack Rivers.

² This land must have been very productive. Van Der Donck says that Bout laid a wager that he could raise a crop of barley on a field containing seven morgens, which would grow so tall in every part of the field that the ears could easily be tied together above his head. Van Der Donck went to see the field of barley, and found that the straw was from six to seven feet high, and very little of it shorter.—N. Y. Hist. Soc., I. 159. Winfield's "Hist. Hud. Co.," 32.

³ N. Y. coll. MSS. I. 167.

Nathaniel Kingsland, the ancestor of the Kingsland family of New Barbadoes, purchased a large tract from Judge Sandford. His son William was the first to settle upon it, about 1690. He emigrated from the Island of Barbadoes, and built a mansion-house on what is now the Hackensack road, near the Schuylkill copper mines. William Kingsland was the father of Edmond William Kingsland, and grandfather of the late Mrs. John Arent Schuyler, Mrs. Nesbit, Mrs. Adams, and the late Gen. Kingsland, of Newark.

Edmond W. Kingsland was taken prisoner by the British during the Revolutionary war, and carried down the Passaic in his own canoe, and conveyed to the Sugar-House, in New York, where he was kept for some time. He said it was the only time in his life that he regretted having a new hat of such a kind as the one he wore; for it was a stiff beaver, and his captors amused themselves during the journey by beating him over the head with it. The Kingsland family plate was buried during the war at the foot of a pear tree near the mansion. A tankard that was hidden there is now in possession of the family. The British once made a visit to the house, and were kept out some time by the inmates who barricaded the doors and windows. At length the assaulting party threatened to break in a door where Edmond W. Kingsland was stationed. He had a pistol in each hand, and declared he would shoot the first man who attempted to enter the house. One of the party then picked up a young negro belonging to the plantation, and placing him in front, challenged Mr. Kingsland to "fire away." Not wishing to hurt one of his own servants, he desisted, but the faithful slave cried out, "Let 'm shoot, massa never mind me!" This is supposed to have occurred at the time Mr. Kingsland was taken prisoner. The English and Hessians took possession of the house and occupied it for several months. Mr. Kingsland had previously hollowed out a board in the mantel-piece and secreted his money in it, put in a block and painted it over. He found it undisturbed on his return from imprisonment.

The Kingslands were Episcopalians, and through their instrumentality the church of that faith at Belleville was founded.

A part of the Kingsland tract was purchased by Arent Schuyler about the year 1800, and contained the Schuyler copper mines, discovered by one of Capt. Schuyler's slaves. (See history of Kearny township.)

Nicholas Varlet obtained a patent of the territory in which the city of Hoboken is situated, from Petrus Stuyvesant, Feb. 5, 1663, which was confirmed by Carteret, May 12, 1668. Mr. Varlet was one of the noted men of the time in which he lived. His second wife was Anna, sister of Governor Stuyvesant, and widow of Samuel Bayard. In 1657 he was appointed commissary of imports and exports, and in 1658 became farmer of duties on exports and imports to and from New England and Virginia, was admitted to the right of "Great Burgher," and appointed searcher, inspector and commissary of the West India Company stores, in 1660 was sent with Brian Newton as ambassador to the commissioners to agree upon terms of capitulation to the English, in 1665 was commissioned captain of the militia of Bergen, Communipaw, Ahasimus and Hoboken, same day was made a member of the court at Bergen, and the year following a member of Governor Carteret's Council, and died in 1675.

Ide Cornelison Van Vorst received of Governor Stuyvesant a grant of land at Ahasimus, April 5, 1664, confirmed with an additional grant by Philip Carteret, March 13, 1668. This property, by his only son, Cornelius and from him, descended to Cornelius of the seventh generation, and is now the finest part of Jersey City.

Following is a copy of the deed of a tract of land at Communipaw, granted by the Governor and Council of New Netherlands to Jan Evertsen Bout, and subsequently sold by him to Michael Jansen:

"We, William Kieft, Governor-General and Council, under the high and mighty Lords States-General of the United Netherlands, His Highness of Orange and the Honorable the Directors of the authorized West India Company, residing in New Netherlands, make known and declare, that on this day underwritten we have given and granted Jan Evertsen Bout a piece of land lying on the North River, westward from Fort Amsterdam, before then pastured and tilled by Jan Evertse, named Gann-senepoen and Jan De Lachter's Hoek, with the meadows, as the same lay within the post and rail fence, containing eighty-four morgens.

"In testimony whereof is these by us signed, and with our seal confirmed, in Fort Amsterdam, in New Netherlands, the which land Jan Evertse took possession of Anno 1638, and began then to plow and so it."

Casper Steinmets purchased of Philip Carteret, May 12, 1668, two tracts of land and meadow near the town of Bergen. He resided at Ahasimus, and during the Indian troubles of 1655 retired to New Amsterdam. (See chapter on old Bergen town and township.)

Adrian Post obtained a patent from Governor Carteret dated, May 12, 1668, for "sundry parcels of land lying in and about the town of Bergen." He was the ancestor of the Post family in Hudson County, and had numerous descendants. The first we hear of him he was agent for Bann Vander Campellen, and in charge of his colony on Staten Island when the place was destroyed by the Indians, in 1655. In October of that year he was appointed to treat with the Hackensack Indians for the release of prisoners. He was ensign of the Bergen militia in 1673, and was the keeper of the first prison in East Jersey, the home of John Berry, in Bergen, being used for that purpose. Mr. Post died Feb. 28, 1677.

Englebert Steinhuyzen (mentioned elsewhere) received a deed of "sundry parcels of land in and about the town of Bergen" from Philip Carteret, July 22, 1670. This land comprised seven lots, amounting in all to about one hundred and fifty acres.¹

¹Winfield's "Land Titles," 91.

Harman Edewartse purchased from Petrus Stuyvesant "sundry parcels of land in and about the town of Bergen," Sept. 14, 1662. He was one of the commissioners to fortify Bergen in 1663; and, with Joseph Van der Linde, Hendrick Jans Spier, and Hendrick de Backer, June 15, 1674, petitioned the government for land on Staten Island at the mouth of the Kill Van Kull.¹

Balthazar Bayard obtained, with Nicholas Varlett, a grant of land from Philip Carteret, dated Aug. 10, 1671, "lying in and about the town of Bergen."² Bayard was a brewer, and a brother of Nicholas. He was appointed schepen, Dec. 17, 1663, and March 17, 1664; represented Bergen in the first and second General Assembly of New Jersey in 1668. Shortly after this he became a resident of New York, where he was schepen under the Dutch (New Orange) in 1673, and alderman in 1691. The lands in Bergen these patentees held as joint tenants. Varlett died before any division was made, whereupon Bayard took the land by right of survivorship.³

Tielman Van Vleck obtained a patent from Philip Carteret, dated March 25, 1670, for a grant of "sundry parcels of land near the town of Bergen." Van Vleck was a lawyer. He studied under the notary of Amsterdam, came to this country in 1658, and was admitted to practice the same year.⁴ He has the honor of having been the founder of Bergen, and was made the first Schout (sheriff) and president of the court, Sept. 5, 1661.

Hans Diedrick was granted by Philip Carteret "sundry parcels of land lying in and around the town of Bergen," May 12, 1668. Hans kept the second tavern in Bergen, he having been licensed Feb. 13, 1671, and was appointed lieutenant of the Bergen militia Sept. 4, 1673. He was also one of the patentees of Aquaackanock, May 28, 1679, and died Sept. 30, 1698. He probably left his lands to his son Wander, who died intestate Aug. 30, 1732. His children—Johannes, Garret, Cornelius, Abraham, Antje (wife of Johannes Vreeland) and Margaret Van Ruypen (widows) sold to their brother Daniel, Feb. 13, 1764, a lot called "Smith's land," seven morgens; also a lot of meadow, also the Steenhuyzen lot, and lot No. 114. They partitioned in 1755.⁵

Gerrit Gerritse was granted by Philip Carteret a patent for sundry parcels of land lying in and about the town of Bergen, May 12, 1668.

This patentee was the ancestor of the Van Wagenen family. By his will, dated Oct. 13, 1708, he gave all the land included in this patent and a preceding patent to his eldest son, Johannes. By the will of Johannes, July 24, 1752, proved Nov. 8, 1759, he gave all his lands in Bergen to his son Johannes, who was the owner in 1764.

The Secaucus patent was granted by Petrus Stuyvesant to Nicholas Varlett and Nicholas Bayard, Dec. 10, 1663, and confirmed by Philip Carteret, Oct. 30, 1667. In the deed of Carteret it recited, "The said plantation or parcel of land is esteemed or valued, according to the survey and agreement made, to contain, both of upland and meadow, the sum of two thousand acres, English measure." It comprised all the land between Pinhorn's Creek and the Cromackill Creek on the east and the Hackensack River on the west. The Indians, in 1674, claimed that their right to this land was not mentioned in their deed to Stuyvesant of 1658; that the said deed included only "Es-patingh and its dependencies," and that they were still the owners of Secaucus. The Dutch council at Fort William Hendrick settled the controversy with the Indians by making them a present of an "anker of rum." Nicholas Varlett died while the tract was in possession of the patentees, and his administrators—Mr. Edsall and Peter Stoutenburg—joined Bayard in selling it to Edward Earl, Jr., of Maryland, April 24, 1676. Earl sold to Judge William Pinborne, March 26, 1679, for five hundred pounds, one individual half of the tract, also one half of all the stock, "Christian and negro servants." The following schedule of property was annexed to the deed: One dwelling-room containing two lower rooms and a lean-to below stairs and a loft above, five tobacco-houses, one horse, one mare and two colts, eight oxen, ten cows, one bull, four yearling and seven calves, between thirty and forty hogs, four negro men, five Christian servants." This was the Pinborne plantation referred to by George Scott in his "Model of the Government of East Jersey."⁶

CHAPTER IX.

Recapture of the New Netherland by the Dutch Commanders, Everste and Beukes—Ordering the various Towns, through their Delegates, to Surrender—The Name of New Amsterdam Changed to that of New Orange—Burgomasters, Schuits and Schepens Elected and Confirmed—The Dutch again Capitulate, and leave the English in Possession—Sketches of Everste and Beukes—Capt. John Berry Fined One Hundred Guilders.

THE war which naturally followed the unauthorized seizure of New Netherland by the English in 1664, ended in a treaty of peace at Breda, 31st July, 1667, and by the protocol entered into, each power was to remain in peaceable possession of the territory captured by each respectively, which left New Netherland in possession of the English. However, this peace agreement was short-lived, as war was again declared, in March, 1672, between the States and England. The Dutch, no doubt, had at least one eye on their much-prized New Netherland, therefore dispatched a small squadron under command of Cor-nelis Evertsen, Jr., and Jacob Benekes, to cruise along the American coast for the purpose of destroying English shipping and doing what other damage they might. The forces of the two commanders were joined at Martinico, from whence they sailed with their five vessels for the Chesapeake, capturing a few vessels at or near there, and obtaining valuable information in relation to the condition of the defenses in and around what is now New York, for which place they set sail, and arrived there July 29, 1673, with a fleet of twenty-three vessels (including what they picked up on the way), and anchored in the bay. The land forces, consisting of sixteen hundred men, were under command of Capt. Anthony Colve, who took possession of the town on the day following their arrival in the bay.

Council Organized and Orders Issued.—Commanders Evertsen and Benekes, with their subordinate officers, at once organized a Council, and in a legal or military way promulgated their orders, not only to the citizens of New Amsterdam, but to those of the outlying towns, to report through their proper officers, and surrender to their High Mightinesses the Lords States-General of the United Netherlands, and his Serene Highness, the Prince of Orange.

New Orange.—The following are extracts from the proceedings of the Council, and the responses given them:

"At a Meeting of the Honorable Commanders, Cornelis Evertse and Jacob Benekes and their adjoined Council of War, in the City Hall of the City of New Orange, this 12th day of August, New Style, 1673. Present: Commander Corn. Evertse, Commander Jacob Benekes, Capt. Anthony Colve, Capt. Nicolas Boes, Capt. Abram J. Zell; John Baker, Jacob Melwyn, John Ogden, con socris, Deputies from the village of Elizabeth-town, New-work, Woodbridge and Piscataway, situate in the Province heretofore called New-Yersey, praying that they may be allowed to send some Delegates from their said villages to treat with the Admirals and associate Council of War respecting the surrender of their towns under the obedience of their High Mightinesses, the Lords States of the United Netherlands, and his Serene Highness, the Prince of Orange, and that no audience be granted to their late Governor, Capt. John Berry, before and until the same be granted to the said Delegates, etc.

"Ordered. The Petitioners, namely the inhabitants of the villages of Elizabeth Towne, Newwork, Woodbridge and Piscataway, are hereby allowed to send their Delegates hither on next Tuesday morning to treat with us. Dated at the City Hall of the City of New Orange, this 12th August, 1673.

(Signed)

"CORNELIS EVERTSE, JUN.
"JACOB BENEKES.

"By their order, (Signed) N. BAYARD, Secretary."

"It is furthermore resolved by the Admirals and Council of War, and the following order is dispatched to the three remaining villages situate in said Province of New Jersey:

"To the Inhabitants of the village of Bergen and Hamlets and Bourseries thereon depending.

"You are hereby ordered and instructed to dispatch Delegates from your village here to us, to treat with us on next Tuesday respecting the surrender of your town to the obedience of their High Mightinesses, the Lords States-General of the United Netherlands, his Serene Highness, the Prince of Orange, or on refusal so to do, we shall be obliged to constrain you thereto by the force of arms."

"Dated at the City Hall of the City of New Orange, the 12th August, Anno 1673.

(signed)

"CORNELIS EVERTSE, JUNIOR.
"JACOB BENEKES.

"By their order, (Signed) N. BAYARD, Secretary."

Similar notices were served on officers of the city of New Amsterdam and outlying towns, in the following language:

"The Commanders and Council of War have summoned the underwritten towns, and ordered them to submit to their High Mightiness, the Lord States-General of the United Netherlands and his Serene Highness, the Prince of Orange, &c., and to send hither immediately their deputies, together with their constables, slaves, and English flags, when they would, as circumstances permit, be furnished with Prince's flags instead of those of the English."

Previous to the issuance of these orders some of the towns had anticipated such a move, sent their deputies, and thus cheerfully, to all appearances, at least, submitted to the second Dutch régime.

Orders were at the same time issued to cause the inhabitants of the several towns to nominate three persons for schout, three for secretary and six for schepens, and to present them on the first opportunity to the Council, when a selection from them would be made.

"On the petition of several of the inhabitants of the respective towns who appeared before the Council, requesting that they and their plantations may be confirmed in the privileges which they obtained from their previous patrons, and furthermore possess unobstructed their houses, lands and goods, and enjoy such further privileges as are granted and accorded to all other the inhabitants of Achter Coll,² lately called New Jersey.

"Ordered thereupon:

"The petitioners shall enjoy their lawfully acquired houses, lands and goods, together with such privileges as are granted and accorded to their neighboring towns of Achter Coll. What regards the privileges obtained from their previous patrons, the same is denied the petitioners."

From the nominations or names sent in by the inhabitants of the town of Bergen, the following were by the Council of War elected for the ensuing year:

As Schout and Secretary, Claes Arentse; as Schepens, Gerrit Gerrits, Thomas Fredericks, Elias Michielse, Peter Marcelissen, Cornelius Abramse.

Oath of Office.—The following is a copy of the oath of office to be subscribed to by the burgomasters, schouts and schepens within the jurisdiction of Council of War, of commanding officer of New Orange, now New York.

"We, the Schout, Burgomasters, Schepens and Secretary of the city of New Orange (or Bergen, as the case might be), qualified by the Hon^{ble} Council of War, do promise and swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that we, each in his quality, will, according to the best of our knowledge and without passion, administer good law and justice between parties in cases brought before us; that we will promote the welfare of this city (or town) and its inhabitants: in all things defend the upright and true Christian Religion agreeably to the Word of God and the order of the Synod of Dordrecht taught in the Netherlands Church; in all circumstances obey, maintain and help to maintain the Supreme government placed, or hereafter yet to be appointed, over us in the name of their High Mightinesses the Lord States-General of the United Netherlands and his Highness of Orange, and prevent, as far as in our power lies, everything that may conflict with it. So truly help us, God."

"The newly chosen Schout, Secretary and Schepens of the Town of Midwout, Benckel, Amsfort, Urecht, Boswyck and Gravenend appear before the Council to take the oath of allegiance, which they have subscribed in form as heretofore taken by Burgomasters and Schepens.

"The Schout and Magistrates of the Town of Bergen in like manner appearing, have also taken the oath in form as aforesaid, and are further told that the Commander shall visit their town on 'Sabbath after the sermon,' in order to administer the oath of allegiance to all their people.

"On the petition of the Schout of the Town of Bergen he is permitted and allowed by the Hon^{ble} Council of W^{est} henceforth to fill and execute the office of auctioneer."

At a meeting of the commanders and honorable Council of War held Sept. 8, 1673, the following request of two of the inhabitants of Bergen was granted:

"Captain Berry and William Sandford, entering and requesting in substance that the Records and Papers of the late Province of New Yersey may, for divers reasons, be delivered to and remain in the office of the Secretary of the Government, and not with Mr. Hopkins' individually, the same is provisionally allowed them until further inquiry be made herein."

At a meeting of commanders and honorable Council of War, holden at Fort Willem Hendrik, Sept. 4, 1673, the following nominations for militia officers for the town of Bergen were presented and confirmed. For Captain, Caspar Stymmet; Lieutenant, Hans Diederichs; Ensign, Adrian Post.

"Pursuant to a resolution of the Commanders and Hon^{ble} Council of War passed August 21, 1673, proceeded on the 27th of the same month to the Town of Bergen, where the Burgers of that town and dependencies were found to amount to 78 in number, 60 of whom appeared at drum-beat and took the oath of allegiance in like form as heretofore inserted under date of 16th instant; the remainder were absent, whose oaths the magistrates were ordered to forward."

It seems that from the multiplicity of business transactions between John Berry and William Sandford, who were large land-owners in what is now the north part of Hudson County, whether as copartners or adjoining landlords does not at this time appear, became involved in some differences of opinion, and instead of using harsher means, referred the matter as follows:

"Whereas, some difference has arisen between Mr. John Berry and Mr. William Sandford, both of whom requested that it may be referred to the Court of the Schout and Magistrates of the Town of Bergen, which request being considered by the Governor, the same is for the present granted and allowed.

At a meeting of the honorable Council of War, holden in Fort Willem Hendrik, on the 18th of August, Anno 1673, (present Commander Jacob Benckes, Commander Cornelis Evertsen, Jr., Capt. Anthony Colve, Capt. Nicolaes Boes, Capt. A. F. Van Zyll), the following order was made:

"Captain John Berry,¹ William Sandford, Samuel Edsall and Lourens

¹ Mr. Hopkins was the secretary of all the towns, which answers very well to the office of county clerk. Mr. John Ogden was at the same time schout of the same town.

² John Berry removed, it is supposed, from Connecticut to New Jersey in 1669, when he and his associates obtained a grant of land near Newark, and he was appointed a magistrate of the court of Bergen and Deputy-Governor of the province in July, 1672, on the departure of Governor Cartaret for England. He administered the government until the arrival of the Dutch, in 1673. After the return of Cartaret, in 1674, he was appointed one of the Council, and so continued under the various administrations until 1692, when his name is omitted, probably in consequence of his previous death. — Whitehead.

"CAPT. JOHN BERRY, PLAINTIFF IN ALPHEI, AGAINST WILLIAM SANDFORD AND ROBERT CAS ARNISON, DEFENDANTS."

"Plaintiff complains that defendants have instituted an action against him before the Court at Bergen for carrying off some logs which he claims to be his own property, and have thereon obtained judgment, as if he had obtained those logs in a fraudulent manner by stealing, requesting for reasons more fully set forth in the petition and application for appeal that judgment of said Court, pronounced the 29th Aug. 1673, be annulled, and the plaintiff relieved from the said judgment of said Court."

"Schout Cas Arntsen appearing, answers and requests that defendant (in the Court below) be ordered to prove that they were his logs, says further, that the Court aforesaid have not condemned the plaintiff of theft, but of inconsiderate removal of the logs, without the consent of any officer, etc.

"Appellant acknowledges having rashly removed said logs without consent, thinking they were his own, requests therefore to be excused, etc."

"Governor-General and Council having heard parties, and examined and investigated the papers and documents produced on both sides, declare the appellant in the case not guilty of the suspicion of theft, yet finding that he hath gone too far in the inconsiderate removal of the logs, without having previously obtained consent to that effect, and modifying the judgment of the above-named Court, condemn the appellant herein in a fine of one hundred guilders light money with restitution of the removed logs, on valuation of arbitrators, unless he will within 5 m. be able to prove that they were his own logs, and pay the costs herein incurred."

The English Again in Possession of New Netherland.—Although the victory of the Dutch in the recapture of New Netherland was as bloodless as was that of its capture by the English, yet it was one in which they felt a national as well as individual pride. They merely took possession of that which by right belonged to them, and again set up the Dutch standard. However, this was not to continue at length, for on the 9th of February, 1674, peace was established between England and Holland, and, by the sixth article of the treaty of Westminster, New Netherland was restored to the English,⁵ and they continued in undisturbed possession from November following until the war which secured the independence of the United States of America.

On the conclusion of peace, in order to remove all grounds for objection to his title on account of the recapture by the Dutch and subsequent relinquishment to the crown,⁶ the Duke of York obtained from the King a new patent, similar to the first, dated June 29, 1674, and on July 1st Edmund Andros was appointed Governor under it,⁷ was appointed one of the Council, and so continued under the various administrations until 1692, when his name is omitted, probably in consequence of his previous death. — Whitehead.

Chalmers, in his "Annals," seems to imply that the duke was glad to avail himself of the plea afforded him by the change in the government of his territories to regain possession of New Jersey, the loss of which Governor Nicolls had so deeply deplored.¹ It may be that this was his intention for a brief period, so far as related to the government of the province, from the fact that Andros was directed to take possession of the province of New York and "its dependencies," which, in the words of his commission, included "all the land from the west side of the Connecticut River to the east side of Delaware Bay,"² although it does not appear that these directions were complied with by Andros on his arrival at New York, Oct. 31, 1674, so far as New Jersey was concerned. But on November 9th he issued a proclamation in which he expressly declared that all former grants, privileges or concessions heretofore granted, and all estates legally possessed by any under his royal highness before the late Dutch government, were thereby confirmed, and the possessors, by virtue thereof, to remain in quiet possession of their rights.³

Whatever hesitation the duke may have felt about restoring New Jersey is said to have been removed solely by his affection for Carteret, which influenced him to grant what was considered to militate against his own interest and the prosperity of New York. The pleasure of his royal brother may have had some weight with him, as it was well known that Carteret was a favorite of the King. A proof of this, given at this time, is found in a letter from Charles, bearing date the 13th of June, 1674 (before the new patent to the duke was given), confirming again the title and power of Carteret in East Jersey.⁴

On the 28th and 29th days of July, 1674, Sir George Carteret received his renewed titles from the duke, equally full as to rights and privileges,⁵ but which gave to him, individually, all the province north of a line drawn from a certain "Creek called Barnogat, to a certain creek in Delaware River next adjoining to and below a certain creek in Delaware River called Renkokus Kill," a stream south of Burlington.⁶

Governor Andros and his Council were vested with all the functions of government within the limits that have been specified, and the former's characteristic tyranny and subserviency well fitted him to exercise the power thus conferred to its full extent, to gratify his master's views of policy and interest. Conversant as he was, however, with the transactions in England subsequent to the date of his commission by which East Jersey had been transferred to others and a Governor was appointed for it, he did not presume at first to assert his authority over the province further than to empower William Dyre, collector of the duke's revenue in New York, to collect also in New Jersey the customs which his highness had thought proper to establish throughout his territories, thus imposing upon the inhabitants of a province which he had transferred to others in a full and ample manner, as it had been obtained by him, exactions which his own people of New York considered exceedingly burdensome, if not illegal, when imposed upon them.

Philip Carteret had remained in England during the occupancy of the Dutch and subsequent negotiations; but on Sir George's obtaining a new grant for East Jersey, he was commissioned as Governor, July 31, 1674, and returned to the province, bringing with him a confirmation of the alterations made in the "Concessions" on Dec. 6, 1672, and also such further regulations relative to laying out the lands, payment of quit-rents, and the obligations of the settlers, as the situation of the province required.⁷

Bergen once the Capital of East Jersey.—The unsettled state of affairs appears to have led the people of East Jersey to regard with satisfaction the return of their Governor. He published the commission and the other documents with which he was furnished, at Bergen, Nov. 6, 1674, in the presence of his Council, which was composed of Capt. John Berry, Capt. William Sandford, John Pike, Lawrence Andross, John Bishop, Sr., Robert Vanquillen and James Bollen, secretary,⁸ and commissioners from all the towns except Shrewsbury, and the internal peace of the province was in a great measure restored.

Assembly Meetings.—After the return of Governor Carteret the Assemblies met with considerable regularity each year,—the first at Elizabethtown, Nov. 5, 1675, until the 12th, and again from November 29th to December 9th, and the subsequent meetings either there or at Woodbridge, save one at Middletown in 1769. The members of the Assembly that met at Elizabethtown, Nov. 5, 1675, were Henry Lyon and Benjamin Price from Elizabethtown, Hans Dedrick and Elias Michelsen for Bergen, Thomas Johnston and Lieut. John Ward for New Worke (Newark), Samuel Davis and Thomas Bloomfield, Jr., for Woodbridge, John Gillman and Hopewell Hull for New Piscataqua, Capt. John Bound and John Throgmorton for Middletown, John Slocum and William Shattuck for Shrewsbury. Unity seems to have prevailed sufficiently for some years among the different branches of government for legislation to be had upon all subjects which the advancement of the province in population rendered requisite.

Cornelis Evertsen was the oldest son of the renowned Admiral Cornelis Evertsen, who was killed in the fight against the English, June 11, 1666. Being a captain in the navy, on the death of his father, the States of Zealand recommended that he be put in command of a ship-of-war, and on Dec. 15, 1672, he was promoted to the rank of commander of a squadron of fifteen ships of the line, with which he proceeded to the West Indies, where he captured seven and burnt five vessels and obtained a considerable booty. He afterwards destroyed sixty-five French Newfoundland traders, and sailed to Martinico, where he met Capt. Jacob Benckes, in command of four men-of-war. Having joined forces, they visited all the English and French islands, and took a ship bound to Galway. After inflicting much damage on the enemy in those islands, he sailed in 1673 to New York, then in possession of the English, which he reduced, and changed the name of the city to New Orange. By this time he had with him about twenty English prizes, captured in Virginia and elsewhere, and many prisoners. In December, 1673, he returned to Cadiz, after destroying more than eighty English and French ships and capturing New York and St. Eustatius. In 1675 he was appointed rear-admiral, in 1679 vice-admiral, in 1688 admiral, in which last capacity he commanded a squadron which accompanied William III. to England. At the engagement with the French fleet off Beachy Head, through the treachery of Admiral Torrington, who commanded the English portion of the allied fleet, he was forced to retreat to Rye Bay. Torrington was committed to the Tower, and the Dutch admiral received the thanks of the King. After a life of great activity, in which he covered himself with glory, Admiral Evertsen died in November, 1706, and was buried at Middleburgh, in St. Peter's Church.¹

Jacob Benckes, after the reduction of New York, returned to Europe, and obtained considerable reputation in the war between France and Holland, in which he commanded a squadron of thirteen ships. With these he set sail on March 16, 1676, against the French possessions in the West Indies, and arrived before the island of Cayenne on the 4th of May, attacked the place with great fury, and reduced it in a short time, after which he captured St. Martin's, and proceeded to the island of Tobago, then in the possession of the Dutch, whither he was followed, in February, 1677, by Count d'Estrees, the French admiral, who demanded the surrender of the fort. This being refused, the place was stormed and the Dutch fleet attacked. After an engagement which lasted from the break of day until night, the French were obliged to retire with considerable loss, leaving the victory to the Dutch, and M. d'Estrees returned to France, whence he was again dispatched in October and arrived in December following, with sixteen sail of the line, before Tobago. Here he landed fifteen hundred men with suitable artillery and summoned Commander Benckes, who refused to surrender. The place was soon after invested and the cannonading began on both sides. Towards noon Commander Benckes, Capt. de Montigny of the marines and other officers were about sitting down to dinner. Unfortunately, the dining-room was directly over the magazine or store where the ammunition was kept. Along the pathway leading from this store to the battery much powder was strewed by those supplying the gunners, and one of the enemy's fire-balls falling in this path, set the train on fire, and in a moment the magazine exploded, instantly killing Vice-Admiral Benckes and most of his officers.²

Thus perished, Dec. 12, 1677, in the height of a brilliant career, this brave seaman, who identified himself with our history by the reduction of New York, thus vindicating the honor of the Fatherland.

CHAPTER X.

OLD BERGEN TOWN AND TOWNSHIP.

Old Bergen Township embraced all the territory lying between the Hudson River on the east, the Hackensack River and Newark Bay on the west and the Kill Von Kuhl Creek on the south, and extended from the said creek to the north boundary line of what is now Hudson County.

Pioneer Indian Deed.—July 12, 1630, the above territory was purchased from the Indians by the director-general and Council of New Netherland for Michael Panuw, burgomaster of Amsterdam and Lord of Aechtienhoven, near Utrecht. The deed from the Indians reads as follows:

"We, Director and Council of New Netherland, residing on the Island of Manhattan and the Fort Amsterdam, under the authority of their High Mightiness the Lords States-General of the United Netherlands, and the Incorporate West India Company, at their Chamber at Amsterdam, do hereby witness and declare that on this day, the date hereof under-written, before us in their proper persons appeared and showed themselves, to wit: Aconnesaw, Tokwappo and sackwameck, inhabitants and joint owners of the lands called Hobbocan² Hackings, lying over against the aforesaid Island Manhattan, who both for themselves and rate covern, for the remaining joint owners of the same land, declared that for and in consideration of a certain quantity of merchandise which they acknowledged to have received into their own hands, power and possession before the passing of these presents, in a right, true and free ownership, have sold, transported, ceded and conveyed to and for the behoof of Mr. Michael Panuw, absent, and for whom we, as aforesaid, accept under suitable stipulations, viz: the aforesaid lands by us named Hobbocan Hackings, extending on the south side, Abaninus, eastward, the river Mauritius, and on the west side surrounded by a valley and morass through which the boundaries of said land can be seen with sufficient clearness and be distinguished, and that, with all the jurisdiction, right and equity to them, the grantors in their quality aforesaid belonging: Constituting and putting in their places and stead the already mentioned Mr. Pauw in the real and actual possession thereof, and at the same time giving full and irrevocable power, authority and special command to the said Mr. Pauw peaceably to enjoy, occupy, cultivate, have and hold the aforesaid land tanquam actor et procurator in rem suam ac propriam; and also to do with and dispose of the same as he might do with his own lands to which he has a good and lawful title; without them, the grantors, in their quality aforesaid, saving or reserving any part, right, action or authority thereunto in the least, either of ownership or jurisdiction; but altogether to the behoof as aforesaid, henceforth, forever, wholly and finally desisting, renouncing and quit-claiming, promising hereby, moreover not only to keep, maintain and fulfill this their grant, and whatever shall be done by virtue thereof, invariable and irrevocable forever, but also keep and maintain the same land against all persons free from any claim, challenge or incumbrance to be made thereon by any person; as also to cause this sale and grant to be approved of and held valid by the remaining joint owners as they are by right obligated to do all in good faith without fraud or deceit.

² Hobbocan is an Indian name signifying tobacco pipe. "Hackings," affixed to it in this deed, means land or place, thus giving us land or place of the tobacco pipe, from the stone obtained here out of which the Indians carved pipes (Winfield's "Hist. Hud. Co.," 15).

"In witness whereof these presents are confirmed with our usual signatures and with our seal thereto affixed.

"Done at the aforesaid Manhatu, in Fort Amsterdam, this 12th July, 1630."

Pavonia.—Aug. 10, 1630, this same Mr. Pauw obtained a deed from the Indians for the whole of Staten Island.

Nov. 22, 1630, Mr. Pauw also obtained another deed from the Indians¹ for the west shore of the Hudson, all the way from Communipaw to Weehawken. This purchase he gave the name of Pavonia. It is now covered by the towns of Jersey City and Hoboken. By the terms of the third article of the "Freedom and Exemption," he was to plant a colony of fifty souls on this tract within four years.

Pioneer Settler.—Just who that worthy gentleman was is still a mystery that two hundred and fifty years' time and diligent inquiry has been unable to solve. It is generally believed, however, that there was some kind of a trading post here cotemporary with or immediately succeeding the Dutch settlement, on Manhattan, about 1618. There might possibly have been a white man foolhardy enough to isolate himself on this then wild and almost barren point of land, but it is not very probable, at least at that early date. The earliest known white resident of what is now Hudson County was Michael Paulusen, or Pauluz. He was here in 1633, as DeVries visited him that year, and made the following entry in his journal: "Coming to the boat on Long Island, night came on, and the tide began to turn, so that we rowed to Pavonia. We were there received by Michael Pouluz, an officer in the service of the company." The West India Company appears at this time to have had an agent there in the interests of the proprietor or patron.

Pioneer Dwellings.—In the latter part of 1633 the company ordered the erection of two houses in Pavonia. One of them was built at Communipaw, and was afterwards owned by Jan Evertsen Bout; the other was erected at Ahasimus, and was subsequently owned by Cornelius Van Vorst.

Of the Mr. Bout above mentioned, the N. Y. Coll. MSS., vol. i. p. 432, says of him,—

"Jan Evertsen Bout, formerly in the company's service, went over the last time in the year 1634, in the ship "Eendracht," in the employment of Hon^{ble} Michael Pauw; resided at Pavonia until the year 1643, and prospered somewhat, and as the Hon^{ble} Company purchased Mr. Pauw's property, the said Jan Evertsen got on right well in its service, it having acquired Mr. Pauw's interest. And as his house and barn at Pavonia were burnt in the war, which he seems to make a pretext for his complaints, 'tis proper to observe here that the Hon^{ble} Company having paid $26,000 for Mr. Pauw's colony, made a free gift to the said Jan Evertsen long after the house was burnt, of the land whereon his house stood and of the bouwerie, which produced good wheat. Michael Jansen, that farm and a poor unfinished house, with some few cattle for $3000."

Pioneer Entertainment in Pavonia.—Cornelis Van Vorst, spoken of as living in one of the new houses at Ahasimus, must have arrived in New Netherland in 1636, probably in the employ of Mr. Pauw. No sooner had Mr. Van Vorst become settled in his new home than the dignitaries of New Amsterdam, representing both church and state, resolved to pay him a visit, as well to assure him of their distinguished consideration as to sample his newly-arrived Bordeaux.

On June 25, 1636, Wouter Van Twiller, who had been director-general for three years, and who was always "glad to taste good wine," but on whose shoulders rested the weighty cares of the New Netherland State, and Dominic Evrardus Bogardis, the old Dutch preacher, and husband of Aneke Jans, accompanied by Capt. De Vries, came over to Pavonia. Van Vorst entertained them with princely hospitality from his newly-filled wine cellar. As time passed on and the sampling of the wine was completed, the Dominic and the Governor grew warm and disputations, if not angry, with their host. The modest entry in De Vries' journal that they "had some words with the patron's commissary" plainly means that they quarreled with him. The subject of the dispute was a murder that had recently been committed in Pavonia. Although the discussion ran high, and bad blood for a while threatened the peace of the occasion, yet another bumper or two was like oil on the troubled waters, for "they eventually parted good friends." Leaving their host and his good Vrowtjie, they entered their boats and started for New Amsterdam. Van Vorst, like a good old Dutchman, determined to deepen their impression of his good will to them, and how royally the patron's representative could entertain such distinguished guests, fired a salute from a swivel² mounted on a pile in front of his house. How the reverberations of that primal salute must have rolled over the hills of Ahasimus! And what a brilliant illumination followed, to light the way of the departing guests! A spark from the gun unfortunately flew upon the roof of the house, which was thatched with reeds, set it on fire, and in half an hour the house was a mass of ruins.³

Indian Troubles—Pavonia Destroyed.—The colony of Pavonia, although it had increased in population and wealth, did not prosper. Difficulties arose between the Patroon Pauw and the directors of the company, when the latter purchased Pavonia for twenty-six thousand florins. That part of it known as Ahasimus soon became known as the West India Company's farm, which they leased to Jan Evertson Bout.

During the reckless and arbitrary policy of Director-General Kieft, from 1628 to 1646, the Indians began to be troublesome and to threaten the extermination of the colony. Traders, disregarding the exclusive privilege of the company, and actuated by a desire for gain, had unlawfully furnished the savages with arms and ammunition, which, upon the first serious provocation, became instruments for destruction in their hands, far more effective than their aboriginal bows and arrows. To hasten the impending conflict, Kieft, in 1639, resolved to exact of the Indians a tribute of maize, furs and wampum. In 1643 the storm broke out which ended in the destruction of the settlements. "Pavonia and the adjoining district suffered more than any other section of New Netherland. So thoroughly was the destruction of the settlements accomplished, that from Tappan to the Highlands of the Neversink the country was once more in the possession of its original masters." A report to the States-General says, "Every place almost is abandoned. We, wretched people, must skulk with our wives and little ones that still are left, in poverty together, by and around the fort on Manhattes, where we are not one hour safe."

These troubles kept the country in an almost disorganized condition till the close of the Indian war in the spring of 1645, when a number of tribes concluded a treaty of peace with the authorities at New Amsterdam. The war had been carried on for eighteen months, with but slight intermission, and on the return of peace the owners and tenants of farms on the west side of the Hudson River returned and rebuilt their desolated homes.

Petrus Stuyvesant arrived at Manhattan, May 11, 1647, and assumed command as director-general, and although pursuing a just and conciliatory policy towards the Indians, trouble soon broke out afresh. The shooting of an Indian girl by Hendrick Van Dyck while she was in the act of stealing fruit from his orchard in the vicinity of Fort Amsterdam was the immediate occasion or pretense for the outbreak. Sept. 15, 1647, the work of destruction again commenced, when sixty-four canoes, carrying five hundred warriors, landed, without warning, at New Amsterdam, and scattered themselves throughout the streets. Pursuing Van Dyck to the house of a neighbor, Vandiegrist, they wounded the former with an arrow, and cut down the latter with a tomahawk. "The town was aroused; the guard attacked the savages and drove them to their canoes. The Indians then crossed the river, and in the twinkling of an eye, a house at Hoboken was in flames, and all Pavonia was soon on fire. From one end of the settlement to the other the torch and tomahawk did their work. Excepting the family of Michael Jansen, at Communipaw, every man who did not seek safety in flight was killed. All the cattle were destroyed and everything burned. From Pavonia they passed over to Staten Island and laid that waste. The attack raged three days with all the fury of savage warfare. The Dutch lost one hundred and fifty in killed, one hundred and fifty carried into captivity, and over three hundred were deprived of their homes."¹

Ordinance Creating a Fortified Town.—The experience of scattered settlements having hitherto proved the difficulty of adequate protection from the attacks of the Indians, Stuyvesant, with the advice of his Council, in imitation of the plan adopted by the colonists in New England, resolved to order that henceforth the settlers should collect in close, compact villages, in situations easy of defense; and in pursuance of this purpose, issued the following "Ordinance of the Director-General and Council of New Netherland for the formation of villages, and the prohibiting straw roofs and wooden chimneys." Passed Jan 18, 1656.

"Whereas, Sad experience hath from time to time proved that, in consequence of the separate dwellings of the country people located on the Flatland in divers hoods and places, in complete opposition to Order and good intention of the Hon^{ble} Company and its government here, many murders of people, killing and destruction of cattle, and burning of Houses, have been committed and perpetrated by the Indians, natives of the Country, the most of which might have been, with God's help, prevented and avoided if the good inhabitants of this province had settled themselves together in the form of Towns, Villages and Hamlets, like our neighbors of New England, who, because of their combination and compact residences, have never been subject to such, at least not to so many and such general disasters, which have been caused, next to God's righteous chastisement, on account of our sins, by tempting the savage barbarians thereto by the separate residences of the country people; the one not being able, in time of need, to come to the assistance of the other, in consequence of the distance of the places and the impossibility of the Director-General and Council to provide each separate country-house with a guard. To this, then, besides the Murders, Damages, and the destruction of diverse People, Houses and Plantations already suffered is owing also the last, to the serious loss and lundrance of this country and the people thereof, the recovery of which it is to be apprehended and expected hereafter to lose than now and herebefore, unless the good Inhabitants are taught by their losses and those of others to be wiser and more prudent, and to allow themselves to be influenced by good law, as they are bound to, to form compact dwellings in suitable places in form and manner as will be laid down by the Director-General and Council, or by their Commissioners, when the Director-General and Council will be able to assist and maintain their subjects, with the power intrusted to them by God and the Supreme Government.

"In order that this may be the better executed and obeyed in future, the Director-General and Council aforesaid do hereby not only warn their good subjects, out likewise charge and command them to concentrate themselves, by next spring, in the form of Towns, Villages and Hamlets, so that they may be the more effectually protected, maintained and defended against all assaults and attacks of the Barbarians, by each other and by the military entrusted to the Director-General and Council; Warning all these who will, contrary hereunto, remain hereafter on their isolated plantations, that they will do so at their peril, without obtaining, in time of need, any assistance from the Director-General and Council. They shall, moreover, be fined annually the sum of 25 guilders for the behoof of the public.

Furthermore, the Director-General and Council, in order to prevent a sudden conflagration do ordain that from now henceforth no House shall be covered with Straw or Reed, nor any more Chimneys be constructed of Clayboards or Wood.

This date, resolved, resumed and enacted in the Assembly of the Director-General and Council, holden at Fort Amsterdam, in New Netherland. Dated as above. 71

This ordinance was not immediately carried into effect, owing to the reluctance of the people to abandon their old plantations and to adopt a mode of living not only novel but attended with a sacrifice which many felt ill prepared to make. The ordinance was reaffirmed the next year, and the people commanded to concentrate in villages.

Repurchase from the Indians.—Preparatory to the erection of such a settlement as the ordinance required, the director-general and Council deemed it prudent to remove all doubts as to the satisfaction of the Indian claim to the land in Pavonia, although it had been regularly purchased by Michael Pauw, the patroon, in 1630, and by him conveyed to the privileged West India Company. Accordingly, on the 30th day of January, 1658, the director-general and Council obtained from the Indians a deed, of which the following is a translation:

"This day, the date hereunder written, appeared before the Honorable Director-General, Petrus Stuyvesant, and the gentlemen of the Council of New Netherland at the council-chamber in the fort Amsterdam in New Netherland: Therinques, Wawapelack, Saghkins, Kogikonnigh, Bomakan, Memiwokan, Sames, Wewenatokwee, for themselves and in the name of Mookapes, Pejaghon, Parsaighnes and others, partners of the lands hereafter mentioned, who declare to be the right owners of the lands lying on the west side of the North River in New Netherland, beginning by the great rock above Wiehacken, and from thence cross through the lands till above the Island Siskaws, and from thence above the channel-side till Constable's Hook. And from Constable's Hook again till the aforementioned rock above Wiehacken, with all the lands, islands, channels, valleys therein comprehended, in such manner as the aforementioned parcel of lands are surrounded and encompassed by the North River, the Kill-Yan-Kill, and the aforesaid direct line from the rock, above Weehawken till above Siskakes, where it is divided by the channel. Which lands they offer absolutely to sell unto the directors-general and council, upon which the General and Council on the one side and the aforesaid Indians for themselves and them that are absent have accorded and agreed in the manner following, in the presence of the here after mentioned Christian and Indian witnesses.

The aforesaid Indians acknowledge to have sold, resigned and transported, as they do, by these presents, all the lands heretofore mentioned, to the aforesaid Director-General and Council, and their successors, for eighty fathoms of wampum, two blankets, one double Kettle, and one half barrel of strong beer. Which effects they hereby acknowledge to have enjoyed and received before the passing and signing of this

Wherefore they do declare, for themselves and them which are absent to resign and transport the lands before mentioned, to the above mentioned General and Council, in a full, free, and perfect propriety, desisting of all actions and claims, which they could or might pretend, to the lands before mentioned—the transporters promise now or hereafter, not to make any pretensions thereon; but to keep and hold this transport, firm, sure and inviolable. Promising also, to the said Director and Council, to free and warrant the said lands against all claims any other Indians might pretend to, and if it should happen that in future times any of the Dutch by any Indians, should be damaged on pretention they were not fully paid for the lands aforesaid, they the sellers do promise to repair and satisfy the damages. It is also stipulated and agreed, the aforesaid Indians shall depart and remove by the first convenient opportunity, off the lands aforesaid, and that none of their nation shall come and continue to dwell upon upon it, without knowledge and consent of the Director General and Council. This done at the Fort Amsterdam, and signed with the marks of the Indians after the cargoes were delivered to their hands, the 30th day of January, Anno Domino, 1658."

This deed conveyed all of the present Hudson County lying east of the Hackensack River and Newark Bay, and comprised the territory of the old township of Bergen.

Settlement of Bergen Village.—A petition was signed Jan. 22, 1658, by the following-named persons, farmers, who had been driven away by the Indians, to wit,—Michael Jansen, Claus Jansen Backer, Claes Pietersen Vos, Jans Captain, Dirck Seiken, Dirck Claesen, and Lysbert Tysen, was presented to the director-general and Council, setting forth that they "should incline to reoccupy their former spots of residence, to restore their buildings and cultivate their former fields," and praying that, in view of the injuries and losses which they had sustained, they might be favored "by an exemption of tithes and other burthens during a few years." The exemption was granted for a period of six years; but the director-general and Council were firm in demanding that they should "concentrate themselves in a village, at least ten or twelve families together, to become in future more secure and easier to receive aid for their defense in similar disastrous occurrences; without which the Director-General and Council deem the reoccupation of the deserted fields too perilous; if it might, nevertheless, happen contrary to their order and placard, the Director-General and Council consider themselves not only excused, but declare that the aforesaid concession, or exemption during six years, shall be null and void."¹

No village had yet been located. But on the 1st day of March, 1660, Tielman Van Vleck and Peter Rudolphus sought permission "to settle on the maize land behind Gomoenpaen." This request, as well as a second petition which followed it, was refused, and the matter was dropped till August 16th of the same year, when a petition of "several inhabitants" was granted:

"Provided, that the village shall be founded and placed on a convenient spot, which may be defended with ease, which shall be selected by the Director-General and Council or their Commissioners.

"Secondly, that all persons who apply shall share with others by lot, shall be obliged to make a beginning within the time of six weeks after the drawing of lots, and to send hither at least one person able to bear and handle arms, and to keep him there, upon a penalty of forfeiting their right, besides an amende of twenty florins, in behalf of the village, and to pay besides his share in all the village taxes which during his absence have been decreed and levied."

The precise date of laying out the village is not definitely known; however, Van Vleck may justly be regarded as the founder of Bergen. He came originally from Bremen, studied under a notary in Amsterdam, came to this country about 1658, and was admitted to practice the same year. He was made the first schout and president of the court of Bergen, Sept. 5, 1661, and after the capture of the country by the English he returned to New York, and resided there in 1671.²

Bergen Named.—Up to 1660 it is manifest that the present "Jersey City Heights" were without a name and without a white inhabitant. The place was merely described as "behind Gomoenpaen." There was a small clearing about where Montgomery Street crosses Bergen Avenue, but it is probable that it had been made by the Indians, as it was known as the "Indian cornfields," or "Maize land," and, after the village was established, as the "old Maize land." If the reader will keep in mind the date of the petition and permission to form a village, Aug. 16, 1660, we will get very close to the date of the foundation of the village of Bergen. In a survey of a lot for Douwe Harmensen, in November, 1660 (the day of the month is not given in the return of the survey), the land is described as being "Oatrent hot dorp Berghen in't nieuwe maiz land," (near the village of Bergen in the new Maize land.) This particular lot, in the description of which the name first occurs, lay "in the rear of Christian Pirtesse's land, in breadth twenty rods along from the crepple bush to the kill," and is lot numbered seventy-nine on the field map, and is now, in part at least, owned by the Marion Building Company at West End.³

This survey is conclusive proof that the village then existed and had a name, and beyond all doubt its position was selected, the village surveyed and laid out, and a name given to it between the 16th of August and some time in November, 1660.

Many conjectures have been indulged in and somewhat has been written as to when and by whom Bergen was founded, and as to the origin of the name. Writers have generally followed Smith in his suppositions that the Danes had assisted the Dutch in its settlement, and that its name was in honor of the capital of Norway. Mr. Whitehead (East Jersey, 16) says it was commenced about 1618, and indorses Smith's origin of the name. Dr. Taylor, in his Annals, 45, holds the same opinion, except as to the derivation of the name. Being more of a Dutchman than a Dane, he holds to the probability that the name came from Bergen-op-Zoom, a town in Holland. In the New Jersey Historical Collections, 226, it is said that Bergen is the oldest village in New Jersey, presumed to have been founded about 1616, and to have received its name from Bergen in Norway. Gordon, in his "History of New Jersey," 7, presumes that between 1617 and 1620 a settlement was made at Bergen, and the name taken from the capital of Norway. Mulford's "History of New Jersey," 41, indorses this view. Sypher and Apgar, "History of New Jersey," 10, with a bold, if not ingenious, originality, say that Hudson's men (!) made small settlements at Bergen as early as 1617, clearly showing that the authors did not know what they were writing about. Yet this work of Sypher and Apgar is designed for a text-book in our schools! The question arises, 1st. By whom was it settled?

From a careful examination of the names of the original settlers, not only of the village of Bergen, but of the Colonie of Pavonia, and after an earnest endeavour to ascertain whence they came, it must be conclusive that the settlement was made by Hollanders (or, perhaps, more properly speaking, Netherlanders), Danes, Swedes, and Norwegians. Of these were more Netherlanders than of all the others combined. Oldmixon, while intimating a probability that the Danes settled, admits that "the Dutch, always industrious in trade, worked them so far out of it that Berghen, the northern part of New Jersey, was almost entirely planted by Hollanders."—British Empire, i. 283.

It may be proper to mention here a statement found in "Pictures of New York," 10: "It was the custom of the Dutch West India Company to grant land to those who have served out the time they had contracted for with the company. Hence, Bergen and Communipaw and several other places were settled by disbanded soldiers; and it is remarkable that the inhabitants of those places retain their ancient manner of living and the very disposition of soldiers, especially the old men still living and their descendants, seen that the two supposed godfathers of our Bergen received their names from local circumstances. Are not the same circumstances existing here to give the same name to the new village? On two sides of the hill was marsh, and the only other place for settlement was along the river. To the eye of the Hollander, accustomed to look upon marshes or low land redeemed from the sea, the ridge growing in height as it extended north from the Kill Von Kull was no mean affair. To him it was Bergeu, the Hill, and like the places of the same name in Europe, it took its name from the hill on which it was built.

There is another possible derivation, which it is proper to mention, without adopting it. Stuyvesant directed the village to be located on some spot easy of seem most of them to follow their footsteps." Carrying the idea of the military settlement still further, it is said among the soldiers of Stuyvesant, who were transplanted to Bergen, were some of the Moorish race, whose peculiar complexion, physiognomy and characteristics are, it is alleged, yet to be traced in their descendants—the swarthy complexion, the sharp, dark eye and curling black hair, so opposite to the ruddy color, the light eye and fair hair of the Hollander.—N. J. Hist. Soc. Proc. 1845—46, 48.

21. As to the name.

Bergen in Norway received its name from the hills which almost surrounded it. Bergen-op-Zoom, eighteen miles north of Antwerp stands on a hill surrounded by low, marshy ground, which with its fortifications, afforded great security. Thus it will be defense. The motive—in fact, the primary thought—which necessity suggested in the formation of the village was safety. The settlers were driven to it as a city of refuge from the savage foe. In the Dutch language the verb bergen means to "save," probably derived from berg, a hill, which in case of attack is a place of safety. Very appropriate and very beautiful! —Winfield's Hist. of Hud. Co.

Beautiful for situation, easily defended, and surrounded by good farm lands, the new village was soon in a flourishing condition. It was laid out in a square, the sides of which were eight hundred feet long, with two streets crossing each other at right angles in the centre,¹ and a street around the whole plot. Along the exterior of this surrounding street palisades were erected before April, 1661, to secure the place from the attacks of the Indians. In the centre of the plot where the streets intersected was a public plot of about one hundred and sixty feet by two hundred and twenty-five feet. These streets quartered the town, and each quarter was divided into eight building lots, but by some manipulation the east quarter was made to contain, in 1764, nine lots, and the north quarter only seven lots. The map inserted is copied from the field map found in Winfield's "History of Hudson County," and no doubt correctly shows the town plot as originally laid out, the shape of the lots and the general features of Buyten Tuyn.

On the side of the town where the cross-streets come to the palisades were gates, called the north-east gate, northwest gate, etc., through which were roads leading into the wood.

The beauty and general desirableness of the situation, the fear of the Indians, the stringent orders of the director-general, and the advantages of the new settlement caused the village to grow so rapidly, that in May, 1661, not an unoccupied lot remained inside the fortifications.—Winfield's Hist. of Hud. Co.

The buildings first erected were of logs, and at least the barns covered with reeds, in spite of the director's orders. "In a lease dated April 1, 1661, from Guert Coerten to Jacob Luby, of a 'lot on Gweykonck, otherwise called the Maize land, being No. 16,' we learn that the town had already passed an ordinance or made an order that the lots should be fenced. The lease provided for the construction of a house thirty feet long, and a barn fifty feet long to be built along the palisades of the village. The lessee was to cut and smooth the timber and haul it, as also the reeds to cover it. In March the lessor was to deliver on the land a plow and a wagon against the harvest following, for their joint use. He was also to provide the lessee on halves with two young cows and two three-year-old oxen, on half risk, and in the following spring two more young cows and two oxen. The lease was for six years. Rent for the first two years, fifteen pounds of butter from each cow; for the last four years, two hundred guilders in coin or good wampum. This was the first lease of a lot within the town of Bergen, and gives us an idea of the currency then in use."

The land within the village plot was laid out in lots by Jacques Cortelyou, the sworn surveyor, and numbered. This Cortelyou was the first surveyor in New Amsterdam, and made the first map of that city in 1656, and there is no doubt he laid out the town of Bergen and surveyed the adjoining plantations. He was the town surveyor after the country was in possession of the English, and died in 1693, leaving three sons and two daughters.

These lots adjoining the town were called "Buyten Tuyn," outside gardens, a name which they retain to the present time. In like manner the salt meadow on the Hackensack, when it did not pass with the upland as one lot, was mapped and numbered. But few of these numbers have been discovered, yet enough to make one regret that the map, the distribution and the ownership of the lots in Bergen and Buyten Tuyn have not been found. An old historian says, "the manner of laying out originally is singular, but small lots where their dwellings are, and these contiguous in the town of Bergen. Their plantations, which they occupy for a livelihood, are at a distance; the reason of fixing them thus is said to be through fear of the numerous Indians in the early times of their settlement."

Bergen Chartered.—The village grew rapidly, and in one year it had become of sufficient importance to merit a local government. Up to that time, (1661) the Court of Burgomasters and Schepens in New Amsterdam had, since its organization in 1652, exercised legal jurisdiction on the west side of the river, henceforward matters in controversy here were to be decided by a local court, subject to the right of appeal to the director-general and Council.

Aug. 4, 1661, Tieleman Van Vleeck was, at his own request, appointed schout of the Nieuwe dorp op't mainland, though his commission was dated a month later, as follows:

COMMISSION OF TIELEMAN VAN VLEECK TO BE SHERIFF OF BERGEN (N. J.).
"The 5th of September 1661.

"Petrus Stuyvesant, in behalf of their High Might, the Lords States-General of the United Netherlands and the Noble Lords-Directors of the Privileged West India Company, Director-General of New Netherland, Curaçao, Aruba, Bonaire and dependencies with the Honorable Council Greeting.

"Know ye, Whereas for the promotion of justice in the village of Bergen, situate on the west side of the North River of New Netherland a suitable person is required, to attend there to the duties of the Schout's office, for which place one Tieleman van Vleeck, Notary public in this city, has been proposed, Therefore we have, considering in his ability, piety and good part appointed and commissioned, as we hereby appoint and commission the same to be Schout of the aforesaid village, to hold, have charge of and serve in the said office at the aforesaid place and the district thereof, pursuant to the instructions, which he has a ready received or may hereafter receive, to bring justice accordingly all breakers of all penal, civil and criminal laws, ordinances and placards, to see, execute and punish them with the punishments expressed therein, to demand that upon his direction and accusation all criminal matters and abuses shall be corrected and alated and all sentences speedily and without delay be executed and to do further, what a good and faithful Schout is bound to do in this regard, on the oath taken by him. We charge therefore the Schepens and inhabitants in the district of the aforesaid village to acknowledge the said Tieleman van Vleeck as our officer and Schout, as aforesaid, and to give and cause to be given to him, upon request, all necessary and possible assistance in the discharge of his duties for we have concluded, that this is necessary for the service of the Hon^{ble} Company and the promotion of justice. Thus done at the meeting of the Noble Director-General and Council, held at Fort Amsterdam in New Netherland, the 5th of September A^o 1661.—N. J. Hist. Soc. Archives.

and highly necessary that a Pond Well be constructed for the public use, immediately at the place to Water the Cattle.

 HERMAN SMEEMAN
 CASPAR STEINMETS
 MICHAEL JANSEN

This ordinance was ratified by the Director-general and Council of New Netherland at New Amsterdam, Feb. 9, 1662.

Under the above law a well was dug in the centre of the square, and troughs were placed around it for the cattle, and a long sweep used for raising the water. The well continued in use until within the present century, when it was covered over, and a liberty pole placed in it. This pole was taken down in the autumn of 1870 when the square was paved, and all traces of the well disappeared. The destruction of this old well was almost a sacrilege. Its associations and its memories should have pleaded "like angels trumpet-tongued against the deep damnation of" its filling up. Perhaps in no other country or State would such an outrage have been attempted.

Among other annoyances which arose in the government of the village was the lack of men necessary for its protection. It was laid out in the woods, and surrounded by unreliable Indians. Several of the lots in the town had been taken by people living in New Amsterdam, who neither came to reside nor sent men to do their part in the defense of the place, as was required by the charter. In all communities where one member shirks a duty the other members are forced to bear unjust burdens. Those who resided in the town were obliged to contribute to its defense for their own safety, and thus protected the property of non-residents while securing their own. They felt this to be unjust, and their complaints to the authorities called forth the following ordinance, passed Nov. 15, 1663:

"ORDINANCE.

"On the repeated Complaints of the majority of the Inhabitants of the Village of Bergen, that some Continue to neglect to occupy the Lots they obtained in said Village, and to keep thereon a man fit to bear arms, and that some absent themselves without providing their Watch, whereby the people of said Village are so much fatigued that they cannot any longer stand at their posts, and are unwilling to go any further on guard, unless the others who have vacant Lots keep for the guard one man with them for each Lot, the Director-general and Council, in order to prevent this confusion, resolve that all those who claim any Lots in the aforesaid Village shall, within 24 hours after the service hereof, furnish and continually maintain for each Lot, one man able to bear arms and to keep watch and ward, in pain of having the Lots with the Land thereunto appertaining, as surveyed by the Surveyer, immediately given and granted in property to others. Let every one be hereby warned for the last time."

Communipaw in 1660.—Communipaw was exempt from the general order that the people should remove to the new village of Bergen, as it was the intention of the director-general to establish a village at that place; also Jacques Cortelyu was ordered, Sept. 8, 1660, to survey "Gemeenepla," and lay it out into village lots. The lots thus surveyed fronted on the bay, and had a depth of about two hundred feet and extended from what is now Communipaw Avenue on the north to the Bay Shore House on the south. Within this small territory the village was erected and defenses set up against the attack of the Indians. But the settlers did not all lend a willing hand to erect the defenses. Some of them were too willing that others should do all the work and bear all the expense, satisfied that their individual interests would be secured in the general protection. To those who were willing to perform their duty would not submit, and the 10th day of February, 1661, Tielman Van Vleck, for himself and in the name of Michael Jansen, Casper Steinmets and Harman Smeeman, presented a petition "that it might please the Director-General and Council to issue their orders with regard to the palisading of the new village of Gemeenepla, so that it may be unanimously undertaken, and that all persons be commanded to use the newly laid out wagon road, and by no other.

On this petition the apostille was,—

"The persons named in this petition are authorized to promote as well the palisading of the village as that of the land, so, as they consider the situation of the place and time, shall do so proper, carefully observing that the palisades which are used are of a due length and thickness, viz. between six and seven feet above the ground, and to communicate this to the Inhabitants of the Village by affixed billets, commanding them, upon an amount of two £ shillings, to be paid in behalf of the village by such one who, at the determined day, shall be found to have neglected the one or the other part of his duty. What regards the wagon road, this may be delayed to a more favorable opportunity. In the day as above.

The palisading seems not to have been done very well, or not done at all, as we find by the following extract from "Col. Sett. on Hud. Riv.":

"Monday, the 18th of June 1661.

"Present: Council their Honors Director-General Petrus Stuyvesant and Counciler Nicolaus de Sille.

"They intended to the verbal request of Harman Smeeman, Nicholas Backe and Fytje Harman, Widow of Michiel Jansen, to enquire in consideration of those dangerous times their settlement at Gemeenepla with long palisades for the safety of their houses and barns and that for this purpose one as well as the other should be compelled to contribute pro rata. The Director-general and Council praise and approve the request and appoint herewith as commissioners to hasten this necessary work Gerrit Gerritsen, Harman Smeeman and Pieter Claes, ordering and empowering them, to compel every inhabitant to contribute, as they shall judge it equitable and in proportion to the area and location of the lands and lots. Date as above.

Some of the Pioneer Officers of Bergen.—It would be a pleasure to trace the lineage of the old pioneers who formed the first court of Bergen, but, unfortunately, nothing has been left on record, or at least within our reach, that would give us a clue to their parentage or business career, with the exception of the very few who are here mentioned.

HARMAN SMEEMAN was born in 1624, at Iserlow, a town in the county of Mark, Westphalia. His arrival here was at an early date. In 1645 he married Elizabeth Everts, and, she dying, he married Jarent Dircksen's widow. In 1657 he purchased of Michael Jansen a farm at "Gemoenepe" for nine hundred florins, but where the same was situated has not been ascertained. In the same year he was admitted to the rights of a small burgher, and when the settlers were permitted to return to Pavonia, he settled on his farm. In 1663 he was one of the three commissioners to fortify "Gemoenepe," and received fifty pounds of powder for its defense. When, in 1664, Governor Stuyvesant summoned a "Landtag," to consider the state of the provinces, Smeeman and Engelbert Steenhuysen were selected to represent Bergen. He was reappointed sehopen in December, 1663. He seems to have been fond of the sports of his day, and with but little reverence for the Sabbath, for on that day, Feb. 8, 1664, he engaged in the sport of Pulling the Goose. Vanderkemp says this was a game among the farmers in Gelderland and on the borders of the Rhine. A goose was fastened by a rope between two poles, the neck and head greased with oil or soap. They who entered the list drove at a full gallop, and usually they fell when they missed their goose. He who carried off the goose was called king for that festival. Smeeman was, however, quite a man in the pioneer days of old Bergen.

CASPER STEINMETS.—At what time he came to this country does not appear. In the spring of 1652, having lost his first wife, he married Jannekin Gerrits, of Zutphen, probably living at Harsimus at that time. For his third wife he married Tryntje, the widow of Jacob Stoffelsen and former widow of Jacob Walingen Van Horn (Winfield's "Land Titles," 81). He resided at Harsimus, and was driven out by the Indians in 1655. He then went to New Amsterdam, where, on Feb. 22, 1656, he was licensed to tap beer and wine for the accommodation of the burghery and strangers (New Amst. Rec., ii. 85). He was admitted to the rights of a small burgher April 11, 1657 (New Neth. Reg., 175). June 21, 1657, he was appointed lieutenant of the Bergen militia (N. Y. Coll. MSS., x. 149), and on the 4th of September, 1673, was made a captain (Coll. Hist. of N. Y., ii. 597). In 1674 he was a deputy from Bergen in the Council of New Orange (Ibid., 702), and a representative from Bergen in the first and second General Assembly in New Jersey (Leaning and Spicer, 77, 85). After his marriage with Stoffelsen's widow he took possession of the West India company's farm at Harsimus, and, as was always the case with possessors of that farm, became involved in trouble with his neighbors,—Van Vorst and others (Coll. Hist. of N. Y., ii. 704, 716). He died in 1702, leaving numerous descendants in this county, who have all died out (Winfield's "Hist. Hud. Co.," 76).

CLAES ARENTSE TOERS.—When or where he was born is not now known. He was appointed coroner of Bergen County, having been appointed Dec. 6, 1683, and was the second person to hold that office in the county. It was at his house in Bergen that Knatsicoan, an Indian, attempted to murder his brother, Jan Arentse Toers, April 11, 1678, for which the Indians bound themselves to pay one hundred fathoms of white wampum or an equivalent in skins, within twenty days (Winfield, 81).

ENGELBERT STEENHUYSEN, schoolmaster, was a tailor by trade, and came from Soest, the second city in Westphalia, arrived at New Amsterdam in the ship "Moesman," of which Jacob Jansen was skipper, April 25, 1659, paying for his fare and freight thirty-six florins (Alb. Rec., viii. 434). With Herman Smeeman he represented Bergen in the Landtag; in 1664 (Broadhead, i. 729). He has the honor of being the first schoolmaster in Bergen, having been licensed Oct. 6, 1662 (New Neth. Reg., 133, Winfield, 82).

THOMAS FREDERICKS DE CUYPER was another of the schepens of Bergen. He is said to have been a wood-sawyer, and was admitted to the rights of a small burgher April 12, 1657 (Winfield, 84).

PETER MARCELLIJSSEN came from Brest, in the ship "Beaver;" arrived May 9, 1661, with his wife, four children and two servants. His children were aged respectively thirteen, six, four and two years. His servants were a male and female. The passage cost him as follows: For himself, 36 florins; for wife, 36 florins; children, 90 florins; servants, 70 florins. He was the founder of the Merceles family in this county and vicinity (Winfield, 84).

CHAPTER XI.

Bergen Rechartered.—In 1664, by virtue of full power from Lord John Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, on the 10th of February, Philip Carteret was appointed Governor of the then province of New Jersey, and by their concessions of the 10th of February, 1664, authorizing the said Governor of the province and his Council to make grants of land subject to such rents and reservations as might be proper, said Philip Carteret and his Council did, on the 22d day of September, 1668, make, execute and grant to the town and freeholders of Bergen a charter or deed of lands and privileges. The boundaries of the same are thus described:

"The bounds and limits of the aforesaid corporation of Bergen is to begin at the North end thereof, from a place called Mordavis' Meadow, lying upon the West side of Hudson's River; from thence to run upon a S. W. line, by a three-rail fence that is now standing, to a place called Esquatin, and from thence to a little creek surrounding S. W., till it come into Hackensack River, containing in breadth from the top of the hill one and a half miles, or one hundred and twenty chains. From thence it runs along the Hackensack River upon a S 8 W line till it comes to the point or neck of land that is over against Staten Island and Shouler's Island in Arthur Cull Bay, containing in length about twelve miles. From thence it runs eastward along the river called Kill Van Kull that parts Staten Island from the main to a point or neck of land called Unstable's Point or Unstable's Hook, and from thence it runs up Northward all along the bay up into Hudson's River till it comes to Merdax's Meadow aforesaid, so that the whole tract of upland and meadow properly belonging to the jurisdiction of said town and corporation of Bergen is bounded at the North by a tract of land belonging to Captain Nicholas Varlet and Mr Samuel Edmott, on the East side by Hudson's River, on the South end by Kill Van Kull that parts Staten Island and the main, and on the West side by Arthur Cull Bay and Hackensack River. The whole, both upland, meadow and waste land, containing according to the survey eleven thousand five hundred and twenty acres English measure.

The second article of the charter requires a payment to the lords proprietors, or to their heirs or successors, or receiver-general, of fifteen pounds sterling for the whole tract, in lieu of the half-penny per acre mentioned in the concessions; payment to begin March 25, 1670.

The sixth and seventh articles relate to schools and churches.

The fourteenth article empowers the corporation to erect and ordain courts for the trial of all causes actionable between party and party, from whence no appeal could be taken, under five pounds sterling; also for the trial of criminal causes. The court was to consist of a president, who was to be a justice of the peace, and of the magistrate, or any two of them, a clerk and such other officers as the court may appoint.

The Township made a Body Corporate.—Under this charter the government of the township was maintained until the 14th day of January, in the twelfth year of the reign of Queen Anne, A.D., 1714, Robert Hunter being then Governor-in-chief of the province of New Jersey, when a petition from Andrew Van Buskirk, Barrent Christian, Enoch Freeland, Rutt Van Horne, Hendrick Cuyper, Winder Droerich and John Deveriechs, being freeholders in behalf of themselves and the other freeholders of the town, setting forth the previous possession and enjoyments of their ancestors of divers lands, tenements, hereditaments, and their exercise of divers privileges and immunities, by virtue of the above-named charter, and that many of the lands were lying undivided, and were subject to great damage and waste of wood, and that by said charter sufficient authority was not given to prevent such damage, as well as for other purposes, relief was needed from the government. An act was passed of that date, Sept. 22, 1668, in the reign of Queen Anne, giving the petitioners a new charter as a community or township, or body corporate or politic, by the name of "the trustees of the freeholders, inhabitants of the Township of Bergen," with more extensive powers.

By this authority they were declared a body corporate and politic, "with power to sue and be sued, to purchase, have, take, receive and enjoy, to them and their successors forever, the use of the freeholders, inhabitants of the township of Bergen, lands, tenements, messuages, rents, privileges and other hereditaments, of whatsoever nature, kind and quality they be, in fee and perpetuity; as also to give, grant, bargain, sell, let and dispose of any of the land belonging or appertaining to the said community, and as yet unappropriated, either for one, two or three lives, for a term of years or in fee, to make all such prudential rules and orders for the improvement, preservation and defense of said lands to have a common seal; to choose two constables, one overseer of the poor and two overseers of the highways; the said corporation yielding, rendering and paying therefor, unto them, their heirs and successors, or to the collector-general of the said province, for the time being, yearly and every year, on the first day of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, an acknowledgment of the said privileges, the annual rent of five shillings, in lieu and stead of all other rents, services, dues, duties and demands whatsoever for the same."

Undivided Lands Occupied in Common.—Under the foregoing charter, confirmatory of previous grants and privileges, the interests of the township were somewhat better cared for. Nevertheless, difficulties were arising among the patentees claiming an interest in the common lands (so called because held in common and actually used in common) in regard to the cutting of timber, and in many instances, encroachments on said common lands by the occupancy of portions of the same by individual freeholders, until it became an extensive grievance and the occasion of disagreements among them. The extent of this difficulty is illustrated by an instrument in writing, formally executed by no less than thirty-one of the actual freeholders, all being inhabitants of the township, on the 16th day of June, in the sixteenth year of the reign of King George the Second, Anno Domini 1741, in which the said persons say that "since the making of the said charter (that of Carteret) and grant sundry of the said freeholders have at sundry times surveyed, taken and used, and improved to their own use and benefit, sundry lots, pieces and parcels of the common and undivided lands within said township and corporation, without any warrant, power and authority for so doing, and without the consent of the major part of the freeholders of the said township, for that purpose first had and obtained, and have used and enjoyed the same with their patented lands, by means whereof it is not known how much of the said commons have been taken in by the said freeholders, nor can the same be found out or discovered without a particular survey of such patents, to which such common lands have been taken in and added to. Wherefore said parties have agreed as followeth":

COMMON LANDS SURVEYED BY AGREEMENT.

"It is agreed by and between all and every the parties to these presents that whatsoever part of the common and undivided lands have been by them, or either of them, at any time heretofore taken up, used or claimed, and added to their patented or purchased lands, shall forever hereafter be deemed taken and adjudged, and shall remain and continue in common till a division be made of the said common and undivided lands."

They then agree to a survey to be made by Cornelius Corson, who was to survey the several patents within eight months from the date of this instrument.

They next bind themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators to produce to said surveyor their several deeds, grants and writings, by which they hold their respective farms, and in no way to obstruct the said surveyor; and that each one pay for the survey of his own tract or grants.

Next, they, for the better preservation of the timber and wood, bind themselves not to cut, or cause to be cut, any more wood or timber than each one may need for necessary building, repairs, fencing and fire-wood for him and themselves only.

Finally, for the faithful performance of these articles, they individually bind themselves in the penal sum of one hundred pounds proclamation money of New Jersey, to be forfeited and paid by any party breaking the agreement.

The persons signing the document were

Commissioners Appointed to Divide Lands.—Notwithstanding this agreement, and which may have been to some extent carried out, other difficulties were occurring, and no satisfactory adjustment was effected until Dec. 7, 1763, when the Governor, the Council and General Assembly of the colony passed " An Act appointing Commissioners for finally settling and determining the several rights, titles and claims to the common lands in the township of Bergen, and for making a partition thereof, in just and equitable proportions among those who shall be adjudged by the said commissioners, to be entitled to the same."

The first section of this act recites the claims of the parties under the charter of Philip Carteret of Sept. 22, 1668, in which the limits or boundaries of the township are recited and the powers granted thereby, especially as to the dividing of the lands within the township not at that date already appropriated; "And that Letters Patent of her Majesty Queen Anne, dated 14th of January, in the 12th year of her reign, were issued, confirming said corporation of the said township of Bergen, and said Letters Patent were confirmed by an act of the Governor, Council and General Assembly of the Colony, passed Jan. 29,

1713, entitled 'An Act for the confirmation of a patent or charter granted by his Excellency, Robert Hunter, Esq., Captain-General and Governor-in-chief in and over the provinces of New Jersey and New York, as well as for settling the claims to the commons, as the respective portions in which the same ought to be divided.'

"That by reason of the undivided state of the said commons, great and unnecessary waste is committed by destroying the timber growing thereon—By which means, if the same be not prevented by a speedy partition of said commons, they will be rendered of little value, and the township of Bergen be reduced to great distress for want of timber and fuel. The petitioners therefore pray for relief in the premises."

The second section enacts that "Jacob Spicer, of Cape May; Charles Clinton, of Ulster County; William Donaldson and Azariah Dunham, of New Brunswick; John Berrian, of Rocky Hill; Samuel Willis, of Long Island, and Abraham Clark, Esq., of Elizabethtown, be and hereby are appointed Commissioners for making partition of the common lands of the township, and are authorized and required to divide the same in the manner hereafter directed."

Lands, How Divided.—The commissioners were required to give notice previous to any public partition of said lands, in the New York Gazette and Mercury, of the time and place when and where they would meet to survey, run out, and ascertain as well the bounds and limits of the township as the bounds and limits of each and every patent and grant within the township, with power to go, with all necessary attendants and implements, upon and across any lands or meadows to make their survey, which said survey of the township, and the several patents or grants contained within the bounds and limits thereof, when made, should include all persons whomsoever claiming under the said township of Bergen, or any patent or patents, grant or grants contained within the bounds or limits thereof.

After the foregoing survey was completed, they were to set apart so much of the common lands as would be sufficient to defray the charges of making a general partition of the common lands, and lay out and allot to such of the several patents or grants within the township as they should judge to be entitled to the same such proportion of said common lands as they shall judge right, "having regard to the right and allotment due to the Church and Free Schools, as in said charter specified."

The act then refers to the claims of the inhabitants to a large part of the common lands, by virtue of a purchase from the Indians, of date of Jan. 30, 1658, and a patent or grant from Governor Stuyvesant in 1661, and that divers disputes and controversies have arisen and may arise.

Therefore, for settling and determining the same, it was enacted "that the said commissioners shall, and hereby are authorized and required in a summary manner to hear and finally determine, according to their discretion, the said claims of the said inhabitants being free-holders, which determination shall be final and conclude all persons whomsoever."

Field-Books and Maps to be Signed and Filed.—Other provisions of this act need not be referred to here, excepting that these commissioners were to cause two several field-books and maps to be made, both of the general and each particular partition and division, and to whom allotted, the said field-books to be signed by the commissioners and their surveyor or surveyors; one of said maps and field-books to be filed in the secretary's office at Perth Amboy, the other to be filed in the office of the clerk of the county of Bergen, to remain and be kept as evidence, and are made conclusive evidence of such partition, which said partitions and divisions, and each and every one of them, shall be and is declared good and valid in law to divide and separate said lands.

In due season the commissioners executed their commission. The field-books and maps were made in duplicate, and filed in the two offices respectively. The one remains in the office of the clerk of the present county of Bergen; the other, by special act of the Legislature of New Jersey, has been transferred to the office of the clerk of the present county of Hudson, of which county this ancient township constitutes almost the whole territory.

This was a noble act, craved by the good citizens of the township, that divisions and controversies might be ended, and harmonious action take the place of feuds and strifes. No one now pretends for title beyond the field-books of these commissioners.

CHAPTER XII.

Organization of Hudson County—Building and Dedication of Court-House—Other County Buildings—Population of the County.

The courts were continued to be held in the Lyceum Hall until Sept. 19, 1843, when the Board of Chosen Freeholders having accepted the "Newkirk House," at the Five Corners, as a court-house, the courts were opened there on Sept. 20, 1843. The courts were held there until March 11, 1845, when the court business was transferred to the new court-house.

Locating Sites and Building Court-House.—Like all enterprises of this kind, the people in the different localities throughout the new-made county, became interested in the welfare of the public at large, and their own locality in particular, and each locality was sure that theirs was the best place for the location of the new court-house; consequently when nominations for location were in order, the following-named places were announced as candidates for the honor: Washington Square, Jersey City, (and as an inducement or bid for votes, Jersey City offered to donate to the county, land valued at ten thousand dollars, and eight thousand dollars in cash) the public grounds in Har-simus, Bergen Square, public grounds in Hoboken, West Hoboken, East Newark, The Five Corners, near depot, Paterson Railroad (west end), Bergen Ridge, (on road from Communipaw to West Hoboken) Communipaw, Secaucus, Bergen Point, New Durham, Weehawken, centre of county. Poudreite Company on Hackensack River.

¹ Officer of the court from this time on until October term, 1870, died Nov. 7, 1870. He was succeeded by his nephew, J. Wesley Welsh.

The vote upon the question of locating the court-house was taken June 2, 1840, with the following result:

Vote in Bergen: For Bergen, 596; rejected, 2,—total, 598.
 Vote in Jersey City: For Bergen, 20; for Jersey City, 281; for Harrison, 2; rejected, 2,—total vote in Jersey City, 305.
 Vote in Harrison: For Bergen, 24; for Jersey City, 2,—total, 26.

After the foregoing vote was taken, there was still some delay in fixing upon the exact spot in Bergen for the temple of justice, and it was not until Dec. 5, 1843, that the contract was let, and was finally given to Thomas Thomas, carpenter, and William Brown, mason, for fourteen thousand dollars, which was the lowest bid.

Laying the Corner-Stone.—Ground was broken for the new court-house May 1, 1844, and the cornerstone laid Oct. 17, 1844, with the usual ceremonies upon such occasions.

Preparatory to laying the stone, a procession was formed at Drayton's Hotel, at the Five Corners, in the following order:

- Architect, Superintendent and Builder.
- Mechanics and laborers employed on the building, about one hundred in number.
- Band of music from the U. S. ship "North Carolina."
- Committee of Arrangements.
- Board of Chosen Freeholders.
- Clergy.
- Chief Justice of the State of New Jersey.
- Members of the Bar.
- Judges and Justices of the County.
- Clerk and Surrogate.
- Sheriff and Constables.
- Mayor and Common Council of Jersey City.
- Trustees of the Freeholders, Inhabitants of the Township of Bergen.
- Strangers.
- Citizens on foot.
- Citizens on horseback and in carriages.

Upon arriving at the foundation walls, the meeting was called to order, when the Rev. B. C. Taylor, D.D., offered prayer, after which the corner-stone was laid by John Toule, Jr., director of the Board of Chosen Freeholders.

In the stone was deposited the newspapers of the day published in New York, Jersey City, Newark, Trenton and other places, reports on education, school fund and finances of the State and county, several coins, a parchment roll containing a list of all the county officers, the Governors, State officers, the President of the United States, and other officers of the general government.

After laying the corner-stone, Chief Justice Hornblower delivered an eloquent address, and the imposing ceremonies closed with the benediction by Rev. Mr. Ballard.

The following is a copy of a paper on file in the clerk's office, which shows the exact location of the court-house:

Dedication of the Court-House.—On the completion of the court-house the public authorities of the county, the chief justice of the State and the associate judges participated in the dedicatory services, which occurred March 11, 1845, when the new temple of justice was formally opened for the transaction of legal business, and the first court held therein.

On taking his seat, the chief justice directed the court to be opened, the usual proclamations to be made and that the grand jurors be called and take their seats.

The Rev. Dr. B. C. Taylor, of the Reformed Dutch Church at Bergen, who was present by invitation of the court, then offered prayer to the Throne of Grace peculiarly appropriate to the occasion, after which the grand-jurors were duly qualified, when Chief Justice Hornblower, in his usual happy and dignified manner, delivered an eloquent address, which was listened to with intense interest by the large number of people who crowded the spacious court-room.

"Gentlemen, members of the Board of Chosen Freeholders, of the Grand Jury, and my Fellow-Citizens at large of the county of Hudson:

"Assembled as we are for the first time within this beautiful building, which has been erected by your patriotism and liberality, whose cornerstone was laid in prayer, and in prayer fervent, appropriate and eloquent has just been dedicated to the administration of justice, I feel it my pleasure, my privilege, to address you in words of congratulation, as well as in the language of official advice and judicial instruction. Since the frailty, not to say the depravity, of our nature renders it necessary to establish and maintain courts of justice to settle the rights of individuals, to punish the guilty and protect the innocent, it is desirable and becoming that the public should provide convenient and suitable buildings in which to discharge that high and responsible duty.

"You, my fellow-citizens, have met that demand with a noble and generous spirit. In the erection of this edifice you have manifested your attachment to the institutions of your country, and your readiness to sustain the administrators of public justice in the execution and discharge of their duty. Accept, therefore, I pray you, in behalf of myself and of every member of the court, and of those who may soon succeed me and my associates in the seats we now occupy, unfeigned thanks for the convenient and elegant apartments you have provided for the accommodation of courts and their officers. When you first conceived the plan of being erected into a separate county it met with my approbation and secured my support, from no sinister motive. I remember the old town of Bergen when it had a very few inhabitants, except old-fashioned, honest Dutchmen, and very few houses, except those not built for show, but for domestic comfort and convenience, long, low and unpretending in appearance, but durable in materials and opening upon the streets some two or three hospitable doors, into which the friend and stranger might enter and find a welcome, and from which they might retire and leave a blessing behind them. Hoboken then consisted of little else beside a well-kept public house and a beautiful retreat from the noise and bustle of the neighboring metropolis. No Jersey City then adorned your shores, nothing but a large, long ferry house, occupied exclusively by an Fl—worth, a Smith and a Hunt, were here and there a boatman's or a fisherman's cabin, stood upon the heap of sand called Paulus Hook, your settlements were sparse, your occupations agricultural and industrial and your population small but healthy, peaceful and honest. You needed, for many years within my recollection, but one physician to administer to your physical necessities, but one man of law to supply your spiritual want, and not a single lawyer to satisfy your litigious propensities, for you had none to be satisfied. Peace reigned throughout your borders, simplicity of life and manners and honesty of purpose were the prevailing characteristics of the good old Dutch, who almost exclusively occupied the soil of your county in the days of my boyhood. A court at Hackensack and a few Dutch justices at home were all you wanted to punish the new offenders and settle the few lawsuits that troubled you in those days, but, alas! we fear that those good old days have gone by, never to return. The rapidly increasing population of our country, the vast improvements in science and the arts and the enterprising spirit of the age in which we live have wrought a mighty change within the period even of my memory. The facilities of steamboats and railroads, and the increasing spirit of trade and commerce and manufactures and the arts, have brought the good old town of Bergen into contact with the world, cut up her territory into small localities, studded her shores with splendid buildings, turned her farms into country-seats, her cabbage-ground into pleasure gardens, and her dwelling-places into workshops and manufactories. Such, in fact, has been the change in appearance and population of that part of the old county of Bergen which now constitutes the county of Hudson, that I can scarcely retraced the footsteps of my boyhood, when in my visits to friends here or in the city of New York, I used to traverse these hills. When, therefore, you first contemplated the formation of a new county I favored the object because I was satisfied that if not then absolutely necessary, the time was rapidly approaching when the increased number of inhabitants, the diversified character of your population, the rapidly expanding trade and commerce with the city of New York and other places, the consequent increase of lawsuits and contracts, of litigation and of crime, would call for a stronger police, for increased vigilance on the part of the magistrates and peace-officers, and for a seat of justice nearer your own doors. I rejoiced, therefore, in the consummation of your wishes, and was the more gratified from the reflection that your courts would be held within my judicial district, and thus give me an opportunity of meeting more frequently than I otherwise should with my respected friends and fellow-citizens of the county of Hudson. I have long since marked it down in the chronicle of those events, the memory of which I cherish, and which I desire to be transmitted to and remembered by my children, that I had the honor of presiding at the first court ever held in Hudson County. To that I have since been permitted to add the interesting fact that I was privileged to act a conspicuous part in the solemn and imposing ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of this edifice, and now shall have the pleasure of adding to this history the gratifying circumstance that I have been spared by a kind Providence to preside at the first court and address the first grand Jury that ever assembled within these walls. For this privilege I feel thankful, and I invite you all to unite with me in rendering thanksgiving and praise to Him who is Judge over all, and in whose hands our lives are, that through His kind and protecting care this edifice has been reared from its foundation to its superstructure without any fatal accident or the slightest injury to any of the worthy and industrious mechanics and laborers who have been employed in its erection.

"May the same all-wise and merciful Providence ever preside over the councils and deliberations of Judges and jurors within these walls, may the emine of justice, by whomsoever it may be worn, after we shall have gone to our final account, ever be kept pure and unspotted here, and this sanctuary of justice never be desecrated by bribery or corruption, never be an arena for the indulgence of prejudice, partiality or unhalloved passions of any sort, but may the unobstructed stream of public and private justice ever flow from this sacred hall, and from the pure fountain of eternal truth and righteousness.

"And now, gentlemen of the Grand Jury, permit me very briefly to call your attention to your immediate and appropriate duties. You have so often been called upon to act in the responsible positions you now occupy, the reiterated advice you have received from the court, and your own good sense, I am sure, render it unnecessary to occupy your time with any extended remarks upon the proper functions of your office, the duties you owe the public, the manner in which those duties should be performed, and the great importance to the public peace and private security in the protection of life and property that attaches itself to the faithful action of the Grand Jury at every meeting. You will enter upon the task assigned you, I doubt not, under the influence of that solemn pledge you have just taken, the record of which is already made on high upon tablets more durable than marble, never to be obliterated, unless your record now shall be fully and fully redeemed in the manner in which you shall perform your present duty. Let your inquiries be conducted with frankness and a determination to find out and bring to trial and punishment the perpetrators of crime, but at the same time let moderation and sound discretion preside in your deliberations, and be careful not to expose to the odium of an indictment for any serious or highly criminal offense one who is not guilty. In general, the evidence on the part of the State, to justify an indictment, should be of such a character as would satisfy your minds, if you were a traverse jury, of the guilt of the accused if that evidence should not be satisfactorily explained or contradicted on the trial. Cases sometimes happen, however, and they are generally such as are among the higher classes of crimes, when grand Jurors can find out but little evidence of the guilt of the perpetrators in detail, but yet enough to satisfy them that crime has been committed, and that there is evidence enough within the future reach of justice to fix it strongly on the accused. Such cases may be considered an exception to the general rule I have laid down.

After some further remarks relating to the office and duty of Grand Jurors, the Chief Justice concluded by expressing an earnest prayer that it might be long before the occurrence of high and alarming crimes within the county would become the subject of investigation in the chaste and beautiful building which the court now occupies for the first time; but while it proved to be a sanctuary and protection to the innocent, it might be a terror to evil-doers.

MEETING AND RESOLUTIONS.—After the adjournment of the court the members of the bar, the grand jury, the Board of Chosen Freeholders and a large number of citizens from all parts of the county met in the court-house, when Dr. John S. Condit was called to the chair and Robert Gilchrist appointed secretary of the meeting.

Asa Whitehead stated the object of the meeting and offered the following resolution, which was seconded by E. B. D. Ogden, Esq.:

"Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be tendered to our Honor, Chief Justice Hornblower, for the eloquent and interesting address delivered this morning, and that a committee be appointed to wait upon him and request a copy for publication."

Whereupon Asa Whitehead, Cornelius Van Winkle and Henry M. Traphagen, Esqs., were appointed such committee.

On motion of Peter Bentley, Esq., seconded by A. O. Zabriskie, Esq.,—

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to convey to the Rev. Dr. Taylor the sincere thanks of this meeting for his attendance here this morning, and to express to him the gratification and delight experienced by us all in listening to his solemn, appropriate and eloquent address to the Throne of Grace, and also to request him to commit to writing in the same words in which it was delivered, as nearly as it may be in his power to recall them, and furnish the officers of this meeting with a copy thereof; it being the earnest wish of all present that the same may be published with the other proceedings."

Whereupon the chair appointed Peter Bentley, J. Van Boskerck and Cornelius C. Joralemon such committee.

On motion of J. D. Miller, Esq., seconded by Peter McMartin, Esq.,—

"Resolved, That the thanks of the citizens of Hudson County are due to the Board of Chosen Freeholders for the prompt, faithful and energetic manner in which they have prosecuted the work of erecting the public buildings;

"To the building committee of that Board for their attention to, and discharge of the trust committed to them; and also for the liberality and good taste they have displayed in furnishing the court-room, the grand jury room, the clerk's and surrogate's offices, and all the other offices in the building;

"To the contractor, Mr. William Brown, for the faithful and workmanlike manner in which he has fulfilled his contract, and more than fulfilled it, if we may judge from the substantial and elegantly furnished building in which we are now assembled;

"To Mr. Kirk, the able and accomplished architect, who furnished the plan;

"To Mr. Daniel G. Van Winkle, the superintendent; in short, to all who have had any agency in the construction of this beautiful edifice."

Other County Buildings.—The county almshouse, lunatic asylum and penitentiary are located at Secaucus, on the old Pinhorn plantation. In 1729 the plantation was said to contain six hundred acres of timber, two hundred cleared land, one thousand acres meadow, new house and barn, two orchards of about twelve hundred bearing apple-trees. Three hundred acres of this plantation now constitute the "poor-house farm." The purchase of this farm for county purposes was first agitated in November, 1845. It was not, however, until December, 1855, that the Board of Chosen Freeholders resolved to buy it. Several townships and cities had been set off from Bergen without reserving their right to the farm, so that, in 1874, it was owned by Bergen, North Bergen, Hoboken and Hudson City. On March 7, 1871, the Legislature named commissioners from these four municipalities, with power to convey the same to the county. The purchase was completed, and, in February, 1862, the title passed to the county at a cost of twelve thousand dollars. Preparations were immediately made for the erection of the almshouse. James McLoughlin contracted for the carpenter's work at fourteen thousand six hundred dollars, and William C. White for the mason's work, at twelve thousand five hundred dollars. The building was completed in 1863, and the first person received as an inmate was Andrew Donohoe, Aug. 25, 1863. The building has first-class accommodations for over five hundred inmates.

The contract for the penitentiary was awarded to Peter Doyle and David Ewling, Aug. 9, 1866, for eighty-three thousand four hundred and fifty-six dollars. It was completed in 1870, and Patrick Warren appointed its first keeper, and Michael Kinney, convicted of breaking and entering and larceny, admitted its first inmate, Sept. 19, 1870.

The Lunatic Asylum was completed in 1873. The first patients were received March 8, 1873. The building has accommodations for one hundred and fifty patients.

By the act to reorganize the local government of Jersey City, approved April 4, 1874, the wards in Jersey City were abolished and aldermanic districts created in their stead, each district being entitled to three chosen freeholders. Candidates were chosen under the old as well as the new law. Those elected under the old law were admitted into the board; those elected under the new law were excluded. The latter then instituted proceedings in the Supreme Court to compel the board to admit them to their seats. In this they were successful at the November term (6 Vroom's Reports, 269), and took their seats Dec. 1, 1874, as representatives in the board from Jersey City. They were as follows:

CHAPTER XIV.

HUDSON COUNTY IN THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

Preliminary Stages of the War.—The causes which led to the outbreak of the war for independence produced much the same feeling and action in this portion of New Jersey as were manifested simultaneously throughout all the colonies, and which had agitated the American people for at least a decade before the actual conflict of arms. The acts of British oppression, which for many years had been earnestly protested against, culminated in the unwarranted closing of the port of Boston in the spring of 1774. From this time till the firing of the first gun at Concord was a period of passing resolutions at town and county meetings, and of appointing Committees of Safety and Correspondence.

Bergen County Resolutions.—At a meeting of freeholders and inhabitants of Bergen County, of which Hudson County was then a part, held at the court-house in Hackensack on Saturday, June 25, 1774, Peter Zabriske was called to the chair, and the following resolutions unanimously adopted:

"This meeting being deeply affected with the calamitous condition of the inhabitants of Boston, in the Province of Massachusetts Bay, in consequence of the late Act of Parliament for blocking up the port of Boston, and considering the alarming tendency of the Act of the British Parliament for the purpose of raising a revenue in America,

"1. Resolved, 1st. That they think it their greatest happiness to live under the government of the illustrious House of Hanover, and that they will steadfastly and uniformly bear true and faithful allegiance to His Majesty King George the Third, and true assent to their constitutional rights and privileges.

"2d. That we have given to be our indubitable privilege to be taxed only by our own consent, given by ourselves or by our representatives; and that we consider the Acts of Parliament derogative of their right to impose internal taxes on the subjects of America as manifest encroachments on our national rights and privileges as British subjects, and as inconsistent with the idea of an American Assembly or House of Representatives.

"3d. That we will heartily unite with this County in choosing delegates to attend at a General Congress from the several provinces of America, in order to consult on and determine some effective method to be pursued for obtaining a repeal of the said Acts of Parliament, which appear to us evidently calculated to destroy that mutual friendship and dependence between Great Britain and her Colonies which are the basis and support of both.

"And we do appoint Thomas Day, John Demarest, Peter Zabriske, Cornelius Van Vorst and John Zabriske, Jr., Esquires, to be a committee for correspondence with the committees with the other counties in this Province, and particularly to meet with the other county committees at New Brunswick, or such other place as shall be agreed upon, in order to select delegates to attend the General Congress of Delegates of the American Colonies for the purpose aforesaid."

These resolutions were signed by three hundred and twenty-eight citizens of Old Bergen, and what is now Hudson County, and a local Committee of Safety was organized, of which John Fell was chairman.¹ But little, if anything, is known of the opera-

¹John Fell was a devoted patriot, and resided at Paramus, where he was well acquainted with the Tory Col. Van Buskirk, before the defection of the latter from the American cause. In 1775, Judge Fell was arrested and taken to Paulus Hoeck as a prisoner. He was recognized by the Tory colonel. "Times are altered since we last met," said the colonel. "So I perceive," coolly replied the judge, looking at the colonel's uniform. "Well, you are a prisoner and going over to New York, where you will be presented to Gen. Robertson, with whom I have the honor to be acquainted. I will give you a letter of introduction," said the colonel. The judge thanked him and accepted the letter, which he afterwards presented to Gen. Robertson. It so happened that the judge and Gen. Robertson had been friends at Pensacola after the old French war in 1763. The purport of Van Buskirk's letter was that John Fell was a notorious rebel and rascal and advised that due care should be taken of him. Gen. Robertson handed the letter to the judge, and said, "My old friend, John Fell, you must be a very altered man and a very great rascal indeed if you equal this Col. Van Buskirk." Notwithstanding tions of the committee, or of local affairs generally, till the spring of 1776.

Preparations to Resist the British.—Early in 1776 intelligence having been received that Lord Howe had left Boston for New York, an attempt was made by Lord Sterling, then in command of the militia of this vicinity, to fortify the eastern border of the county along the Hudson River and at Bergen Point, opposite Staten Island. The Provincial Congress, then in session in Burlington,— Ordered, That all officers who have obtained leave of absence, or leave of absence, for raising troops, be and they are to be immediately with such number as they have collected for the militia of New York, and to be in a full proportion of men to the militia, but they may be only called in, in their own defense, or may require, to collect the remainder. All officers and privates and their families are required to be diligent in their respective stations, and the friends of Liberty throughout the County are earnestly entreated now to exert themselves for the preservation of their country, their lives, liberty and property.

"The Congress likewise earnestly desire all persons to lend their aid and other necessaries to the present occasion, and they are to be careful of the public faith to make amends for any loss or damage they may incur.

"Ordered, that Cornelius Van Vorst be Lieutenant Colonel, Richard Day, first major, and John Mustinus Goetschius, second major of the battalion of foot militia in the County of Bergen.

A regiment of light horse was also raised, and Jacobus Post was appointed major. He resigned his commission Feb. 3, 1776.

Continental Congress having furnished the Provincial Congress with two tons of powder, it was distributed among the counties in the ratio as follows: Bergen County, 400 pounds; Morris County, 400 pounds; Hunterdon County, 400 pounds; Somerset County, 400 pounds; Essex County, 500 pounds; Middlesex County, 500 pounds; Monmouth County, 700 pounds; Burlington County, 300 pounds.

Lord Sterling immediately took measures to place Bergen in a condition of defense, and to open means of communication with the interior of the province. His plan, proposed as early as the 18th of March, contemplated the construction of two good roads,—one from Paulus Hoeck to Brown's, and the other from Weehawken to Hackensack Ferry,—and to set several hundred of the Bergen militia at work upon them. He devised forts at Paulus Hoeck, and at Bergen Neck, the former to prevent approaches from the city of New York and the latter from Staten Island. Part of the comprehensive plan had been carried into effect before the arrival of Gen. Washington. The latter ordered the immediate construction of the work at Paulus Hoeck, which was soon completed and garrisoned; but before the work could be constructed at Bergen Point the British had arrived and occupied Staten Island. On the 29th of June the advance of a fleet of forty sail appeared in sight, bearing the British forces under Gen. Howe, and this expression of friendship, Fell was treated with such severity that the Council of Safety of New Jersey, Nov. 17, 1777, ordered James Parker and Walter Butcher to be confined in jail at Morrisown until Fell and Wymant Van Zant should be discharged or released from confinement in New York.—Minutes of Council of Safety, 181.

in two days thereafter other arrivals swelled the number of men-of-war and transports to one hundred and thirty. The troops landed on Staten Island, and the fleet cast anchor off the mouth of Kill Van Kull.¹

Development of Loyalty to the King.—Of course, at this stage of the war there were many in the vicinity of Bergen Point, Paulus Hoeck and throughout the county who needed only the presence of the British army to stimulate and encourage their loyalty to the King. There hastened in large numbers to avow their allegiance, and many who had hitherto taken part with the patriots now looked upon the struggle of the colonies as hopeless, and joined the British. A number of these accepted commissions in the British service, and were vindictive and unscrupulous leaders of atrocious bands of marauding refugees, who infested the settlements and plundered or murdered their former neighbors with remorseless atrocity during a considerable portion of the war. In 1776 the following action for disarming such disaffected persons throughout the province was taken by Provincial Congress:

"Whereas, by a regulation of the late Congress, the several committees in this Colony were authorized and directed to disarm all the non-assessors and persons notoriously disaffected within their bounds;

"And whereas, it appears that the said regulation hath not been carried into effect in some parts of the Colony, and it being absolutely necessary, in the present dangerous state of public affairs, when arms are much wanted for the publick defense, and it should be instantly executed

"It is therefore directed and resolved, That the several colonels in this Colony do, without delay, proceed to disarm all such persons within their districts whose religious principles will not allow them to bear arms, and likewise, all such as have hitherto refused and still do refuse to bear arms, that the arms so taken be appraised by some indifferent person or persons, that the said colonels give vouchers for the same, and that the appraisement and receipt be left in the hands of the persons disarmed."

Fearing an attack from Staten Island, Gen. Mercer, who had been sent to Paulus Hoeck to receive the Pennsylvania militia upon their arrival at that point, and who had his flying camp at Bergen, was ordered by Washington, on July 4, 1776, to station a guard of five hundred men at Bergen Neck, and also to guard the ferries over the Hackensack and Passaic Rivers, being promised that on the next day an engineer should be sent over from New York to erect works for the security of these places.² A fort, afterwards named Fort De Lancey, was erected at this time a short distance below the present canal at Bayonne, and Gen. Wadsworth's brigade was sent over to Bergen, where it was joined by a battalion of Jersey Troops.

Among the precautions taken before the arrival of the British, as early as Feb. 3, 1776, was the removal of the records from Perth Amboy to Burlington for safe keeping. John Demarest, of Bergen County, was the agent for their removal, as appears from the following minutes of Provincial Congress, under the date above mentioned:

"Ordered, That Mr. Demarest do attend the papers, books and records removed from the secretary's at Perth Amboy, and deliver the same to Charles Pettit, Esq., on Thursday next at Burlington; on delivery thereof he is hereby authorized to take Mr. Pettit's receipt agreeably to an order of this Congress."

Still the British did not attack that portion of New Jersey, as they easily could have done with the force at their command in the immediate vicinity. It is estimated that at the time Gen. Mercer anticipated their crossing the kills they were at least eight thousand strong on Staten Island, and yet they showed no disposition to cross, although menaced by inferior numbers on the Jersey side. Gen. Mercer therefore formed a plan for attacking them upon the Island, which, though well conceived and prepared for, miscarried on account of bad weather, which prevented his forces from crossing the Kill Von Kull.

On July 17, 1776, the committee of Newark presented a petition to the Provincial Congress, requesting that this congress would procure, or cause to be built four gondolas or row-galleys, mounted with cannon, to ply between the mouths of Hackensack and Passaic Rivers and Perth Amboy. Robert Drummond and Lewis Ogden, of Essex, Jacob Quackenbush and Daniel I. Brown, of Bergen, and Dr. Moses Bloomfield, of Middlesex, were appointed a committee to consider the propriety of granting the petition. The matter was referred to Continental Congress through Mr. Ogden, but was not acted upon in season to meet the exigency.

Beginning of Active Movements.—Meantime the enemy's forces had been augmented by arrivals until, in the harbor of New York and upon Staten Island, they numbered thirty thousand men.³ The bay and river were alive with their vessels. As two of the British men-of-war—the "Phoenix," of forty guns, and the "Rose," carrying twenty guns—swept up the harbor on the afternoon of July 12th, taking advantage of both wind and tide, the first fire of patriot guns was opened upon them from the sand-hills of Paulus Hoeck, and was returned by a broadside as the vessels glided by the fort, comparatively unharmed, their sides being protected by a wall of sand-bags. "On the same evening Lord Howe sailed up the harbor, greeted by the booming of cannon and the huzzas of the British."⁴

On the 15th of September the British captured New York, and the only incident connected with Hudson County on that day was another attack upon the post at Paulus Hoeck by the British ships-of-war the "Roebuck," "Phoenix" and "Factor." The fortification, however, was not surrendered, but remained in the possession of the Americans for a short time under command of Col. Durkie.⁵ During this time

Washington would occasionally leave his camp at Harbarn, cross over to the Jersey shore, and in company with Gen. Greene, who had succeeded Gen. Mercer in command on the Jersey shore, reconnoitre sometimes as far down as Paulus Hoeck, to observe what was going on in the city and among the shipping.¹ The account of the campaign of Paulus Hoeck is furnished by the following report of Gen. Greene, written from Fort Constitution, afterwards called Fort Lee:

"CAMP-FORT CONSTITUTION,
Sept. 17, 1776.

"DEAR SIR.—The enemy are landed at Powley's Hook, they came up this afternoon and began a cannonading on the batteries, and after cannonading for half an hour or more, they landed a party from the ships. Gen. Mercer had ordered off from the Hook all the troops except a small guard, who had orders to evacuate the place from the first appearance of the enemy. Gen. Mercer mentions no troops but those landed from the ships, but Col. Bull and many others that were along the river upon the heights saw twenty boats go over from York to Powley's Hook. This movement must have happened since Gen. Mercer wrote. I suppose to visit Bergen to-night, as Gen. Mercer thinks of going to his post at Andoy to-morrow."

In a letter it is stated "nothing fell into the enemy's hands but a few guns, which had been rendered unfit for further service. Our Army is posted at the town of Bergen, and our advanced party has possession of the mill just back of Powley's Hook."²

Bergen remained headquarters until the 5th of October, 1776, when Washington found it necessary to collect his forces preparatory to his retreat to the Delaware. A letter written on the 11th of October says: "To-morrow we evacuate Bergen," and assigns the following reasons for the act:

"Bergen is the narrow neck of land accessible on three sides by water, and exposed to a variety of attacks in different places at one and the same time. A large body of the enemy might infallibly take possession of the place whenever they pleased, unless we kept a stronger force than our numbers will allow. The spot itself is not an object of our arms; if they attack it would cut off those who defended it and secure the grain and military stores. These have been removed, and when we are gone, a naked spot is all they will find. . . . We go to Fort Constitution as soon as we have seen the ships anchored off. We shall leave a guard of observation behind us; this may prevent the enemy's discovering our removal for a day or two."³

It appears from the authority above quoted that as outguards Gen. Greene had posted at Bergen, Hoebeck, Bull's Ferry, Hackensack and opposite Spuyten Duyvel one hundred and eighty-six others and men.

When Fort Lee was evacuated, Nov. 20, 1776, the army retreated to Hackensack and thence to the Delaware, and East Jersey was left to the enemy. The British stationed a considerable body of troops at Paulus Hoeck, and strengthening the post, placed it in command of Lieut.-Col. Van Baskirk, of Saddle River, who had joined the British. The fort, also on Bergen Neck, was occupied, principally by refugees, and was named Fort De Lancey, in honor of Oliver De Lancey, of West Chester, a noted adherent to the British cause.

Exploit of Col. Aaron Burr.—It was during one of those raids of the British and Tories in the vicinity of Hackensack, in September, 1777, that Col. Aaron Burr gained his first military distinction. Hearing, at the point where his regiment was lying in the Cove, near Sufferns, that the British had marched out of New York and were devastating the country, and were within thirty miles of him, he started to meet them with his small force. About ten o'clock in the evening, when within three miles of Hackensack, he received certain information that the most advanced of the enemy's pickets were only a mile distant. His men having marched thirty miles since breaking camp, and being extremely fatigued, he ordered them to lie down and keep silent until he returned. In a few moments they were all asleep. Meanwhile, Col. Burr went forward alone to reconnoiter the situation. Stealthily he felt his way toward the British pickets, and found them lying on the ground fast asleep, and guarded by two sentinels. He was near enough to hear their watchword, and ascertained, by making a wide detour, that this picket was so far in advance of the main body as to be out of hearing. In gaining this information so much time was spent that it was within an hour of daybreak before he returned to his regiment. Quietly and quickly waking his men, he informed them of his purpose to attack the enemy's picket, and ordered them to follow at a certain distance, and forbade any man to speak on pain of instant death.

So accurately had the colonel noticed the locality and calculated the position of the sentinels that he was able to lead his men between those two unsuspecting individuals at the moment when they were farthest apart, and he was almost upon the sleeping picket before a man of it began to stir. When at a distance of ten yards, Burr was challenged by a sentinel, whom he shot dead, and then gave the word of attack. One officer, a sergeant, a corporal and twenty-seven privates fell into his hands on this occasion. Only one of the pickets besides the sentinel made any resistance, and he was overpowered after he had received two bayonet wounds. He attempted to march with his fellow-prisoners, but after going a short distance, was compelled to lie down, exhausted and fainting from loss of blood.

"Go a little farther, my good fellow," said Burr, "and we will get a surgeon for you." "Ah!" gasped the dying Briton; "all the doctors in America can do me no service, for I am a dying man; but it grieves me sore to the heart that I have served my king upwards of twenty years, and at length must die with a charged musket in my hand."⁴

Col. Burr immediately sent off an express to Paramus to order all the troops to move, and to rally the country. His exploit had so encouraged the inhabitants that they turned out with great alacrity, and put themselves under his command. But the enemy, probably alarmed by these threatening appearances, retreated the next day, leaving behind them the greater part of the plunder which they had captured on their raid.¹

Clinton's Raid.²—In September, 1777, Sir Henry Clinton, then in command at New York, planned a raid into New Jersey. He divided his forces into four columns. The general point of rendezvous was at the new bridge above Hackensack. One column, under Gen. Campbell, entered New Jersey by the way of Elizabethtown; one, under Capt. Drummond, by way of Schuylers Ferry; one, under Gen. Vaughn, by way of Fort Lee; and the other, under Lieut.-Col. Campbell, by way of Tappan. On the 12th the expedition set out. Clinton himself followed, passing up Newark Bay to Schuylers Landing, on the Hackensack (Dow's Ferry). From this point he marched over the Belleville turnpike to Schuylers house, where he found Capt. Drummond, with two hundred and fifty men. During the night Gen. Campbell arrived with his detachment and the cattle he had collected en route. The different columns met, as designed, on the 15th. On the following day Gen. Campbell marched his forces from English Neighborhood to Bergen Point, whence he passed over to Staten Island. The result of the raid was the capture of four hundred cattle, four hundred sheep, and a few horses, taken from the people of Essex and Bergen. In exchange, they had eight men killed, eighteen wounded, ten missing, and five taken prisoners.

As an offset to this raid, we find the following account in the New York Mercury of Aug. 3, 1778:

"A party of rebel light-horse came down as far as Bergen Point last Tuesday night, July 25th, and returned next morning towards Hackensack. They visited Hoebuck on their way and carried off a great number of cattle from the inhabitants."

Other Items of Interest.—The following interesting items are from "Winfield's History of Hudson County:"

"This afternoon a party of our horse brought in two rebel privates from Powles Hook. One of them is very intelligent and communicative; but the other is the most whimsical Tory I ever have seen. Wherever he goes he carries with him a large gray cat, which he says came into the rebel camp on the night after the battle of Freehold Meeting-House, and which he first discovered lapping a spot of dry blood on his sleeve, as he lay on his arms, expecting another dash at the British. His affection for the cat is wonderful, as hers is for him, for they are inseparable. He says if we don't allow him extra rations for his cat, he shall be obliged to allow them out of his own."—Smyth's Diary, Nov. 8th.

"On Saturday, April 17, 1779, two of the Bergen County Militia, who, with others, had been out reconnoitering, suspecting from the conduct of a boy they saw running in great haste towards a house on the bank of the Hudson River, about a mile above Wiehauk, that some of the infamous gang of robbers that have for some time infested this and neighboring parts of the State of New York were concealed there, advanced as fast as possible to the house; one of them entered immediately and discovered five or six men in the house, several of whom had arms, and with admirable presence of mind calling aloud to his companions, as though a large party had accompanied him, discharged his musket and killed the chief of the gang on the spot. Retiring to reload his musket, the rest of the villains took to their heels."—New Jersey Gazette, April 28, 1779.

About this time (1777) the sufferings of troops for want of clothing were very severe, and created much comment. Among the suggestions for relief was the following from Governor Livingston, which, while it points out a novel store-house of relief for the Valley Forge sufferers, also incidentally describes an old-time custom among the women in this vicinity at that period:

"I am afraid that while we are employed in furnishing our battalions with clothing, we forget the County of Bergen, which alone is sufficient amply to provide them with winter waistcoats and breeches, from the redundancy and superfluity of certain woolen habits which are at present applied to no kind of use whatsoever. It is well known that the rural bodies in that part of New Jersey pride themselves in an incredible number of petticoats, which, like house furniture, are displayed by way of ostentation for many years before they are decreed to invest the fair bodies of the proprietors. Till that period they are never worn, but neatly piled up on each side of an immense escritoire, the top of which is decorated with a most capacious brass-classed Bible, seldom read. What I would, therefore, humbly propose to our superiors is to make prize of these future female habiliments, and after proper transformation, immediately apply them to screen from the inclemency of the weather those gallant males who are now fighting for the liberties of their country. And to clear this measure from every imputation of injustice, I have only to observe that the generality of the women in that county having for above a century since the breeches, it is highly reasonable that the men should now, and especially upon so important an occasion, make liberty of the post-coats. — New Jersey Gazette, Dec. 21, 1777.

CHAPTER XV.

SURPRISE AND CAPTURE OF PAULUS HOECK.¹

IN 1779 Paulus Hoek proper was a circular piece of upland, composed of sand hills, containing about sixty-five acres. It was owned by Cornelius Van Vorst, popularly known as "Faddy." From it to the other side of the Hudson a public ferry had been established in June, 1761, as part of the recently erected stage route between New York and Philadelphia. Between this ferry, then at the foot of Grand street, and the road leading to Prior's mill from the uplands of Ahasimus a road over the sand-hills and a causeway across the marsh had been in use many years.²

In 1766 this became a public road, when a thoroughfare was laid out between Paulus Hoek and Bergen Point; but the causeway between Warren and Henderson streets was to be "cleared and maintained" by the owner of the ferry.³ Among these sand-hills, in 1769, Van Vorst established a race-course. It was one mile in length, and upon it, for the first time, on the 9th of October, 1769, appeared the fleet-footed steeds of some of the solid New Yorkers of that day, such as De Lancey, Rutgers and Morris. But "Faddy" was too liberal to give up the course exclusively to aristocratic blood. Now and then the native stock of Bergen, Ahasimus and Communipaw met in honest competition, and the hammering of their heavy hoofs was heard among the hills.

When the ferry was established for public travel two periaugers were placed thereon for the transportation of passengers and teams.⁴ The landing place was called a "ferry stairs." Down these stairs passengers clambered as the condition of the tide required, while horses and wagons were lifted or pushed in. Abraham Mesier, who owned the land-place on the New York side, and Michael Cornelison were its founders and managers. Then came Cornelison to Paulus Hoek and erected a tavern just east of the old Hudson House, afterwards erected on lots 6 and 8 Grand Street, between Greene and Hudson.⁵ This tavern was the starting point of all the stages that left the Hoek for Philadelphia and other points. It must have been well patronized, for passengers intending to take the stage in the morning were obliged to come over the river the night before. The perils of navigation across the raging Hudson would not permit the running of "periaugers" between sundown and sunrise. The manager of the ferry and "mine host" being the same worthy persons, it is impossible to say how much the pence of the passengers had to do with the suspension of the ferry at sundown.

The tavern, the stables and out-buildings connected with it, were the only buildings on the Hoek at the breaking out of the war. The outbuildings were in the rear of the tavern on the westerly side of the road. Between the tavern and the river, the road turned towards Grand Street, and then by a short turn, to the ferry stairs. Here was a circular plot or park, around which the stages turned on their way back to the road, after receiving or discharging passengers. This park, or its successor when the ferry slip was moved nearer York Street and Paulus Hoek became a settlement, was the seat of justice; and here petty offenders, while yet there was no lawyer to save, found the lash, told off to the required number upon his bare back by the stalwart constable, a very disagreeable, but impartial and beneficent minister of justice.

These sand-hills were an attractive place of resort in the early days of the New Netherlands, when they were occupied by tobacco planters.⁶ In 1699 they were added by purchase to the already many acres of the Van Vorst family, and were thenceforth in part cultivated as farm land. But the newly erected ferry had made the Hoek a starting-point of travel to the South, and the war which soon followed was destined to give it a prominent and enduring place in the annals of the country.

As soon as it was discovered that the British under Lord Howe were about to abandon Boston with the supposed intention of making a descent upon New York, Lord Stirling, who was in the immediate command of that city and vicinity, following the suggestion of Washington, took measures to erect works for its protection. In such a proceeding, Paulus Hoek was too important a point to be overlooked. Its situation, directly opposite to Manhattan Island, and jutting far out into the river, in fact, itself an island, suggested its fortification. Boats passing up the river would necessarily come within easy range of its guns. For the location and design of such works as would

"NEW YORK, Oct. 8, 1779.

"Major-General Pattison judging it necessary to have two Armed Vessels for the further protection of the Post at Paulus Hoek, and Captain Land having recommended the two Periaugers which attend there should be fitted up for this purpose, you will give orders for their being furnished with Oars and Swoivelocks. Captain Land will take the trouble of giving directions for their being properly fitted." — N. Y. Hist. Soc. Col. 1875 p. 277.

aid in the defense of the city Lord Stirling personally examined Paulus Hooeck on the 22d of March, 1776, and proposed their immediate construction by the militia of the counties of Bergen, Essex and Middlesex. He promised to be over again in a few days and bring with him some assistant engineers to lay out the works.¹ Nothing, however, was done toward their construction, for as late as the 21st of May, Washington wrote to General Putnam that if new works could be carried on without detriment to the old (for want of tools), he would have that intended for Paulus Hooeck set about immediately, as he conceived it to be of importance.² The work could not have been delayed many days after this, for the fortifications were ready for use when the time came. As their design was to prevent the enemy's shipping from passing up the river, they consisted of three earth works thrown up along the front, one above and two below the ferry. The lower one was constructed so as to command Communipaw Cove as well as the river. The central one of these works was mounted with guns, the number and calibre of which have not been ascertained, and was probably the one known during the British occupancy as the round redoubt.

On the 29th of June, 1776, the British entered the lower bay and shortly afterward took possession of Staten Island. Gen. Mercer, who was now in command in New Jersey, and had his flying camp at Bergen Neck, placed a guard of five hundred men on Bergen Neck to prevent the enemy's approach by that pass, and made arrangements for the proper disposition of the Pennsylvania militia as they arrived at Paulus Hooeck. But the British quietly lay upon the island awaiting reinforcements. By the 12th of July their forces amounted to thirty thousand men, and the harbor was filled with their shipping. On the afternoon of that day they opened the game for the possession of New York. The "Phoenix," carrying forty guns, under command of Capt. Parker, and the "Rose," carrying twenty guns, under command of Capt. Wallace, with their decks protected by sand-bags, and accompanied by three tenders, came sweeping up the river, having the advantage of both wind and tide.³ Then for the first time the god of war thundered among the sand-hills of Paulus Hooeck. The battery opened a lively fire upon the ships, which returned it with broadsides as they sailed harmlessly by. It does not appear that damage came to either side in this exchange of salutations.

As the militia were now pouring in for the protection of New York, Gen. Mercer was kept busy in transferring them over to that city, and as Paulus Hooeck was in the line of passage, it grew in importance. He suggested to his superior the propriety of stationing a body of four hundred men, well accoutred, from the Delaware counties at this place, and four hundred of the Jersey men for the flying camp at Bergen.⁴ On the 27th of August he received orders to march with his whole army to the Hooek. His force at the time numbered eight thousand three hundred men.⁵ The battle of Long Island was being fought when he ordered the concentration. On the night of the 29th he had at Bergen, ready to pass to New York, between three and four thousand of the Pennsylvania and New Jersey militia, but, on learning of the retreat from Long Island, retained them on this side of the river, and strengthened the posts at Paulus Hooek and Bergen Neck to the complement of two thousand five hundred men.⁶

The British took possession of New York on the 15th of September. On the morning of that day three ships of war—the "Roebuck" and "Phoenix" each of forty guns, and the "Tartar" of twenty guns—stood up the Hudson, "causing a most tremendous firing."⁷ The raw militia on Paulus Hooeck were little prepared for the peltings of such a pitiless storm. It was said by those who desired to make the troops believe that they had acted in a most becoming manner that the vessels "were roughly treated by the American battery at Paulus Hooek."⁸ But the old soldier, who had learned his lesson of war on the field of Culloden, took a different view of the deeds of these doughty heroes. He accused them of having "behaved in a scandalous manner, running off from their posts on the first cannonade from the ships of the enemy."⁹ In consequence of such conduct he was obliged to send a detachment of the men enlisted for the flying camp to this post. During the firing two shots from the ships struck the tavern, then occupied by Verdine Elsworth.

It was manifest, after the occupancy of New York by the British, that Paulus Hooek had lost its importance to the Americans. Gen. Mercer made preparation for abandoning the post, being convinced that the enemy were determined to attack it by a stronger force than he could oppose. He removed all the stores and useful cannon, so that nothing could fall into the enemy's hands but the guns that had been rendered unfit for further service.¹⁰ He kept at the post, however, for purposes of observation, a small guard, who had orders to evacuate the place at the first approach of the enemy.¹¹ On the afternoon of the 23d of September the British came up and began a cannonade on the Hooek, and after cannonading "for half an hour or a little more," they landed a party from the ships. This accomplished, they sent over from New York twenty boats and took possession of the abandoned post.

At this time the Americans were posted at the town of Bergen, with an advanced party in possession of Prior's mill, then situate on Mill Creek, at the Point of Rocks. This position they held until the 5th of October, when Washington found it necessary to collect his forces preparatory to his retreat to the Delaware. Then Bergen was abandoned to the enemy. They stationed a considerable body of troops at Paulus Hoeck and strengthened the defenses. They afterwards occupied the works on Bergen Neck, which they named Fort De Lancey, in honor of Oliver De Lancey, of Westchester.¹ These two posts were garrisoned principally by Tories, or "refugees," as they called themselves. They were active and unscrupulous in the cause of the King. Their zeal, however, exhibited itself more in plundering and murdering their old neighbors than in honorable warfare. Yet, though they were in possession of these posts and generally of the surrounding country, their possession was not one of undisturbed repose. The "rebels," though cast down, were neither subdued nor discouraged. In small but intrepid bands they hovered around the outposts of the enemy, swooping down upon now a Tory and then a red-coat. In fact, from 1776 to 1780 the territory between the Liberty Pole and the town of Bergen was a debatable land. It was overrun, and its inhabitants, with judicial impartiality, harried by scouting parties from both sides. A few references to the exploits of these parties, as described by either side, will show that, to the inhabitants, it must have been a matter of indifference as into whose hands they fell. To them it was a matter of some difficulty to distinguish friend from foe, so far as present loss of personal possessions went, and from each it would not have been in appropriate to pray the good Lord for deliverance.

But the efforts of these predatory bands were not confined exclusively to property. They and their friends were respectively liable to capture, and now and then cruelty and murder followed. The headquarters of the British and their general starting-point in all these excursions was Paulus Hoeck. Among the other troops herestationed was a body of Tories, at whose head was Lieut. Col. Abraham Van Buskirk, of Saddle River.² He had formerly been friendly to the American cause, but when New York was captured he made his peace with the King. With the zeal of a new convert, or repentant backslider, he sought to atone for his past sins by sustaining those whom he formerly despised, and seeking the ruin of his former associates. Being well acquainted with the people and this portion of the State, by night and by day he and his Tory followers prowled over the country as far north as Paramus. If he failed to capture a patriot, his ardent soul was satisfied with a few cattle. If he could not capture or disperse a rebel camp, his patriotic impulses to serve his King found consolation in a hen-roost.

It has been said that after the British captured Paulus Hoeck, they strengthened the works. As the Americans designed them, they were only to prevent the passage of the enemy's fleet. But its new occupants, intending to make this an important and permanent post, and to hold it, both as a defense to New York and a gateway into New Jersey, it was necessary to make the works more elaborate and thus render the place impregnable. The position was one of immense natural strength. It was bounded on the north by the cove of Ahasimus, on the east by Hudson's River, on the south by the cove of Communipaw, and on the west by a salt marsh several hundred feet in width, over which the tide ebbed and flowed. So low was this marsh that at ordinary flood tide boats could pass over it from cove to cove.³ To overcome the difficulty of crossing this marsh for foot, an elevated walk was constructed east of and parallel to the road, and known as "Howe's Bridge." Winding through this marsh from the southeasterly corner of Morris and Van Vorst Streets to the easterly side of Warren Street, and then westerly through York Street to a point near Van Vorst Street, then northerly until it crossed Newark Avenue, was a tide creek. This creek had been enlarged, and a ditch cut across an elbow of the creek from York Street to the centre of the block between Grand and Sussex, one hundred and twenty-five feet west of Warren. The creek and ditch were about twenty feet in width and of sufficient depth for the passage of ordinary oyster boats. In addition to this, the bottom was oozy and of difficult passage even at low water. Jutting out from the upland into the cove of Ahasimus was a peninsula, afterwards known as North Point, then in part salt marsh and in part rocky, but all covered by the flood tides. To render the place yet more difficult of access, the British cut a ditch about twenty feet in width through the marsh from a point on the river fifty feet north of Mercer and fifty feet west of Greene Street to the main ditch, north of Warren Street.⁴ Over the ditch on the line of Newark Avenue was a drawbridge, and on the easterly side of the marsh, in the line of the abatis, was a strong barred gate.⁵ This was the only entrance to the Hoeck by land. Along the edge of the upland was a line of abatis of great strength, extending from Communipaw Cove around the westerly and northerly side of the upland to the river.¹ Within and along this abatis were three block-houses,—one near Communipaw Cove, one a little west of the road, the other east of the road, and all on the edge of the upland. These were designated by the British as the left-hand, centre and right-hand block-houses, numbering northerly.² Along Communipaw Cove was a chain of breast works which covered every portion of that shore. Extending from the southerly to the northerly side of Grand Street, about one hundred feet west of Green Street, was an oblong work or fort mounting three twelve-pounders and one eighteen-pounder, and which (except its gateway) was considered impregnable.³ Within this fort was the magazine. To the southwest of this work, on the line of Sussex Street, about one hundred feet east of Washington Street, was a hill about thirty feet above the present grade, on which was a round redoubt surrounded by an abatis.⁴ On the westerly edge of the lot belonging to St. Matthew's Church, in the middle of the block between Sussex and Grand Streets, was the Indian Spring. On the westerly line of Washington Street, between Sussex and a point a little south of Morris Street, was the burying-ground.

I have now described the situation of Paulus Hoeck, and, as far as I am able, the works for its defense, at the time of Maj. Lee's assault. From this description it will be seen that the position should have been impregnable. Naturally difficult of access except by water, it had been fortified by the appliances of labor and skill until it would seem that nothing more was needed than ordinary care and watchfulness. But this very strength of the post proved its ruin, by inducing a negligence of which the watchful Americans were swift to take advantage.

What troops garrisoned the post in August, 1779? The prisoners taken by the Americans, as we shall presently see, were credited to the Sixty-fourth Regiment, the Garrison Regiment, Van Buskirk's regiment and the artillery. As to the Sixty-fourth, but one man belonging to that regiment was taken. Judging from this and other evidence, we may safely conclude that the Sixty-fourth was not stationed here at the time. The Garrison Regiment spoken of was the Invalid Battalion. Van Buskirk's regiment was the Third Battalion of Skinner's Provincial Brigade, or, in plain words, a lot of New Jersey Tories.⁵ There was also a detachment of artillery under Lieut. Cockburne.⁶ Maj. William Sutherland, of the Invalid Battalion, was in command of the post.

On the 18th of August, Maj. Sutherland determined to send out that night a detachment under Lieut.-Col. Van Buskirk to capture or disperse a body of one hundred rebels near the English Neighborhood.⁷ As the detaching a sufficient body of troops for that pur-been fired, for two reasons: a, to drive off the assailants; b, to give the signal agreed upon between Gen. Pattison and Maj. Sutherland.

Again, the artillerymen were captured in the fort. This was their proper place. If both works mounted artillery, it is reasonable to assume that there were artillerymen in both places. Lieut. Cockburne, the artillery officer on duty at the Hoeck, on receiving the alarm, ran to the fort where his men were and found Lee's force in possession. Why did he not then run to the circular redoubt, where, if artillery was placed, he had men and means of defense? The map of Paulus Hoeck herein inserted as a fac simile of one now in the Congressional Library at Washington. It is without date, and there is no evidence how it got into that library. But from the fact that the Fifty-seventh Regiment is marked there as stationed at the Hoeck, I conclude that the map was made in 1777. The right-hand block-house is not shown on the plan, and this is another proof that it was made before 1779. The map shows artillery in the oblong fort only. Enumeratio unius est exclusio alterius. This maxim would seem to be conclusive that there was no artillery in the round redoubt, but for the fact that it might have been placed therein after the map was made, if, as I believe, it was made prior to 1779. But the fact that no artillery was fired from that redoubt seems to be sufficient to warrant the assertion that there was none in it.

¹ Pennsylvania Packet, Aug. 28, 1779. "Interior of this runs a line of abatis of great strength, which extends to the extreme verges of the island." Irving, "Life of Washington," iii, 512, says: "A creek fordable only in two places rendered the Hook difficult of access. Within this a deep trench had been cut across the isthmus, traversed by a draw-bridge with a barred gate; and still within this was a double row of abatis, extending into the water." Dawson, "Battles of the United States by Land and Sea," i, 343, says: "On the margin of the marsh which separated the Hook from the mainland was a deep creek, fordable only in two places; a short distance inside of this creek a deep ditch had been dug from the river to the bay; . . . about thirty paces within this ditch had been placed a heavy abatis, which extended around the eastern front of the Hook, both on the river and the bay." Marshall, "Life of Washington," iv, 136, says: "Lee past first the creek and then the ditch." If from this it is to be understood that between the creek and the upland a ditch had been dug, there is room to doubt the correctness of the statement. The northerly end of the creek, which extended beyond Newark Avenue at that point, was very small (Vide field map in Winfield's "Land Titles.") When the causeway (now Newark Avenue) was fitted for public travel, in 1764, the crossing of the creek, I doubt not, was filled in and the creek connected with Abasimus Cove by the ditch nearer Warren Street. There is no pretense that there was a draw-bridge at the creek. If no draw-bridge, it was either spanned by a permanent bridge or filled in. In either case, where was the necessity of fording the creek? As to the ditch on the north side of the Hoeck, there never was a creek in that neighborhood.

² The right-hand block-house was also known as "No. 6," which seems to indicate that the fortifications were numbered. There is a tradition that the logs of these block-houses were used in corduroying the causeway across the marsh.

1. The two works were so close together that artillery in both would have been unnecessary and useless.

2. Not a piece of artillery was fired that night. Had this round redoubt mounted six guns, as described, it is almost certain they would have garrison, after Lieut.-Col. Van Buskirk marched out with one hundred and thirty men, was about two hundred. This change in the forces at the Hoek was entirely unknown to the Americans, and Maj. Lee afterwards lamented, as among the many unfortunate short time before, been agreed upon between Gen. Pattison and Maj. Sutherland, which would, without delay, bring from New York the needed succor. The signal agreed upon was the firing of two pieces of artillery and hanging out three lights. We will presently see how the best-laid plans of British officers, as well as of mice, 'gang aft aglee.'

Shortly after the capture of Stony Point plans began to take shape for the surprise of Paulus Hoeck. In Lee's Legion, as captain of the Fourth Company of Foot, was the discreet, active and untiring Allen McLane, of Delaware.¹ It seems to have been the fortune of this vigilant officer—perhaps misfortune, for in this position he made himself so useful that his superiors could not afford to assign him to other duty when this was to be done—to be assigned to observation of the enemy and scouting over the territory between the two armies. While the contending forces lay at Philadelphia and Valley Forge, at New York and the Highlands, and in Virginia, he was especially useful. Nothing escaped his sleepless eye, nor could he be deceived by appearances. He was in command of a party of observation from 1777 to 1781, under the direction of Washington, except from July, 1779, to February, 1781, when he was attached to Lee's Legion, in command of a company of infantry. It was to him that Washington owed much of his information as to the condition of the enemy's works at Stony Point, and which led to the success of that brilliant assault. It was also through him that Maj. Lee obtained information of the negligence of its garrison which suggested the attack on Paulus Hoeck. True, his name does not stand above the ordinary level in the bulletin announcing its successful assault.² The world does not yet know the full extent of his connection with that coup de main, for "it seldom happens that the reapers of the harvest concern themselves about those who sow the seed."³ But as long as Stony Point and Paulus Hoeck shall stand associated with the "most daring and insolent assaults that are to be found in the records of chivalry" the name of Allen McLane cannot be forgotten.

When the idea of assaulting this post was first conceived I do not know, but it seems to have assumed shape in the latter part of July.⁴ From that Lane's company, now attached to the Delaware regiment, and the dismounted dragoons belonging to Major Lee's partisan corps, be formed into a fourth troop and added to the corps; this troop to be commanded by Captain M. Lane, and to serve on foot.'"

² He seems to have been dissatisfied with this want of especial mention. In his MSS., now in possession of the New York Historical Society, he says: "McLane also discovered the situation of Powles Hook in August, . . . which led to the surprise of the post; and Major Lee was the only officer mentioned of the Legion in Lee's report."

MAJ. LEE TO CAPT. MCLANE:

"CAMP HAVENSTRAW, July 30, 1779.

"SIR: You will move your troop to the vicinity of Bergen Town. The object you are to have in view is the interruption of the correspondence and trade now subsisting between the enemy and the disaffected of the county. You are to communicate with Captain Peyton daily. You are time until the eventful night the work to insure the enterprise went quietly and cautiously forward. The first care of Maj. Lee was to be informed of the condition of the roads leading from New Bridge to Bergen, and the passes from the river to the top of the mountain through which an enemy might approach his line of march. As to the roads, one extended from the New Bridge by way of the Liberty Pole, English Neighborhood and Three Pigeons to Bergen. This was the only well-established road. From this road, at what is now Leconia, a road extended eastward to Fort Lee. From the Hackensack turnpike, at Union Hill, up to Bull's Ferry was a rough mountain road. This was on the east brow of the mountain, but ran down the hill just below the ferry, and thence along the river to Fort Lee. There was a rude continuation of this road also on top of the mountain to the road from Fort Lee to the main road. There was also a road which bore to the left from a point just above the Bull's Ferry pass across the mountain to the English Neighborhood. There was also a rough wood road made by the Bergen farmers, over which they hauled their fuel in the winter, on the westerly brow of the mountain, and generally along the line of the present Dallytown road. This probably extended but a short distance, dying out in the woods south of the way or path leading from the ferry to the English Neighborhood. In his report Lee designates this as the central route.

There were three passes between Fort Lee and Paulus Hoeck through which an enemy could pass from the river to the top of the mountain, and thence, by a short march from one to three miles through the woods, to the road leading from Bergen to the Liberty Pole. The first one going north was the ravine of the Awilbaken, the second one was the ravine which lies between Guttenberg and Block-House Point, and the third one was the break or depression in the mountain at Bull's Ferry. Through these passes a retreat along the Bergen road could be easily intercepted.

The plans and preparations for the surprise of Paulus Hoeck seem to have been left in a great measure to Maj. Lee. Before these plans were submitted to Washington, Maj. Lee entered upon practical preparation to carry them out. For this purpose he issued the following orders to Capt. McLane:

"DR. SIR: It is his Excellency's command that you cause the Roads leading from Fort Lee to Bull's Ferry and the intermediate passes from the shore to be obstructed by the falling of trees (the four months' men will be ordered for this service). The Mountain Road from near Fort Lee through the mountains to the Old Bridge near Hobuck to be reconnoitred, and reported whether convenient for the march of Horse and Foot. The distance to be also known. The Marsh at Van Horn's Mills to be examined, the direct route from the New Bridge to the mills to be used and the distance to be ascertained."

The report upon this order is as follows:

"Executed this within orders, the 8th and 9th of August, 1779. Find to keep with you two expresses from the militia who well know the country, necessary quires to be provided. Conduct yourself with perfect caution, or you meet with sure loss and disgrace. Wishing you success, I am, etc."—McLane MSS.

the passes leading through the Mountains from Fort Lee to Bergen to be difficult for foot and impossible for horse, the distance about nine miles to the Hockock bridge. The road by way of Van Horn a much lesswise difficult for foot and impossible for horse, the marsh near the Mill being very. The distance through the fields, three miles.¹

Capt. McLane was the person on whom Maj. Lee seemed to rely in preparing for the grand assault which was soon to be made on Paulus Hoeck. He left Haverstraw in the latter part of July and moved toward "Bargain Woods"² to enter upon his work. From this time until the morning when he took part in the capture of the post, he was, by night and by day, scouting over the territory between Hackensack and Prior's Mill. On the morning of the 18th he received from Maj. Lee the following instructions:

"Take down fifteen good Men, including the Billborn, to proceed by the most secret route to the Vicinity of Bergen, get a private interview with Van Ripper, or—the former—the man, oblige him to go on the Hook any time after Dinner and return in the Evening, meeting Captain McLane at the place to be fixed on. Van Ripper to enquire the News from New York if the fleet is come, etc., etc. Captain McLane to leave Mr. Neil with the Billborn, either posting them himself or giving such directions as they can with secrecy throw themselves in or close to the communication leading from Bergen to Prior's Mill after Dark, and there act as Mr. Neil has been particularly informed.

"When Van Ripper returns, Captain McLane will convey him to the place in the Woods where Major Lee, Major Burnett and all hands set down on our Letters from Remondette. There Major Lee will be found and will expect to see Captain McLane, and the remainder of the men, who are on no account to challenge on the approach of any Person or Persons.

"The greatest Secrecy to be observed, a seeming indifference to be put on.

"Mr. Neil and Parry will not take post till after Dark. If Captain McLane meets with the guides, etc. he will send each back to meet Major Lee.

"No other necessary hints occur to me. Captain McLane will easily perceive the Degree of Secrecy and address to be made use of on the occasion.

"Mr. Neil's party never to challenge on any account."³

The position of Cornet Neil was at Prior's Mill, and his duty there was to "lay the bridge" over Mill Creek and communicate with the boats at Douw's Ferry.

On this night Capt. McLane lay in the woods near Three Pigeons, waiting for the arrival of Maj. Lee to conduct him to Paulus Hoeck.

While the work of preparation was going on, Maj. Lee had conferences with the commander-in-chief, and on the 9th of August submitted his plan, both of attack and retreat. It was well concerted, but did not entirely satisfy Washington. What this plan was does not appear; but from the fact that on that very day Lee's men were throwing obstructions in the roads and passes between Fort Lee and Weehawken, it is probable that it embraced the route which he was afterwards forced to take on his retreat. On looking over this plan, Washington deemed "the attempt too hazardous and not warranted by the magnitude of the object." In a letter to Maj. Lee, written on the 10th of August, Washington suspended the attempt unless it could be made in a manner less hazardous than that shown on Lee's plan. The British were encamped in full force on the opposite bank of the Hudson, and by throwing troops across the river and penetrating the mountain through the passes already described, could strike a damaging blow, if not entirely cut off a retreat on the Bergen Road. Washington, therefore, suggested an approach and retreat by water, a collection of boats at Elizabethtown as if for an attack upon Staten Island, and then at night to move up Newark Bay and land at a point within two miles of the post. He desired Maj. Lee to turn his "thoughts this way."⁴ It is possible that this suggestion first opened to Lee a retreat by way of Douw's Ferry,⁵ Schuyler's road, Polly Fly and Hackensack. This route would place, at the commencement of the retreat, an impassable river between himself and his pursuers. To make his way feasible, Capt. Peyton⁶ was detached to provide boats and have them at the ferry on the Hackensack in time to carry over the retreating forces and their prisoners. He brought them from Pluckemin to Newark on the preceding evening, and during the night they were taken to the appointed place. It was not the object of the expedition to fight a battle or hold the post after it was taken, but to strike a sudden blow, capture the garrison and immediately retreat, without losing time to remove or destroy property, or even to collect those who might skulk and hide.⁷

Thus the way is prepared for the approach of the attacking force. Let us now go to the headquarters of Maj. Lee, and join him in his approach to Paulus Hoeck. He was stationed about two miles from the Paramus Church on the road leading to Kakiat.⁸ From this point he took up his line of march, on Wednesday, the 18th of August, at half-past ten o'clock in the morning, en route for the New Bridge, with two companies of Maryland troops under Capt.

⁵ The following letter, written somewhat blindly, but without doubt fully understood by Captain McLane, shows where his headquarters were:

Maj. Lee to Capt. McLane.

August 18, 1779.

"I thank you for the intelligence conveyed in your two letters. I wish you to continue using your endeavors to penetrate into the ~~strong~~ of the enemy. Know positively whether any troops have arrived or will arrive, know also concerning the French fleet. Let me hear from you when necessary. Direct your letters to Paramus, two miles on the road from the church to Kakiat Meeting-House. Do not harbor your men. I have an intention to mount a corporal and six of your troop to act always with you, in the mean time impress expresser.

² The "Bargain Woods" lay on the mountain adjoining the North River, and extended from the Hackensack road, at Union Hill, on the south to Bull's Ferry. These woods were so called because nearly all this part of the common land was allotted to the people owning land around Bergen.

³ McLane MSS.

Lexiu Handy. At this place he was joined by three hundred Virginians, under Maj. Clark,¹ and Capt. McLane's dismounted dragoons,² numbering in all between four and five hundred men.³ Here he made known to his forces the order of attack and disposition of march, in which was the following address:

"Major Lee is so assured of the gallantry of the officers and men under his command that he feels exhortation useless; he therefore only requires the most profound secrecy. He pronounces death as the immediate fate of any soldier who may violate in the slightest degree the silence he has ordered to be observed. He recommends to his officers to add to the vigor of their attacks the advantage of surprise; therefore to continue occult till the moment of action. Success is not at the will of mortals; all they can do is to deserve it. Be this our determination and this our counsel, and we shall have cause to triumph, even in adversity. Watchword, Be firm."⁴

From the New Bridge he took up his line of march at five o'clock in the afternoon, with Capt. Handy's command in the advance.⁵ For the purpose of diverting suspicion, a number of wagons joined the expedition to give it the appearance of a foraging party.⁶ Patrols of horse were detached to watch communications with the North River, and parties of infantry stationed at different roads. What portion of his force was put upon this service is not known, and perhaps is not ascertainable. He followed the lower road through the English Neighborhood to a point not known, when he filed into the mountains. But as he followed the Bergen road lower than he intended, and as it was but a "short march" from that point to Paulus Hock, and as Capt. McLane then lay in the woods near Three Pigeons waiting for the arrival of Maj. Lee, it is probable that he entered the Bergen woods but a short distance to the north of New Durham. The object of this act was manifestly to avoid discovery. Through the "timidity or treachery" of the principal guide, his troops became entangled in the "deep mountainous woods," and three precious hours were wasted before they regained their route. Yet possibly these hours, so important to the expedition, were fortunate hours to Lee; for Lieut.-Col. Van Buskirk, with one hundred and thirty men, had left the Hock about nine o'clock that night on a raid to the English Neighborhood, and must have passed up the Bergen road while Maj. Lee was floundering in the swamps lying between Guttenberg and Union Hill. At this time his force became separated, so that only one hundred and fifty men reached Paulus Hock. There is reason to believe there was more design than accident in this separation, so far as some of his men were concerned. Jealousy led nearly one-half of the Virginians to desert him, and those who remained with the expedition were not the most vigorous to second the endeavors of their commanding officer.⁷

When the troops became disentangled, and had regained their route, it is probable that they came down the hill by the road leading to the Weehawken Ferry, and then by the way of Hoboken and the upland of Ahasimus, passing by file over the narrow causeways and wading the creeks through the marshes.⁸

"The usual time for such exploits," as Washington observed when planning the attack on Stony Point, "is a little before day, for which reason a vigilant officer is then more on the watch. I therefore recommend a midnight hour."⁹ This recommendation was incorporated in Lee's plan of attack. The time designated for the assault was at half-past twelve o'clock. In addition to a negligent watch, this hour would have given the attacking force the advantage of ebb tide in crossing the ditch, more time for the destruction of the works, and opportunity to retreat before daylight.

The design was to attack the post at three different points,¹⁰ but on reaching the place where he was to divide his force for that purpose which I take to be the upland of Ahasimus near the northerly end of the causeway, Maj. Lee found this plan impracticable, "both from the near approach of day and the rising of the tide." Before reaching this point, Lieut. Rudolph had been detached to reconnoiter and fathom the passages of the ditch at the three several places where the separate columns should pass. But it was now after three o'clock; the tide was approaching half-flood, when the ditch would be impassable. Without a moment's delay, Maj. Lee ordered the troops to advance in the position they then were, without regard to the punctilios of honor or rank, and dispatched a messenger to Cornet Neil at Prior's Mill to inform him of the delay in the attack, and to direct him to communicate with Capt. Peyton. Just at this time Lieut. Rudolph returned and reported that all was silence within the works; that he had fathomed the canal, and found the passage on the central route still admissible. As they were entering the marsh, between Henderson and Warren Streets, Maj. Clark informed Maj. Lee of the

1. Captain Handy (vide Appendix, xii.) says: "We had a march of pass of upwards two miles, the greatest part of which we were obliged to pass by files, and several canals to ford up to our breast in water." No other route would answer these conditions. The one I have indicated answers them fully. There was the marsh north of the upland of Hoboken, and the marsh between Hoboken and Ahasimus, both crossed by a narrow and ill-constructed wagon way, and permeated by small tide-streams.

2. When Lee moved to the attack, he dispatched a messenger to Cornet Neil at Prior's Mill, probably directing him to communicate with Capt. Peyton, and inform him of the hour of attack. The sending a messenger seems to imply that Lee had not been at Prior's Mill, and certainly had not seen Cornet Neil. He had apprehensions about the boats, owing to the lateness of the hour. It was natural and prudent that he should send word to Neil and Peyton of the change in the hour of attack. Why should Lee have sent the messenger if he had just left Neil at the mill? That officer would have known of the delay in the attack, and could have received orders in person.

defection of the Virginians. This must have been a severe blow to him, but at such a supreme moment nothing could daunt this intrepid leader. True, it seriously diminished the number of his attacking force, and deprived him of the aid of several officers of distinguished merit. It was, however, equal to the occasion, in spite of the defection "and every other dumb sign" which indicated lack of hearty co-operation, and pushed on to the attack.¹ He had resolved to capture the post or leave his dead body within the enemy's lines. The information brought by Lieut. Rudolph was passed from front to rear and the troops moved forward with resolution, order and coolness. They marched in three solid columns, "with bayonets, pikes open, cocks fallen," in the most profound silence. The right column, under Maj. Clark, and the centre column, under Capt. Forsyth, were preceded by the forlorn hopes, led by Lieut. McAllister, of the Marylanders, and Lieut. Rudolph, of the Legion D'Armes, to assault the works on either flank. The left column, under Capt. Handy, was to move against the front, and to act as a reserve should one be found necessary. So silently did they advance, and so unsuspecting was the garrison of any attack, that they were either not discovered, or were thought to be Van Buskirk's force returning until the forlorn hopes plunged into the ditch.² Instantly the enemy opened a musketry fire from the block-houses, but the Americans pressed forward and broke through all opposition. The forlorn under McAllister, supported by the right column, immediately on passing the abatis filed to the right, and captured the fort before a piece of artillery could be fired and "re-echoed the watchword."³ This gallant lieutenant was fortunate enough to capture the British flag.⁴ The centre column, with Lieut. Armstrong leading the advance, filed to the left, and captured the right-hand block-house and the officers and men stationed there. The left column moved forward in support of the whole.

Within the fortifications this audacious and unexpected assault caused the utmost consternation. A soldier rushed to the hut where Lieut. Cockburne was sleeping, within thirty yards of the fort, and gave him the alarm. The lieutenant ran to the fort, but found Maj. Lee's force in possession. He then fled to the left-hand block-house, and thus saved himself from capture. At the first alarm Maj. Sutherland, with Capt. Van Schallern and twenty-five Hessians,⁵ escaped through the darkness into the round redoubt⁶ and opened an irregular fire upon the assailants.⁷ But in a few minutes⁸ Maj. Lee had possession of the works, excepting this redoubt and the left-hand block-house. It is very probable that the firing from the redoubt, and the alarm thereby given, had more to do with preventing the Americans getting into the magazine than the alleged failure to find the key, or to obtain means to break it open.⁹

It was now four o'clock. The firing of guns in New York and from the ships in the harbor proved that the alarm was completely given.¹⁰ The ammunition having been destroyed when crossing the ditch, Maj. Lee's men had not fired a musket during the assault. They had no means to dislodge Maj. Sutherland and the Hessians. The ammunition in the magazine was beyond their reach. The barracks contained some sick soldiers, women and children, and humanity forbade their destruction. To spike the guns was useless, to bring them off impossible. The British, being now on the alert, could in a short time cross to the Hoeck in large bodies. The expedition thus far had been successful. The post had been surprised and its garrison captured. The next consideration was to effect a safe retreat with the prisoners. Because of this strict compliance with the orders of Washington, and the plain dictates of ordinary prudence, the enemy affected to sneer at the victorious assailants.¹¹ That

Patton, Appendix xi, "a captain and twenty-five Hessians;" I credit the last number. Only forty-one Hessians were sent over to Paulus Hoek on the 18th to increase the force of the garrison in Van Buskirk's absence. Eleven of these were captured. This would leave but thirty on the Hoek. If some of the killed were Hessians (which is probable), these left could not have exceeded the number mentioned by Gen. Patton. Life of Washington, Appendix, xv.

¹ There has been a variety of statements as to what works Lee's forces captured, and into what Maj. Sutherland and the Hessians threw themselves. Sir Henry Clinton and the historians Murray and Stehman say the Americans carried a block-house and two redoubts, and that Sutherland was in a redoubt. Gordon and Irving say Sutherland entered a block-house on the left of the fort. Maj. Shaw says Sutherland was in "a little enclosed work inside the main one." Marshall says there were "a fort, three block-houses and some redoubts." The Brandywine Pocket of Aug. 28, 1779, Appendix, xvi, speaks of a "grand fort," an "impregnable fort assisted by a chain of redoubts." But Gen. Patton (Appendix, xi) who wrote with a plan of the works before him, says the Americans captured the principal fort and the right-hand and centre block-houses, while the "Round Redoubt" in which Maj. Sutherland was, and the left-hand block-house were defended.

enemy had fled from the charge of the bold one hundred and fifty, yet had the courage to criticise the manner of "making a retreat from under the very nose of the enemy's whole force."¹ If they did not move with sufficient grace to suit such fastidious taste, the bold defendants should have considered the fact that each American had his prisoner, and yet there were nine! With the enemy's ships-of-war in the harbor, their headquarters one mile away, and their army stretching for nine miles along the line of his retreat, Maj. Lee acted with prudence by retiring with all possible dispatch. Maj. Clark, with the right column and the greater part of the prisoners, was put in motion over the causeway. Capt. Handy followed with the left and the remainder of the prisoners. Lieuts. Armstrong and Reed, with the centre, formed the rear guard. At the commencement of the retreat Capt. Forsyth was sent forward to Prior's Mill to collect men from the different columns most fit for action, and take post on the heights of Bergen, to cover the retreat. When Maj. Lee, who remained with the rear of his retreating forces, reached Prior's Mill he was surprised to hear from Cornet Neil that the messenger sent to him previous to the attack had not arrived, nor had he heard from Capt. Peyton. Apprehending some disappointment in regard to the boats, he rode forward and reached the advance when near the ferry. To his dismay, not a boat was to be seen. It had been understood by Capt. Peyton that Maj. Lee would be at the ferry before daylight, but in the morning, no intelligence having arrived, he supposed the attack had been postponed. The danger of his situation, the fear that the discovery of the boats would disclose the design and prevent its execution on a subsequent night, induced him to retire with the boats to Newark.² The retreating forces were pouring down Cherry Lane leading to the ferry, anxious to place the Hackensack between themselves and the enemy who were hastening their preparations to pursue. Maj. Lee immediately countermarched his troops to the "road leading from the town to the English Neighborhood," afterwards known as the Bergenwood road.³ He dispatched a messenger to Lord Stirling, who had moved from his camp at Ramapo to the New Bridge, for assistance, and then returned to the rear guard at Prior's Mill. As he stood upon the bridge near this mill in the early gray of that morning, and thought of the difficult march before him, the possible ruin of all his plans, and the certainty of a vigorous pursuit by an insulted foe, he was overwhelmed by the gloomy prospect. He speaks of this in his report:

"Oppressed by every possible misfortune, at the head of troops worn down by a rapid march of thirty miles through mountains, swamps and morasses, without the least nourishment during the whole march, ammunition destroyed, encumbered with prisoners and a retreat of fourteen miles to make good, on a route admissible of interception at several points by a march of two, three and four miles: one body moving in our rear, another in all probability well advanced on our right, a retreat naturally impossible on our left, . . . my sole dependence was in the persevering gallantry of the officers and the obstinate courage of the troops."

But the shouts of his soldiers when informed of the approach of the enemy dispelled all doubt in case of a conflict. He was entirely without ammunition, but the bayonet had done its service in the attack, and on it was his reliance for defence. The whole force now moved as rapidly as possible. On reaching the Hackensack road at Union Hill, Maj. Lee divided his force. Maj. Clark's column, with the prisoners, took the road by way of Three Pigeons and the English Neighborhood. In his rear, on the same road, moved the centre column. To guard against an attack upon the right flank of these columns by forces penetrating the mountain through the passes leading from the river, Capt. Handy, with the left column, took the road on the bank of the river, now known as the Bull's Ferry road. Just after this disposition had been made, Capt. Catlett, of the Second Virginia Regiment, came up at the head of fifty men with good ammunition, a portion of which was distributed among the different columns. With Capt. Catlett and his force, Maj. Lee took the centre route. It is probable that both detachments moving on the mountain deflected to the left on reaching a point just above Bull's Ferry, and joined the two columns moving on the main road at the English Neighborhood. As the rear approached the Fort Lee road, at the place now called Leonia, they met Col. Ball, with two hundred men, who had been pushed forward by Lord Stirling to support the retreat. Col. Ball moved on and took position to meet the enemy, who were in rapid pursuit. Early in the morning Lieut. Col. Cosmo Gordon had been sent from New York with the flank companies of the guard and one hundred men from the brigade and nearly the same number of Hessians. He took command of the post, and sent out Maj. Sutherland, with one light infantry company of the guard under Capt. Dundass, and another light infantry company, consisting of ninety rank and file under Capt. Maynard, in pursuit of Maj. Lee.⁴ This was the party which now confronted Col. Ball. But they thought it prudent to halt before coming in contact with the victorious Americans.⁵

While Maj. Lee was pushing along between the Fort Lee road and the Liberty Pole, Lieut.-Col. Van Baskirk emerged from the woods upon the right, marched through the fields to the road and opened fire on the rear of the retreating forces. Maj. Lee ordered Lieut. Reed to face them, while Lieut. Rudolph, with a party, threw himself into a stone house which commanded the road. This checked Van Buskirk, and gave the retreating forces time to cross the creek at the Liberty Pole. Col. Ball, now finding a detachment of the enemy between him and Maj. Lee, and taking it for granted that this was only the advanced corps of a much larger body, made a circuit to avoid the contact with them. Van Buskirk, finding a detachment he had not expected, took the same means to secure his own retreat.¹ Without further molestation, Lee arrived at the New Bridge at one o'clock in the afternoon, "after a march of upward of eighty miles in three days."²

The prisoners taken in the surprise of Paulus Hoeck numbered one hundred and fifty-nine, viz:

Sixty-fourth Regiment.—One captain.

Garrison Regiment.—Six sergeants, sixty-seven rank and file.

Van Buskirk's regiment.—One surgeon, one surgeon's mate, one quartermaster, four subalterns, two sergeants, thirty-nine rank and file.

Hessians.—One sergeant, ten rank and file.

Artificers.—Two.

Inhabitants.—Ten.

Artillery.—One sergeant, one corporal, two gunners, nine mattresses.

The surgeon was released on parole. On the following day Lord Stirling sent the prisoners to Philadelphia, where, on the 26th we leave them "safely lodged in the New Gaol."³

The number of killed and wounded on the side of the British is somewhat uncertain. In the nature of things it was impossible for the attacking force to make a correct estimate. Lord Stirling says, "the killed and wounded left behind is uncertain, as it was necessary for the troops to come off before the day appeared." Maj. Lee reported "not more than fifty of the enemy killed and wounded."⁴ Marshall says,

"very few of the British were killed."⁵ Dundas says, "a few of the British were killed at the first charge."⁶ Irving says, "few of the enemy were slain."⁷ Gordon estimates the number at about thirty.⁸ Holmes, Lossing, Wilson and Allen say, "thirty were killed."⁹ Thatcher says, "about forty were killed."¹⁰ Dawson says fifty were bayoneted.¹¹ Capt. Handy, who led one of the attacking columns, says, "we put fifty to the bayonet."¹² Gen. Pattison, in his report to Lord Townshend,¹³ says: "By the returns I have received there were killed four sergeants, two corporals and three privates, wounded, two sergeants." That the general estimate of killed is too high is beyond doubt. One hundred and fifty-nine were captured and twenty-six were in the redoubt with Maj. Sutherland. This makes one hundred and eighty-six. How many were in the left-hand block-house is not known. But besides them, if fifty were killed, the garrison numbered two hundred and thirty-six. This figure is too high. I am inclined to give credence to the British account of their loss.

On the side of the Americans there seems to be no discrepancy as to the number of killed and wounded. These were five in all,—two killed and three wounded. Among the latter was Ezekiel Clark, one of Capt. M'Lane's men, who had the end of his nose shot off. Alas! how fickle is fortune and how fallible is fame! Two of his companions left their bodies in "th' imminent deadly breach," and perhaps their bones are now resting at the crossing of two busy streets in Dummer's hog-head,¹⁴ while their names are unknown. Two of his companions were wounded, perhaps more severely than himself, yet their names have sunk in the dull waters of Lethe. But as for Ezekiel, the country knows him because he lost his nose!¹⁵

We have now described the capture of Paulus Hoeck and its circumstances as minutely as we are able from the facts within our reach. The Americans were in ecstacy over it, as they had a right to be. The enemy, while attempting to belittle its results, were forced to acknowledge its brilliancy. Thus friend and foe characterized it: "The splendid enterprise of Paulus

² Ibid. Appendix, vi. As to the date of this event, it is surprising that so many writers have gone astray. Error seems to be immortal. Capt. Handy, who commanded the left column, wrote to his brother a letter, dated July 19th, in which he described the event. The following works fix the date of July 19th: "Appleton's Encyclopedia," title "Henry Lee"; Allen's "American Revolution," ii, 248; Gordon's "History Am. War," iii, 284; Lossing's "Pictorial History of the U. S.," 217; Wilson's "American History," 388; Holmes' "Annals of the U. S.," ii, 309; Ramsay's "History of the Am. Rev.," ii, 109; and Snowden's "Medit. Memorials of Washington," 65, with the medal before him. Murray's "War in America," ii, 169, gives July 15th as the date; Hildreth's "History of the U. S.," iii, 284, gives August 18th; and Ollive's "History of the U. S.," ii, 364, says August 20th. In "Lee's Memoirs" (ed. 1876), 21, it is said the forces "set out the 23th of August upon their dangerous expedition." But Schenckler, "Life and Times of Washington," in vol. I, 689, says July 19th, and in vol. ii, 91, August 20th. Two dates, and both wrong.

Hoeck; "a little stroke in the surprise of Paulus Hoeck . . . a brilliant transaction;"² "a bold and successful attack;"³ "a coup de main of splendid audacity;"⁴ "an enterprise sufficiently daring in the design and extremely well conducted in the onset;"⁵ "the situation of the post rendered the attempt critical and the success brilliant." "This affair, for the size of it, may be ranged with the most heroic actions of the war, considering the peculiar position of Paulus Hoeck and its being garrisoned by 200 men. A daring and dangerous enterprise."⁶ "The attempt was daring, the difficulties many, the success uncertain, and the retreat, admitting the enterprise to succeed, from the situation of the place and its vicinity to New York, exceedingly precarious."⁷ "A daring and brilliant enterprise."⁸ "One of the most daring and insolent assaults to be found in the records of chivalry; an achievement so brilliant in itself, so romantic in the scale of British admiration, that none but a hero inspired by the fortitude, instructed by the wisdom and guided by the planet of Washington, could, by the exploit at Paulus Hook, have furnished materials in the page of history to give it a parallel."⁹ Congress adopted resolutions thanking Maj. Lee "for the remarkable prudence, address and bravery displayed by him on the occasion." They ordered to be struck a gold medal¹⁰ "emblematical of this affair," and appropriated fifteen thousand dollars for distribution among the soldiers engaged in the attack.¹¹ Washington placed the surprise of Paulus Hoeck and the capture of its garrison, within cannon-shot of New York, alongside of the storming of Stony Point.¹² Lafayette wrote to Major Lee: "The more I have considered the situation of Paulus Hook, the more I have admired your enterprising spirit and all your conduct in that business."¹³ Holmes, speaking of Stony Point, says: "This enterprise was followed by another that 'equaled' it in boldness of design."¹⁴ In General Orders, under date of Aug. 22, 1779, the commander-in-chief said:

"The General has the Pleasure to inform the Army that on the Night of the 18th Instant, Major Lee at the Head of a Party composed of his own Corps and Detachments from the Virginia and Maryland Lines surprised the Garrison at Powles Hook, and brought off a considerable Number of Prisoners with very little Loss on our Side.

"The Enterprise was executed with a distinguished Degree of Address, Activity and Bravery and does great Honor to Major Lee and to all the Officers and Men under his Command, who are requested to receive the General's warmest Thanks."

But beneath this wave of popular enthusiasm over an event which should have been cause for general congratulation there was a strong undertow working against Maj. Lee. Great men and brilliant reputations always have been and always will be subject to this undertow. Jealousy is all-sufficient in small minds to justify the meanest actions. It is not the men who labor most or give most to crown with success an enterprise who indulge in detraction or hostile criticism, but those who are either incapable of comprehending matters of pith and moment or too base to applaud the success of another.

We have already seen that in the swamps of the Bergen Woods a part of Maj. Lee's force became separated from the expedition. In his report he substantially attributed this to accident. But in this, as in many other important affairs, accident has been forced to bear more than its just burden. Among the Virginians who joined Lee were a few who were jealous of him. The fact that he held a separate command may have removed them from sympathy with him or his plans. The expedition to which they were now ordered, if successful, would raise him yet higher in official and popular estimation. They claimed that several of their officers were injured by reason of Maj. Lee having been given the command. It was claimed that Maj. Clark's commission antedated Lee's, and that by military usage he was justly entitled to the command. It was said that, to surmount this difficulty, Maj. Lee had misrepresented the date of his commission, giving it an older date than it really bore.¹ Whatever justification there may have been for these charges, we are not left in doubt as to Maj. Lee's counter-charge that about one-half of the Virginians deserted him, and those who remained with him were lukewarm in their support.² After the enterprise was a success these discontents, as strenuously as the British, sought to belittle its results. They echoed the taunts of the enemy, that Maj. Lee left the Hoeck in a great hurry, that he did not capture all of the garrison, did no damage to the works, did not blow up the magazine, did not fire the barracks, did not spike the guns.³ That these charges suggested, if they did not express, a falsehood was a matter of no concern to these disappointed patriots. As unreasonable as they were, they were sufficient for the purpose. A cabal was formed against Maj. Lee.⁴ He was arrested and tried before a court-martial upon eight charges.⁵ He defended himself before the court in an eloquent review of the facts, and concluded as follows: "I have now gone through with my defense, and, after thanking the court for their attention and the patience with which they have heard me, I have only to beg, that whatever may be their decision, it may be pointed. If I have misbehaved, punish me with severity; but if it shall appear that I have done my duty, and that the prosecution is groundless and vexatious, I trust, Gentlemen, you will tell the world so."⁶ Of course, he was speedily and honorably acquitted and his enemies silenced.⁷

But Maj. Lee was not the only one who was subjected to the uncertain finding of a court-martial for this Paulus Hoeck affair. Gen. Pattison said, "the enterprise, bold as it was, succeeded but too well, and little to the Honor of the Defendants." He, therefore, ordered Maj. Sutherland under arrest and to prepare for trial before a court-martial upon a charge of general misconduct as commandant at Paulus Hook on the 19th instant. This order was made on the day the garrison was captured. He also ordered two brigadier-generals and three field officers to assemble at Paulus Hoeck at ten o'clock on the morning of the 20th "to make an Enquiry into the Causes of the Affront suffered there from the enemy this morning." As the result of the trial the major was found not guilty, was honorably acquitted and released from arrest.⁸

It did not, however, fare so well with poor Sergt. John Taswell, of Van Buskirk's battalion, who was on duty at the left-hand block-house at the time of the assault. He was gravely barged with quitting his post, when it was only Hobson's choice with him,—run away or be captured. But "the 13th Article of the 14th Section of the Articles of War" could not be trifled with. Did it not say that a soldier must not quit his post, even if a good retreat is better than a bad stand? What if one hundred and fifty men, with one hundred and fifty bayonets at his breast, said he must leave, either for the "Round Redoubt," whither Maj. Sutherland and his twenty-six Hessians had fled, or for the "New Gaol" at Philadelphia, to which secure retreat his one hundred and fifty-eight companions were about to take up their line of march.

The post had suffered an "affront," and some one must be made a scape-goat to bear the iniquity of that affront. The gallant major had already been honorably acquitted; therefore John Taswell must be tried for quitting his post in a shameful and scandalous manner. The unfortunate sergeant was found guilty, and duly "sentenced to suffer Death by being hanged by the Neck until he is Dead." The time named for the taking off of Sergeant John was Thursday, the 9th of September, "between the Hours of Nine and Twelve, within the Garrison at Paulus Hook."⁹ But on the morning of that day the former good character of Taswell came to his relief, and it pleased the commander-in-chief to grant him a free pardon and discharge from his Majesty's service,¹⁰—a service into which as a Jerseyman he never should have entered.

With this pardon and discharge ends the story of the surprise and capture of Paulus Hoeck. That there was nothing during the course of the whole war more brilliant, more audacious, more dangerous or more successful was the testimony of friend and foe. Indeed, the records of ancient and modern times, of chivalry and romance, may be searched and but few human efforts can be found to rise above it in the scale of admiration. By that brave act this spot was consecrated to perpetual remembrance.

From the 19th of August, 1779, until the 22d of November, 1783,—our Evacuation day,—the British remained in the undisturbed possession of the place. On that day they folded their tents, like the poetical Arab, and silently stole away,—and Paulus to England, the Tories to Nova Scotia,—and Paulus Hoeck was left free to become Jersey City.

APPENDIX.—CORRESPONDENCE AND ORDERS REFERRED TO IN PRECEDING CHAPTER

I.—GEN. PATTISON TO LIEUT.-COL. VAN BUSKIRK.

"New York, July 22d 1779.

Having found it necessary to prevent Persons of Suspicious Characters from passing and re-passing to and from this City: I have issued a Proclamation for regulating Boats, Small Craft, and Country People passing therein.

"I have directed the Police to furnish you with Blank Recommendations for such People as you may think may be trusted with Boats to attend this Market from Bergen Shore below Pauls Hook, also blank Permissions for such Persons as you may think proper to allow to pass with Country produce to the City."—New York Historical Society's Collections, 1875.

II.—GEN. WASHINGTON TO MAJ. LEE.

"Head Quarters West Point 10 August 1779.

"I have received your letter of yesterday with its enclosures. The plan you propose for the attack of Paulus Hook, and for making good the retreat of the party, is well concerted, and such as would be most likely to succeed, if the enterprise were to be carried into execution. But upon the whole, in the present position of the enemy's army, I should deem the attempt too hazardous, and not warranted by the magnitude of the object. We should lose more in case of failure, than we could gain in case of success; and a single deserter, or disaffected inhabitant, may disclose the design and involve the party in ruin. The idea I had of the matter was, that it might not require more than three hundred men. It becomes the less eligible from the greater number you think requisite, which is too great to expose to any material danger. These considerations induce me to suspend the attempt till a more favorable opportunity, unless it can be made in a manner less hazardous. The manner I have in view is by water, by way of Newark Bay. Boats may be collected near Elizabethtown, so as to threaten Staten Island.

"The party intended for the enterprise may either embark there, proceed up the bay, and land within two or three miles of the post, or it may meet the boats near Newark, embark there, and cross directly over. The doubt is, whether, notwithstanding the collection of the boats would look immediately towards Staten Island, it may not also give the alarm for Paulus Hook, and put them upon their guard. This, I think, is somewhat to be apprehended. I would however wish you to turn your thoughts this way, and give me your opinion as to the probability of success."—Writings of Washington, vi., 317.

III.—ORDERS.

"Colonel Gordon will please to bring back his whole Detachment to New York as soon as Col. Buskirk's Corps is returned within the Posts at Paulus Hook, and will likewise bring over at the same time the party of Hessians, who were sent from hence last night, and ten of the Number that went this Morning, and will leave a Captain, one Sub'n & 50 Hessians to remain at Paulus Hook, till they are relieved, which will be to-morrow Morning.

"New York August 19 1779.

"Sir I am directed by Major Gen'l Pattison to acknowledge the Receipt of your letter, which informed him of Col. Buskirk and his Party having returned, but as he imagines the Men of your Garrison must be much fatigued, he has ordered a Captain and 50 Hessians to remain at Paulus Hook as a Reinforcement, but which will be relieved to-morrow.

"The Commander in Chief having signify'd to Major Gen'l Pattison his Orders for assembling a Board of General and Field Officers to-morrow Morning at Paulus Hook, to examine into the Affront given to that Post this morning. The General has been pleas'd to direct that Brig'r Gen'l Martin & Garth, with Lieut. Col's Martin & McPherson & a Field Officer of the Guards, do compose the same, and will assemble at 10 o'Clock in the Morning. You will care that all the Officers of your Post will attend at that Hour, & the Captain & two other Officers, (Hessians) who were engaged in the conflict must also attend the Board; if any of them have cross'd over they shall be ordered to return.

VI.—LORD STIRLING TO JOHN JAY.

"Paramis August 20, 1779.

"I moved from the camp at Ramopogh to Hackensack New Bridge, that evening I sent off Major Lee who had taken great pains to gain a knowledge of the enemy's situation, with about 400 men, in order to surprize the garrison at Powles Hook, which they effected before daylight the next morning, and brought off 160 prisoners which I have sent on to Philadelphia. The killed and wounded left behind is uncertain, as it was necessary for the troops to come off before the day appeared. They are all returned safe to camp, with the loss of not more than four or five, after a march of upward of eighty miles in less than three days. Further particulars you will no doubt receive through his Excellency Gen. Washington. This I write on my way to camp at Romopogh."—Pennsylvania Packet, Aug. 24, 1779.

"On Thursday morning at about half an hour past three o'clock a detachment from Lord Stirling's division, consisting of about six hundred men, attempted a coup de main upon the garrison at Powles Hook, which was attacked by one hundred rebels, the rest being posted on the heights of Bergen to secure a retreat; this succeeded as far as to carry off, as we are informed, twelve of the Royal artillery, twelve Hessians and a sergeant with some invalids. They were repulsed by Major Sutherland who commanded at that post. The preceding evening Colonel Baskirk had marched with a detachment of upwards of one hundred and 30 men from the garrison, upon an enterprise to the English Neighborhood.

"Early in the morning a detachment from the brigade of the Guards, and the Hessians, landed at Paul's Hoek—Major Sutherland with a part of the light infantry, commanded by the Hon. Capt. Maynard, pursued the fugitive rebels, took Capt. Neals, of Virginia, and six privates of the assaulting party, who were yesterday morning lodged en prison.

"The Guards returned with their prisoners about 6 o'clock, after having marched near 30 miles without halting. Had the tide proved favorable, not a single animal of the rebel host would have escaped. Col Baskirk on his return, killed a number and brought into Powles Hook three prisoners."—Washington's Royal Gazette, Aug. 21 1779.

VIII.—GEN. WASHINGTON TO PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS.

"Head-Quarters, West Point, August 23, 1779.

"I have the honor to inclose your Excellency Major Lee's report of the surprise and capture of the garrison of Paul's Hoek. The Major displayed a remarkable degree of prudence, address, enterprise and bravery upon this occasion, which does him the highest honor, as himself and to all the officers and men under his command. The situation of this post rendered the attack critical, and the success brilliant; it was made in consequence of information that the garrison was in a state of negligent security, which the event has justified.

"I am much indebted to Major-General Lord Stirling for the judicious measures he took to forward the enterprise, and to secure the retreat of the party.

"Lieut. McAllister, who will have the honor of delivering these despatches, will present Congress with the standard of the garrison which fell into his possession during the attack. Major Lee speaks of this gentleman's conduct in the highest terms.

"P. S. The report not having been received till this day, prevented a speedier transmission. Major Lee mentions 29 men lost on our side; Captain Rudolph informs that since the report was concluded, several of the missing had returned, which will lessen the supposed loss near one-half.

MAJ. LEE'S REPORT TO GEN. WASHINGTON.

"August 21, 1779.

"Sir Lord Stirling was pleased to communicate to your Excellency my verbal report to his Lordship of the 19th instant. I now do myself the honor to present a particular relation of the enterprise which your Excellency was pleased to commit to my direction.

"I took command of the troops employed on this occasion, on the 19th. They amounted to four hundred infantry, composed of detachments of the Virginia and Maryland divisions, and one troop of Continental dragoons.

"The troops moved from the vicinity of the New Bridge about four o'clock P. M. Patrols of horses being detached to watch the communications with the North River, and parties of infantry stationed at the different avenues leading to Powles Hoek. My anxiety to render the march as easy as possible induced me to pursue the Bergen road lower than I intended. After filing into the mountains, the timidity or treachery of the principal guide prolonged a short march into a march of three hours; by this means the troops were exceedingly harassed, and being obliged to pass through deep, mountainous woods to regain our route, some parties of the rear were unfortunately separated. This affected me most sensibly, as it not only diminished the number of the men destined for the assault, but deprived me of the aid of several officers of distinguished merit.

"On reaching the point of separation, I found my first disposition impracticable, both from the near approach of day, and the rising of the tide. Not a moment being to spare, I paid no attention to the position of honor or rank, but ordered the troops to advance in their then disposition. Lieutenant Rudolph, whom I had previously detached to reconnoitre the passages of the canal, returned to me at this point of time, and reported that all was quiet within the works; that he had followed the canal, and found the passage on the centre route still admissible. This intervening intelligence was immediately communicated from front to rear, and the troops pushed on with that resolution, vigor, and confidence, which insure success.

"The forlorn hopes, led by Lieutenant McAllister of the Maryland, and Lieutenant Rudolph of the dragoons, marched on with trailed arms in the most profound silence. Such was the singular address of these two gentlemen, that the first notice to the garrison was the British plunging into the canal. A firing immediately commenced from the block-house, and along the line of abatis, but did not in the least check the advance of the troops. The forlorn supported by Major Clarke at the head of the right column, broke through all opposition, and found an entrance into the main work. So rapid was the movement of the troops that we gained the fort before the discharge of a single piece of artillery. The centre column, conducted by Captain Forsyth, on passing the abatis, took a direction to their left. Lieutenant Armstrong led in the advance of this column. They soon possessed themselves of the forlorn and troops posted at the rear No. 6, and fully completed the object of their destination. The rear column, under Captain Handy, moved forward in support of the whole. Thus were we completely victorious in the space of a few moments.

"The appearance of daylight, my apprehension lest some accident might have fallen the boats, the numerous difficulties of the retreat, the harassed state of the troops, and the destruction of all our ammunition by passing the canal, conspired in influencing me to retire at the moment of victory. Major Clarke, with the right column, was immediately put in motion with the greater part of the prisoners. Captain Handy followed with the remainder. Lieutenants Armstrong and Bosc formed the rear Guard.

"Immediately on the commencement of the retreat, I sent forward Captain Forsyth to Prior's Mill to collect such men from the different columns as were most fit for action, and to take post on the heights of Bergen to cover the retreat.

"On my reaching this place, I was informed by Cornet Neill [who had been posted there during the night for the purpose of laying the bridge, and communicating with the boats that my messenger directed to him previous to the attack had not arrived, nor had he heard from Captain Peyton, who had charge of the boats.

"Struck with apprehension that I should be disappointed in the route of retreat, I rode forward to the front under Major Clarke, whom I found very near the point of embarkation, and no boats to receive them. In this critical situation, I lost no time in my decision, but ordered the troops to regain the Bergen road, and move on to the New Bridge. At the same time, I communicated my disappointment to Lord Stirling by express, then returned to Prior's Bridge to the rear guard.

"Oppressed by every possible misfortune, at the head of troops worn down by a rapid march of thirty miles through mountains, swamps, and deep morasses, without the least refreshment during the whole march, ammunition destroyed, encumbered with prisoners, and a retreat of fourteen miles to make good, on a route admissible of interception at several points by a march of two, three, or four miles, one body moving in our rear, and another (from the intelligence I had received from the captured officers) in all probability well advanced on our right, a retreat naturally impossible to us left, under all these distressing circumstances, my sole dependence was in the persevering gallantry of the officers, and obstinate courage of the troops. In this I was fully satisfied by the shouts of the soldiery, who gave every proof of unimpaired vigor at the moment the enemy's approach was announced.

"Having reached the point of interception opposite Weehack, Captain [redacted] was directed to move with his division on the Mountain road, in order to facilitate the retreat. Captain Catlett of the 2d Virginia regiment, fortunately joined me at this moment at the head of fifty men with good ammunition. I immediately halted this officer, and having detached two parties, the one on the Bergen road in the rear of Major Clarke, the other on the banks of the North River, I moved with the party under the command of the captain on the centre route. By these precautions a sudden approach of the enemy was fully prevented. I am very much indebted to this officer and the gentlemen under him, for their alacrity and vigilance on this occasion.

"On the rear's approach to the Fort Lee road, we met a detachment under the command of Colonel Ball, which Lord Stirling had pushed forward on the first notice of our situation, to support the retreat. The colonel moved on and occupied a position which effectually covered us.

"Some little time after this, a body of the enemy (alluded to in the intelligence I mentioned) to have received from the officers while in the fort, made their appearance, issuing out of the woods on our right, and moving through the fields directly to the road. They immediately commenced a fire upon our rear. Lieutenant Reed was ordered to face them, while Lieutenant Rudolph threw himself with a party into a stone house which commanded the road. These two officers were directed mutually to support each other, and give time for the troops to pass the English Neighborhood Creek, at the Liberty Pole. On the enemy's observing this disposition, they immediately retired by the same route they had approached, and gained the woods. The precipitation with which they retired, preventing the possibility of Colonel Ball's falling in with them, saved the whole.

"The body which moved in our rear, having excessively fatigued themselves by the rapidity of their march, thought prudent to halt before they came in contact with us.

"Thus, Sir, was every attempt to cut off our rear completely baffled. The troops arrived safely at the New Bridge with all the prisoners, about one o'clock P. M. on the nineteenth. I should commit the highest injustice, was I not to assure your Excellency that my endeavors were fully seconded by every officer in his station; nor can any discrimination justly be made, but what arose from opportunity. The troops vied with each other in patience under their many sufferings, and consoled themselves in every vicissitude of fortune with a resolution which reflects the highest honor on them.

"During the whole action, not a single musket was fired on our side,—the bayonet was our sole dependence.

"Having gained the fort, such was the order of the troops, and attention of the officers, that the soldiers were prevented from plundering, altho' in the midst of every sort.

"American humanity has been again signally manifested. Self preservation strictly dictated, on the retreat, the putting the prisoners to death, and British civility fully justified it; notwithstanding which, not a man was wantonly hurt.

"During the progress of the troops in the works, from the different reports of my officers I conclude not more than fifty of the enemy were killed, and a few wounded. Among the killed is one officer, supposed (from his description) to be a captain in Colonel Burskirk's regiment. Our loss on this occasion is very trifling. I have not yet had a report from the detachment of Virginians; but, as I conclude their loss to be proportionate to the loss of the other troops, I can venture to pronounce that the loss of the whole is killed, wounded, and missing, will not exceed twenty. As soon as the report comes to hand, I will transmit to headquarters an accurate return. I herewith inclose a return of the prisoners taken from the enemy.

"At every point of the enterprise I stood highly indebted to Major Clarke for his zeal, activity, and example. Captains Handy and Forsyth have claim to my particular thanks for the support I experienced from them on every occasion. The Captains Reed, McLane, Smith, Crump, and Wilnot, behaved with the greatest zeal and intrepidity. I must acknowledge myself very much indebted to Major Burnet and Captain Peyton, of the dragoons, for their counsel and indefatigability in the previous preparations for the attack. The premature withdrawal of the boats was owing to the non-arrival of my despatches; and though a most mortifying circumstance, can be called nothing more than unfortunate. Lieutenant Vandeville, who was to have commanded one of the forlorns, but was thrown out by the alteration of the disposition of the battle, conducted himself perfectly soldier-like. The whole of the officers behaved with the greatest propriety; and, as I said before, no discrimination can justly be made, but what arose from opportunity.

"The Lieutenants M'Callister, Armstrong, Reed, and Rudolph, distinguished themselves remarkably. Too much praise cannot be given to these gentlemen for their prowess and example. Captain Bradford, of the train, who volunteered it with me for the purpose of taking direction of the artillery, deserves my warmest thanks for his zeal and activity. I am personally indebted to Captain Rudolph, and Dr. Irvine of the dragoons, who attended me during the expedition, for their many services.

"I beg leave to present your Excellency with the flag of the fort by the hands of Mr. M'Callister, the gentleman into whose possession it fell. It is needless for me to explain my reasons for the instantaneous evacuation of the fort. Your Excellency's knowledge of the past, will suggest fully the propriety of it. The event confirms it.

"Among the many unfortunate circumstances which crossed our wishes, none was more so than the accidental absence of Colonel Burskirk, and the greatest part of his regiment. They had set out on an expedition up the North River the very night of the attack. A company of vigilant Hessians had taken their place in the fort, which rendered the secrecy of approach more precarious, and, at the same time, diminished the object of the enterprise by a reduction of the number of the garrison. Major Sutherland fortunately saved himself by a soldier's counterfeiting his person. This imposture was not discovered until too late.

"I intended to have burnt the barracks; but on finding a number of sick soldiers and women with young children in them, humanity forbade the execution of my intention. The box of the magazine could not be found, nor could it be broken open in the little time we had to spare, many attempts having been made to that purpose by the Lieutenants M'Callister and Reed. It was completely impracticable to bring off any pieces of artillery. I consulted Captain Bradford on the point, who confirms me in my opinion. The circumstance of spiking them being trivial; it was omitted altogether.

"After most of the troops had retired from the works, and were passed and passing the canal, a fire of musketry commenced from a few stragglers, who had collected in an old work on the right of the main fort. Their fire being ineffectual, and the object trifling, I determined not to break in upon the order of retreat, but continue passing the defile in front. I cannot conclude this relation without expressing my warmest thanks to Lord Stirling for the full patronage I received from him in every stage of the enterprise. I must also return my thanks to the cavalry for their vigilant execution of the duties assigned them.

"Captain Rudolph waits on your Excellency with these despatches. I beg leave to refer to this officer for any further explanation that may be required.

MAJ. LEE TO JOHN JAY.

"West Point, Head Quarters Sept 1—1779

"Sir: On perusing my report to the Commander in Chief, I find that Capt. Dudley's name is omitted. It arises from the hurry with which my account to the General was composed. Be pleased to include his name among the Captains Reed, M Lane &c. before the report goes to the press, also Captain Braekoubridge's.

"I am sorry to give this trouble, but as I am conscious that the omission is injurious, must beg a compliance with my request."—Pennsylvania Packet, Sept. 14, 1779.

IX.—GEN. WASHINGTON TO LORD STIRLING.

"West Point 21 August 1779

"My Lord:

"I have been duly favored with your letter of the 19th, written at nine o'clock in the morning, and that of the same date, of one o'clock in the afternoon, containing the agreeable information of Major Lee's having succeeded against Paulus Hook. I join my congratulations with your Lordship's on this occasion, and thank you for the effectual assistance afforded to Major Lee in completing the enterprise. The increase of confidence, which the army will derive from this affair and that of Stony Point, I flatter myself, though great, will be among the least of the advantages resulting from these events.

"As the enemy must feel themselves disgraced by these losses, they may endeavor to lessen it by a retaliation in kind. It is natural to expect their attempts on such parts of the army as be most exposed. This sentiment, I make no doubt, has occurred to your Lordship, and will of course proportion your vigilance to the nature of your situation, and to the danger which may be apprehended. Your Lordship will be pleased to give my thanks to the Officers and Men concerned in the capture of the Garrison at Paul's Hook, for their gallant conduct and gallant behavior on the occasion. The Commissary of prisoners is directed to attend, and receive the British prisoners."—Writings of Washington, vi., 26.

"On the 19th Instant, The Garrison of Paul's Hook being reinforced, Lieutenant Colonel Burskirk was detached with part of the Troop to cut off some small parties who interrupted the supply of Provision, a considerable body of the Rebels avoided themselves of that opportunity to attempt the Post. At three in the Morning they advanced to the Gate of the Works, and being mistaken by a negligent Guard for Lieut. Colonel Burskirk's Corps returning entered without opposition. I fear they found the Garrison so unaccountably absorbed in confidence of their Security, that they made themselves Masters of a Block House, and Two Redoubts with scarcely any difficulty. The Alarm soon was spread, Major Sutherland the Commandant threw himself with Forty Hessians into a Redoubt, by an incessant fire from which he forced the Enemy to quit the Post without either damaging any of the Cannon, or setting fire to the Barracks. In short their retreat was so disgraceful as their attempt was well conducted. They carried off with them near Forty Invalids prisoners. A Detachment being sent over from New York, Major Sutherland pursued the Enemy and coming up with their rear made a Capture and some Private skirmish with the Rebels & took four prisoners without any loss on his part. I cannot as yet decide upon this affair. I have ordered Major Sutherland to be tried on a charge of general misconduct as Commandant."

XI.—GEN. PATTERSON TO LORD TOWNSHEND.

New York August 22, 1779.

"... Thursday last, when a most Extraordinary Attempt was made to take by Assault the Post at Paul's Hook, that has been occupied by the King's Troops ever since they took Possession of New York. It is on the Jersey Shore opposite to this Town and considered an Appendage to it. I am sorry to say the Enterprise, bold as it was, succeeded but too well, and little to the Honor of the Defendants. That your Lordship may judge of the Strength of this Post, from its Natural Situation, and from the Works raised for its Protection, I send the enclosed Plan, which will show how far it ought to have been out of the Reach of Assault."

"The Troops allotted to garrison it, were the 4th Battalion of Skinner's Provincial Brigade, and the Command of Colonel Burskirk, and a part of the Invalid Battalion. Major Sutherland, of the Invalid Battalion, was the Commandant. On the preceding Day it was determined that Colonel Burskirk should march out a Detach^t of that Evening with a Design of surprising a party of 100 Rebels near English Neighborhood."

"The following letter from Lord Salisbury to W. J. Hopkin Esq. Secretary of Legation, who at my request made an effort to secure a copy of the Plan," will show that it cannot be found.

FOREIGN OFFICE,

October 15, 1879.

"SIR: With reference to your letter of the 15th September last, requesting that a tracing or copy might be made of the plan of the works on Powles Hook (Jersey City) which accompanied the account by General Pattison, the British Commander at New York, of his capture by Major Lee in 1779, I have now the honor to inform you that your request was duly forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who referred it to the Record Department, in whose custody the papers of that period exist, and who have replied that a careful search has been made for the plan, but without success."

"A letter, however, from Sir Henry Clinton, then commanding the British forces at New York, has been found, which appears to relate to the circumstances of the 19 August, 1779, to which you allude, and I have much pleasure in forwarding to you a copy of it. The Keeper of the Records, however, states that it contains the only information that can be discovered on the subject."

"I have the honor to be, &c.,

"SALISBURY."

As the Garrison would thereby be much weakened, The Major applied to me for a Reinforcement for that Night of a Capt. & 40 Men, which I complied with and sent them from the Hudson Regt of New-Yorkshire. At half past 3 o'clock the next Morning Advice was brought to me, that Firing of Musquetry being heard at Paul's Hook, it was probably attacked, but having soon after the Command was given to me of the Garrison, established with Major Sutherland the signal he was to make in case he should be attacked in such manner as to require succour from hence, namely to fire two Pieces of Cannon & to hang out their Lights, and being Informed that no Cannon had been heard or light seen, I concluded that Burskirk was on his Return and that some Small Party had been impressing his Rear, the Firing at that Time having nearly ceased, however I immediately sent over to know what was the real state of the Post. Upon the Return of the Messenger I was filled with Astonishment at receiving a Letter from Major Sutherland, saying that the Enemy having got thro' the Redoubts had taken the Right-hand and center Block-Houses & the Principal Fort, but that the Round Redoubt in which was himself with a Captain and 25 Hessians had been defended, that the left Block-House was likewise safe, and that the Enemy had retreated, carrying off with them the Guards of the two Block-Houses which the almost impregnable except by Cannon were shamefully abandoned, the Detachment of Artillery from the Fort, and such Officers and Soldiers as were in the Barracks. He further added that he was under great Apprehensions of Colonel Burskirk's Corps being cut off. I thereupon without loss of Time sent over the Flank Company of the Guards with 100 Men from the Brigade and nearly the same Number of Hessians with a party of Artillery under the Command of the Field Officer of the Day, Lieut. Colonel Gordon. The Light Infantry were pushed forward about ten Miles beyond Bergen, and Colonel Burskirk, after the coup main, which his Retreat got to Paul's Hook, before it was dark, without any loss, bringing four Prisoners & the fourth likewise took a Captain & six Prisoners on their March. What was nearly as Extraordinary as the Enterprise itself & the Success of it, is that the Enemy, tho' in full Possession of the Fort, did not Spike a Gun, destroy the Ammunition or do the least Injury to any of the Buildings.

"The Strength of the Garrison at the Time it was Assaulted, was about 200 and by the Return I have received there were Killed 4 Sergeants, 2 Corporals & 3 Privates, Wounded 2 Sergeants & taken or missing 4 Subalterns, 7 Sergeants, 5 Corporals and 97 Privates. Lieut. Cockburn who was the Artillery Officer on Duty there, says that a Soldier came to the Hut where he slept within 30 Yards of the Fort, to give him the Alarm, that he instantly flew towards the Fort, but found the Enemy Masters of it, whereupon he ran to the Block House, and thereby saved himself from being taken Prisoner."

"The Commander in Chief was pleased to order a Board of two Brigadier Generals and three Field Officers to assemble the Day following to enquire into the cause of the Affront suffered at Paul's Hook on the Morning of the 19th and to report to him thereupon, & yesterday having received the Opinion of the Board, He gave Orders for putting Major Sutherland in Arrest, and for him to prepare to take his Trial before a Court Martial, upon a Charge of General Misconduct as Commandant at Paul's Hook, on the Morning of the 19th Instant. . . ."—New York Historical Society's Collections, 1875, 99.

XII.—CAPT. LEVIN HANDY TO GEORGE HANDY.

Powles Hook 22 July 1779.

"Before this reaches you, I doubt not but you have heard of our success at Powles Hook, where the enemy had a very strong fort, within one and a quarter miles from New York. We started from this place on Wednesday last (at half after ten o'clock, taking our route by a place called the New Bridge on Hackensack River, where my two companies were joined by three hundred Virginians and a company of Dismounted Dragoons commanded by Capt. M Lane. We took up our line of March about 5 o'clock in the evening from the Bridge, the nearest route with safety, to Powles, distant then about twenty miles, with my detachment in front, the whole under command of the gallant Major Lee. The works were to be carried by storm—the whole to advance in three solid column, one of which I had the honor to command. The attack was to commence at half after twelve o'clock, but having been greatly embarrassed in our march, and having a number of difficulties to surmount, did not arrive at the point of attack till after four o'clock in the morning, when, after a small fire from them, we gained their works, and put about fifty of them to the bayonet, took one hundred and fifty seven prisoners, exclusive of seven commanding officers; this was completed in less than thirty minutes, and a retreat ordered, as we had every reason to suppose, unless timely, it would be cut off. Our situation was so difficult that we could not bring off any stores. We had a morass to pass of upwards two miles, the greatest part of which we were obliged to pass by files, and several canals to ford up to our breast in water. We advanced with bayonets, pans open, cocks full, to prevent any fire from our side; and believe me, when I assure you, we did not fire a musket.

"You will see a more particular account of it in the papers than it is in my power to give you at present. It is thought to be the greatest enterprise ever undertaken in America. Our loss is so inconceivable that I do not mention it."—Life and Correspondence of Reed, li., 125.

XIII.—W. CROGAN to BERNARD GRAZ.

"Camp North of Smiths Cove }
August 22, 1779. }

"I suppose you have had a variety of accounts of the sacking of Powel's Hook, which was taken by surprise about 3 o'clock the morning of the 19th inst. and instantly evacuated again by us, after doing no greater damage than taking 7 officers and about 100 Blank and File prisoners, and killing about 20 in the Garrison. We have about 7 privates missing. Had not the officer who commanded Major Lee—been in so great a hurry from the Garrison, much more execution might have been done, as they did not take time to carry off all the prisoners, or even to take a Major and party of men who were then in their power. Not the least damage whatever was done to the Garrison. The Magazine was not blown up, the Barricade not set on fire, the cannon not spiked, no article of Stores, Clothing, &c. &c., of which a great plenty were there, was the least damaged; in fact, nothing further was done than rushing into the Garrison in confusion and driving out the prisoners, mostly without their clothes. Perhaps there will be an inquiry into the reasons of the confusion and great haste the party made to get out of the fort without destroying so many valuable stores as were in their possession. Several officers have been much injured in the Virginia line, on account of giving Major Lee the command of 300 of our men to reduce Powel's Hook, and unjust methods taken by him to have the command, by telling one of our Majors, who marched with the 300 men, that his commission was elder than it really is—otherwise he would not have had the command over him. I believe Major Lee will be arrested. I marched with a covering party but did not go near the Garrison. Lord Sterling, who commands here, is very uneasy at our complaints on this affair. Several letters have passed between his lordship and the officers of our line concerning 300 of our men under Major Lee. . . ."—Hist. Magazine, 1, 180.

XIV.—GEN. WASHINGTON to MAJ. LEE.

"Head Quarters 23 August 1779.

"I have received your report of the attack of Paulus Hook, transmitted by Captain Rudolph, which I have forwarded to Congress by Lieutenant McAllister. I shall be sorry if this should be contrary to your wish, or Captain Rudolph's expectations, as I have the best opinion of that gentleman's merit. My motives for sending Lieutenant McAllister with the despatches were, that he commanded a forborne hope, and got possession of the standard. As custom required the sending of this to Congress, I thought the better of it ought to be the person, who had the good fortune to gain possession of it, especially as you had forwarded it by him to me; nor would it have been warranted by precedent to send one with the despatches, and another with the standard. You will find my sense of your conduct, and of that of the officers and men under your command, expressed in the general order of yesterday, and in my letter to Congress. I congratulate you on your success. You will send a small report of your success with Lieutenant McAllister."—Writings of Washington, vi., 303.

XV.

"On the evening of the 18th inst. Lieut. Colonel Buskirk, in consequence of intelligence received of the rebels intending to carry off the forage and grain from the English Neighborhood and Bergen, marched with a part of the 4th Battalion of New Jersey Volunteers, and about 20 of the Garrison Battalion from Powles Hook, towards the Liberty pole, near which they lay concealed till after sunrise, when they observed a considerable body of rebels moving towards the New Bridge, which induced them to think their design had been discovered; they therefore moved into the main road, where they found themselves in the center of a column of 600 rebels, who were returning from Powles Hook; it being no time to deliberate, they attacked the enemy with such spirit, that notwithstanding their great superiority in numbers, took three prisoners, and threw them into such confusion, as obliged them to throw away coats, knapsacks, hats, &c., and 30 stands of arms, which were mostly destroyed; at which time fresh troops coming to the rebels' assistance, they began to form, and endeavour, by moving on the right and left of the Colonel's party, to surround it, which pointed out the necessity of pushing for the height, to gain which was a matter of contest for some time, at about 60 yards distance, when perceiving the rebels from the advantage of ground were likely to succeed, the men were ordered to fix bayonets and advance briskly, which so disconcerted them that they immediately wheeled to the right and left, and let the party continue their route to Powles Hook without further interruption, and without the loss of a single man either of the 4th or garrison battalion. The conduct of the Officers and Privates of both was such justly entitled them to applause. . . . As the Printer of Saturdays Paper has not represented Facts relative to the Attack on Powles Hook, on the 19th Instant it is not amiss that the Printers will have the Candor to insert the following:

"That nearly about half an Hour after two, the Rebels in three Divisions (exceeding 400 Men) passed the Ditch in Front of the Abbatis, about 20 Yards from the Abbatis, where they were fired upon by a few Centries, but having seized immediately on the Block House Grenads, who in place of Defending their Post, ran out to see what was the Matter, they proceeded to the Work, which they soon became Masters of, with the Cannon &c. But they were so confused and alarmed, they neither spiked the Cannon, nor damaged the Barracks, or made any other use of their Victory, than carrying off about 100 prisoners, among whom there are ten Hessians whose Loss is much regretted) and four officers of Colonel Buskirk's Battalion, and plundering a few women.

"This Panic (amongst them) was occasioned by an incessant Fire kept on them from a small Redoubt into which Maj. Sutherland threw himself with a Capt. Subaltern, and 25 gallant Hessians, on the first Alarm. The Rebels repeatedly challenged the Redoubt to surrender, or they would bayonet them, to which they received a Fire and No, for Answer. About half after 8 o'clock Major Sutherland was joined by one Light Infantry Company of the Guards, under the Command of Captain Dundass with which he immediately marched, and Captain Maynard was shortly after ordered to follow Major Sutherland by Colonel Gordon, on which Major Sutherland marched both companies, in order to succour Colonel Buskirk, and after going about 15 Miles, he found that Colonel Buskirk had a smart Engagement with the Rebels some Time before and had returned. There were a few Prisoners made, amongst whom is a Captain Mosde, who was found asleep from the great Fatigue he underwent; and surely unless he had been a Livingston, Laurens, or Adams, he could not in that Situation, forfeit his Claim to British Valour and Humanity. The Light Infantry rested here for an Hour, during which Dr. Gordon gallantly charged two Rebels who fired at him, and took one of them.

"Major Sutherland finding one Object of his March answered, by Colonel Buskirk's being safe, and 100 Men not sufficient to answer his other Intentions, returned, this charming Body of Men, having made a March of about 30 Miles in less than 10 Hours.

"Eugene Barrete (who was a Volunteer) reported to Major Sutherland, that he destroyed a Gunsmith's Tools &c. to the Amount of £100."—New York Gazette, Aug. 23, 1779.

"Sundry late military occurrences, which you cannot be unacquainted with, gave the alarm to the enterprising genius of Major Lee, who being ordered into this country, took into contemplation an attempt on Powles-Hook, a place naturally difficult of access, and highly improved by art. He busily employed himself in gaining a knowledge of the place, its situation, strength, &c. This done, he communicated the matter to his Excellency, who, surprised at the many obstacles, declined his assent to an affair so replete with danger. But on a fuller representation from the Major, whose endeavours were unremitting until the necessary intelligence was collected—having devised the mode of attack, the method of retreat, and the number of troops adequate, transmitted them accurately to the General, who was pleased to approve of the disposition, and ordered everything requisite for a master of so much difficulty.

"A description of the place will not be improper, as it will serve to give you an idea of the many obstructions to be met with. The Hook is formed by a winding curve of North River, directly opposite New York; a wide gut intersects the tongue of land, and leaves the place of fortification an entire island; the gut in depth is so considerably increased, as to render it impossible at a little more than half flood, interior to this runs a line of abbatis of great strength, which extends to the extreme verges of the island, still within those is a fort (except the gateway) impregnable, assisted by a chain of redoubts situated on the left, of superior strength; the whole surrounded by a marsh two miles in breadth, rendered almost impervious, by reason of a number of guts, which irregularly intersect it at various points.

"Three hundred Virginians, under the command of Major Clark, two companies of Maryland, and McLane's dismounted dragoons, composed the assailants. The whole, directed by Major Lee, took their route from the New Bridge on Hedgesack, attended by a number of Wagons to convey the opinion of a forming party. The timid apprehensions of a principal guide, on our nearer approach to the enemy, proved the source of numberless mistakes, which retarded the execution of the design three hours, and occasioned an alteration in the primary disposition, instead of attacking in three different places as at first intended. The body was formed into two columns and after forcing the abattis, a separation took place by Major Clark's inclining to the right, the other column to the left; the former proceeded at some distance, instantly seized the grand fort, and re-occupied the Watch-tower; in less than ten minutes a complete possession of the works was effected, with little or no loss.

"The necessity of a retreat every moment became evident; day light approached apace, and obliged us to retire precipitately, tho' without confusion. Relying on the boats which were to transport us over the Hackensack, 3 miles distant from the scene of action, and which constituted our safety—we moved on with the prisoners—but our arrival soon convinced us of a disappointment. The dangers of the situation were manifest; the North River on the right was in many places not more than two miles distant from the party with the major part of the British army strewn along the opposite shore, obliged the exertion of every device and stratagem to obviate their intercepting a retreat of eighteen miles, which was judiciously effected, not withstanding all their efforts to the contrary."—Pennsylvania Packet, Aug. 28, 1779.

"August 27, 1779

"I never considered myself so important in the army as I find I am. Captains and subalterns used to seek me; Generals and Colonels are now lurking at me with open mouth. Colonel Gist of Virginia, an Indian hunter, has formed a cabal. I mean to make the matter very serious, because a full explanation will recoil on my loss, and give new light to the enterprise.

"In my report to General Washington . . . I passed the usual general compliments on the troops under my command. I did not tell the world that near one half of my countrymen left me—that it was reported to me by Major Clarke as I was entering the marsh—that notwithstanding that and every other dumb sign, I pushed on to the attack.

"Had I been unsuccessful, I was determined to leave my corpse within the enemy's lines. The brave Marylanders stood by me faithfully. Major Clarke, with the Virginians exerted himself. Their efforts to second his endeavors were not the most vigorous. What I now write I write in confidence. You will probably see the whole matter in print. I am determined to push Colonel Gist and party. The brave and generous throughout the whole army support me warmly. I do not know that any general officers are my foes. I have received the thanks of General Washington in the most flattering terms, and the congratulations of General Greene, Wayne and the officers of the Light Infantry. Do not let any whispers affect you, my dear sir. Be assured that the more full the scrutiny, the more honour your friend will receive, and the more ignominy will be the fate of my foes. . . ."—Life and Correspondence of Reed, II. 126.

condemned into subject as commandant of Paulus Hook, on the Night between the 18th and 19th of this Month, August, is found not Guilty of the Charge, alledged against him, and is therefore Honorably Acquitted.

"XX.—GEN. WASHINGTON TO MAJ. LEE.

"Head Quarters 1 September 1779.

"I received you letter of this date, requesting me to give you in writing the instructions, which you verbally received from me on the subject of Paulus Hook, when you were last at head-quarters, and particularly concerning the immediate execution of the post after the reduction, and concerning the retreat."

"When you were last at head-quarters, the subject of Paulus Hook was in contemplation, but not finally determined, as there were some points of information still to be more fully obtained. I gave you then in general, my ideas in the manner in which it should be executed, whenever attempted, and desired you to use your best endeavours to procure information in such matters, as appeared not to be sufficiently well understood, and mentioned the precautions that should be taken to cover the design, and secure the party, which might be employed in the enterprise, in its approach. But with respect to the point to which your request more particularly extends, to wit, the evacuation of the post, and concerning the retreat—my principal fear, from the moment I conceived a design against the post, was on account of the retreat, founded on the relative situation of the post to that of the enemy on York Island. This circumstance induced me to add, that in case the enterprise should be found eligible on farther inquiries, and determined on, no time should be lost, in case it succeeded, in attempting to bring off cannon, stores, or any other articles, as a few minutes delay might expose the party at least to imminent risk. I further remark'd, that I likewise said, that no time should be spent, in such case, in collecting stragglers of the garrison, who might skulk and hide themselves, lest it should prove fatal; also that, if the post could not be carried in an instant by surprise, the attempt must be relinquished. My objects were to surprise it, to bring off the garrison immediately, and to effect a secure retreat."—Writings of Washington, vi. 336.

XXIII.—MAJ. LEE TO PRESIDENT REED.

"Headquarters 9th September 1779.

"Believe me, sir, the congratulations of my friends are more pleasing to me, (though a young soldier,) than any applause from the public. Congress have as yet published any report. I presume they have good reasons for it. If they have not, they treat me injuriously. My trial goes on apace, the evidence of the prosecution throws additional lustre on every part of my conduct. I expect concessions will be offered this day from the chief of the conspiracy: their own Interest, not honour, will induce the offer, if made, perhaps I may be good-natured on this occasion. Pitt already has got the better of resentment. I mean to have my trial printed, for the satisfaction of some gentlemen of the Vir-know the Force, see my order of battle and disposition on the march, I wish it to be published with my report, as it will serve to elucidate the enterprises. — Life and Correspondence of Reed, ii., 127.

XXIV.

During the whole war only six gold medals were ordered by Congress, as follows:

1. Gen. Washington, March 25, 1776: Siege of Fort Mifflin.
2. Gen. Gates, November 1, 1777: Surrender of Burgoyne.
3. Gen. Wayne, July 26, 1779: Stony Point.
4. Major Lee, September 24, 1779: Paulus Hook.
5. Gen. Morgan, March 9, 1781: Cowpens.
6. Gen. Greene, October 29, 1781: Eutaw Springs.

This indicates how Congress regarded 'the little stroke at Paulus Hook.'

On one side of the medal that was struck is a bust of Lee with the words "Hominis Leo Legionis Equit. Præfatus, Comitæ Americæna." The American Congress to Henry Lee, Colonel of Cavalry. On the reverse is the inscription, "Non Obstantib. Fluminibus Vallis Astutia & Virtute Bellæ Parva Mann Hostes Vicit Victosq. Armis Humilitate Devinxit." In Mem. Pugn. Ad Paulus Hook Die XIX Aug. 1779: "Notwithstanding rivers and intrenchments, he with a small band conquered the foe by warlike skill and prowess, and firmly bound by his humanity those who had been conquered by his arms. In memory of the conflict at Paulus Hook, Nineteenth of Aug., 1779."

On the 24th of September Congress passed the following resolutions respecting the affair.

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be given to his Excellency, General Washington, for ordering with so much wisdom the late attack on the enemy's fort and works at Powles Hook.

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be given to Major General Lord Stirling for the judicious measures taken by him to forward the retreat, and to secure the retreat of the party.

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be given to Major Lee for the remarkable prudence, address and bravery displayed by him on the occasion, and that they approve the humanity shown in circumstances prompting to severity as honorable to the army of the United States and correspondent to the noble principles on which they were assumed.

Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the discipline, fortitude and spirit manifested by the officers and soldiers under the command of Major Lee in the march, action and retreat, and while with singular satisfaction they acknowledge the merit of these gallant men, they feel an additional pleasure by considering them as part of an army in which very many brave officers and soldiers have proved by their cheerful performance of every duty under every difficulty that they ardently wish to give to truly glorious example they now receive.

Resolved, That Congress justly esteem the military caution so happily combined with daring activity by Lieutenants McCallister and Rudolph in leading on the Fort on Hope.

Resolved, That a medal of gold emblematical of this affair be struck under the direction of the Board of Treasury and presented to Major Lee.

Resolved, That the brevet and the pay and subsistence of Captain be given to Lieutenant McCallister and to Lieutenant Rudolph respectively.

Resolved, That the sum of fifteen thousand dollars be put into the hands of Major Lee, to be by him distributed among the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the detachment he commanded at the attack and surprise of Powles-Hook in such manner as the commander in chief shall direct. — Journals of Congress (1779) v., 368-370.

XXV.—GENERAL ORDERS.

Head Quarters, MOORE'S HORSE, Sept'r 11th 1779.

At a Gen'l Court Martial of the Line the 2nd Instant, whereof (Adjutant) Marshal be President, Major Henry Lee of the Light Dragoons was tried upon the following Charges:

1st For withdrawing a Letter sent by him from Lord Stirling to Colonel Gist of the 16th Virginia Regiment on the Morning of the 18th August, by that means keeping him ignorant of a matter which required his immediate Information.

GEN. WASHINGTON TO MAJ. LEE.

I have given a Warrant to Captain Rudolph for the sum granted by Congress to the non-commissioned officers and privates concerned in the attack of Paulus Hook. You will be pleased to distribute this money in proportion of the non-commissioned officers and privates, which was the manner observed in the case of Stony Point. — Wings of Washington, etc., 376.

2dly After having obtained three Hundred men from Colonel Gist's Detachment with which Major Clark was ordered, to inform him that his Commission was dated in 1777, thereby assuming the Command of him when in fact it was dated in 1778, and of a Junior Date to Major Clarke's, which he could not be ignorant of.

3dly For conducting the Detachment under his (Major Lee's) Command on the March to Powles Hook with so much Disorder and Confusion as to cause almost the whole of the 1st Batt'n under his immediate Command to be lost.

4thly For ordering Capt. Smith of Colonel Gist's Regt. who was leading one of the Divisions under the Command of Capt. Forsythe of his own Corps of Horse who was a Junior Officer.

5thly For giving the Command of the Fort on Hope to Lieut. McAulister for some Time past annexed to his Corps, when the rest of the subalterns solicited that it should be balloted for.

6thly For ordering a Retreat from the Fort before a Party of the Enemy in a Redoubt had been made Prisoners, which might easily have been effected, and was solicited by many of the officers, and not only leaving that undone, but suffering the Stores, Block-Houses and Works to remain entire when they might so easily have been destroyed.

7thly For bringing off the Party in such a confused irregular and unutilitary Manner that they might have fallen an easy Prey to a very considerable Number of the Enemy, had they attempted to have intercepted them.

8thly and Lastly. For behaving in a manner unbecoming an Officer and Gentleman.

The Court having considered the 1st Charge are of opinion it is unsupported by Evidence, and is groundless, and do Acquit him with Honor.

The Court having considered the 2d Charge are of Opinion that Major Lee did thro' inadvertence give Major Clark a wrong date of his Commission, but by no means intended to impose on Major Clark by assuming the Command of him, having express Orders from his Excellency the Commander in Chief for that special Command, do Acquit him with Honor.

The Court having considered the 3d Charge are of Opinion that there were some disorders in the Line of March to Powles-Hook & that the greater Part of the 1st Batt'n was separated from the Column in the Darkness of the Night and marching thro' the Woods. They are further of Opinion that the disorders & separation did not proceed from any neglect, or want of Attention in Major Lee, and do Acquit him with Honor.

The Court having considered the 4th Charge, are of Opinion that Major Lee ordered Capt'n Forsythe to take the Command of the Column which had been before commanded by Capt'n Smith which Order was in consequence of Captain Forsythe's being well acquainted with the Situation of the Enemy, That it was impossible for Major Lee to know the dates of the Officers Commissions, and do Acquit him with Honor.

The Court having considered the 5th Charge are of Opinion that Major Lee gave the Command of the Fort on Hope to Lieut. McAulister which was occasioned by his being under the Necessity of altering his Mode of Attack in consequence of a separation of the Troops and do acquit him with Honor.

The Court having considered the 6th Charge are of Opinion, That Major Lee in evacuating the Fort immediately after it was taken, acted in perfect conformity to the Orders of his Excellency the Commander in Chief. The time the Assault was made and the apprehensions of being intercepted in his Retreat fully justifies his Conduct, and the Court do Acquit him with Honor.

The Court having considered the 7th Charge are of Opinion that perfect Military Order was preserved in the Retreat of the Troops in the Rear where Major Lee commanded in Person, that the Enemy made an Attempt to intercept his Retreat, which he subverted by his Activity and Judgement, and do Acquit him with Honor.

The Court having considered the 8th & last Charge are of Opinion that Major Lee's Conduct was uniform and Regular, supporting his Military Character with Magnanimity and Judgement, and that he by no Means Acted derogatory to the Gentleness and the Soldier which Characters he fills with Honor to his Country and the Army.

The Commander in Chief confirms the Opinion of the Court.
"Major Lee is Released from his Arrest." — MS orderly book in possession of the New York Historical Society.

Draper, of the Wisconsin Historical Society.*

As Major Jonathan Clark was a prominent figure in the attack on Paulus Hock, and as the incidents of his active and eventful life have never been published, I will be pardoned for the following brief reference to him.

He was born in Albemarle County, Va., in 1750. When about four years of age, his father removed to Caroline County, in that State, and afterwards located at Woodstock, in the Virginia Valley. In this county (Dunmore's) Jonathan was made clerk of the court, and in 1774 was chosen with Rev. (afterwards General) Peter Muhlenberg to represent that county in the House of Burgesses. At the same time he was chosen a delegate to the State Convention. In July, 1775, he was appointed First Lieutenant in an Independent Rifle Company in that county. At the close of that year he was appointed Captain in Muhlenberg's 8th Virginia Regiment. He raised a company of 75 men and eight officers.

Early in 1776 this regiment was stationed at Suffolk, on the Virginia coast, to guard against Lord Dunmore. In June the regiment was sent to Charleston to aid in its defense against Peter Parker and Clinton. In July the regiment was sent to Savannah on an intended expedition against St. Augustine. This matter falling through, the regiment was sent north to join General Washington's army. In February, 1777, Muhlenberg was made a Brigadier General, and Abraham Bowman was appointed Colonel of the 8th Virginia. Clark was in the several battles in which his regiment was engaged in the following two years. During a part of this time he was in Colonel Wood's 12th Virginia Regiment, probably owing to a union of the 8th and 12th Regiments. The 8th seems to have suffered severe losses, for a notice of the fall of 1778 to Major Clark, laments "the poor old 8th reduced Reg't," and Colonel Bowman was relieved as a supernumerary officer.

Yet on the 20th of March 1779, Clark was appointed Major in the 8th Virginia Regiment, to take rank as such from the 10th of January, 1778. In late Lee's letter to Clark in Appendix AXXI, where Lee says he opposed Clark's commission was in 1779. On the 23d of November, 1779, he was appointed Lieutenant Colonel of the 9th Virginia, to take rank on the 10th of May preceding. This shows that the "poor old 8th," though reduced, had not been incorporated into the 12th, and Clark, it would seem, was not in the 12th very long. On the 5th of July, 1779, he commanded the guard over the prisoners taken at Stony Point. In December, 1779 he was in command of the 8th. Early in 1780 he was sent south to the defense of Charleston, and was made prisoner in May of that year.

After the war he settled in Spotsylvania County. In 1785 he was appointed by Governor Patrick Henry a Major in the Militia. In November, 1788, he was elected by the Legislature of Virginia one of the four Major Generals of the State. About 1800 he removed to Kentucky, and settled about four miles from Louisville, where he died of apoplexy in the fall of 1811. He was an elder brother of General George Rogers Clark, so famous in the history of Kentucky.

XXIX.—LORD STIRLING TO MAJ. CLARK

Camp Bumpogo, August 1st 1779.

"When it was determined to attempt a surprise of the Garrison of Powles Hook, Major Lee requested that I would appoint you to the command of the party I was to furnish him with, in a manner particularly favorable to your character, and under a supposition that you were a junior officer to him. I order that apprehension I appointed you for that service, and I do assure you, I did not know the contrary till yesterday on my way to this place, had I known it, your going should have depended on your own option, for I never would have hurt the feelings of any officer so much as to order him to serve under a junior officer.

"My readiness to go on the service, and your behavior on it, not only have my highest approbation, but demand my particular thanks."

MAJ. LEE TO MAJ. CLARK

Paris, Aug. 22, 1779.

"It affects me most sensibly to find the mistake committed respecting our commission.

"On being honored with the command of the troops destined for the storm of P. Hock, I impud. previously to say producing General Washington's let. to Lord Stirling, of the rank of the Virginia Major. I was repeatedly told you were in 73. This presumption was so impressed on my mind that I gave a thoughtless answer to your question about commissions during the hurry of the march, confirming our mutual opinion.

"It is so evident that I must have supposed you a junior officer, that none but those gentlemen who hate me for reasons unknown to me, can seriously raise a doubt on the subject.

"Why should I have solicited your being joined to me on the Expedition, had I not believed you to be younger in office? Lord Stirling, if called on, will declare my solicitation to have been naive, and that we both presumed yourself junior in commission.

"It is not in my power to say more on the subject. I can only declare most sincerely that I believed you to have been one of the youngest Majors of the Line, and that this belief actuated my conduct, nor did I ever know the contrary till informed by Major Caldwell the 19th.

"I assure you, Sir, that I am under great obligations to you for the temper and coolness with which you conduct yourself. It must proceed from the persuasion you possess that the clash was unfortunate, and all owing to mistake and hurry.

"Make what use you please of this Let, and believe me to be, Sir, with great respect, &c. Major Clark, Woodford's Brigade." — Copies of the original in possession of Lyman C. Draper, of the Wisconsin Historical Society.

XXX.

"In the night of the 18th to the 19th of August they fell upon the post at Paul's Hook. This is a tongue of land on the Jersey side and opposite to New York, which extends out into the mouth of the Hudson, and is separated from the land by a brook and a morass. There was only one solid road leading through the latter, and only one bridge over the brook, and as the peninsula besides the steep hills and the rocks scattered over it was also provided with redoubts and block-houses at the more important points, it was considered quite impregnable. An abatis was also constructed along the brook. The garrison usually consisted of a British battalion, 60 invalids, and a division of provincials.

"On the night mentioned a part of the garrison was ordered off on an expedition in the region of New Bridge. The American General Stirling, being in the vicinity, determined to take advantage of this opportunity for an attack upon the weakly garrisoned post and destined 500 men under Major Lee for this purpose.

"To reinforce somewhat the weakened garrison, the Hessian Captain Von Schallern, of the Regiment Hereditary Prince, received orders to go over from New York to Paul's Hook with 40 men of his company.

"When the division appointed for the expedition had marched off, Major Lee, who had hitherto been lying in ambush, set about executing his design. He passed over the morass and the brook by the bridge and attacked in the rear the Hessian post stationed on it, consisting of one subaltern officer and ten men, who could not hold out against the superior force and were captured after the bravest resistance. The invalids, sleeping carelessly in a block-house, were now attacked. Captain Von Schallern, with his men, might have been doing the same, for the English commander himself had told him to go quietly to bed; but luckily for both, he had a better judgment of his situation and kept his men under arms. As the enemy unexpectedly and quickly advanced, Schallern threw himself into a fleche lying in his rear, and here awaited the enemy. Major Lee called out to him to surrender, as he was surrounded and all resistance was consequently useless, and in case of refusal no quarter would be given. Schallern answered: 'If you want me, attack me, both sides will then have more honor from the affair.' Then he ordered 'fire!' and with his band of 30 men bravely resisted every assault of the superior force, until towards morning assistance arrived, upon which the enemy withdrew."—Translated from "Die deutschen Hülfsstruppen in Nord-Amerikanen Befreiungskriege, 1776 bis 1783," von Max von Elkning, vol. ii. p. 54.

XXXI.

[For the Pennsylvanian Packet.]

"To impede a young man climbing to fame through the difficult and tedious path of merit requires a depravity of soul which few possess. It is in such exertions that human nature discovers its baseness. With what infamy then are we to mark the attempts that have been made to throw a shade over the splendid enterprise of Paulus Hook? How must we lament that officers in the American Army have undertaken the ungenerous business! It is well known that Major Lee has been arrested, arraigned and tried by a court martial. On what ground, or from what motives the prosecution was maintained, his honorable acquittal from every charge may sufficiently explain. However, in justice to the Army let it be known that it was begun and conducted by the venerable Col. Gist, who was led to believe it his duty from the insinuations of some obscure officers in the Virginia Line. How distressing that a gentleman of his rank and age should declare himself so open to imposition! How fortunate for the chagrined whisperers that their names are as unknown as their actions are insignificant! Happy in their obscurity, they are secure from ignominy. It is observable that one of the charges exhibited against Major Lee conveys an idea that the objects of the enterprise were not completely accomplished. Let the following extracts from his Excellency's letter of instructions illustrate that point. 'My objects are to surprise it, to bring the garrison off immediately, and to effect a secure retreat.' Was not the post of Paulus Hook surprised? Was not the garrison brought off immediately? Was not a secure retreat effected?"

[Pennsylvanian Packet, Sept. 28, 1779.]

"The following is Col. Gist's reply to the above letter:

"To the Printer of the Pennsylvanian Packet."

"I observe in your paper of the 28th of Sept. a piece signed 'Character' whoever the anonymous author is, or whatever his character in life may be, he certainly will never be entitled to the character of an impartial historian unless his future productions prove essentially different. That Major Lee was arrested, tried and honorably acquitted by a court martial is a truth; and the extract from his instructions may be genuine likewise, but in the other part of his narrative he has either ignorantly or with design perverted things in the grossest manner. I am not at present inclined to enter into a detail of matters or examine by what means a shade was cast over the splendid enterprise against Paulus Hook. I am unaccustomed to paper wars and have a total aversion to them; but if I am compelled to engage, it shall not be in the dark. I must first know who my antagonist is, that I may frame my answer accordingly, for I should be very sorry to waste time and employ my pen in answering the productions of a genius upon whom a case might be employed to much better purpose. I shall, therefore, call upon Mr. Character to throw aside the fictitious and assume the real name, that I may know to whom I am beholden for the favor intended me. If Mr. Character is a gentleman I make no doubt this request will be complied with; in that case it is more probable that he will hear further from me. Mr. Character would add greatly to the favors already conferred, and perhaps avoid further interrogations, if, at the same time, he would point out those obscure officers in the Virginia line, who are so ready to impose upon the unwary, that gentlemen who have hitherto escaped the snare may in future be guarded against them.

CHAPTER XVI.

AFFAIR AT BLOCK-HOUSE POINT, 1780.²

FOR a proper understanding of the event which we have undertaken to describe it will be necessary to know the condition of the British wood-pile. The winter of 1779-80 was one of unusual severity. Heavy falls of snow in the vicinity of New York began about the middle of December, and these, added to the intense cold, soon cut off all communication with the city by water. By the middle of January the North River between New York and Paulus Hoeck could be crossed on the ice by the heaviest cannon, and soon afterwards "Provisions were transported upon Sleighs, and Detachments of Cavalry marched from New York to Staten Island (11 Miles) upon the ice."³ The cold was not only intense, but long-continued. As a consequence, fuel became so scarce in the city as to cause great anxiety. The wood on hand rose to such a fabulous quotation that the British commandant was forced to fix the maximum price at four pounds sterling per cord. So limited was the supply that at one time all the fuel belonging to the army in the city was "70 cords of Wood and 80 Chaldrons of Coal,"⁴ and the barrack-master was driven to "purchase a number of old Ships and Hulks to be cut up" to warm the shivering army. "The Raven, a Brig & Schooner belonging to His Majesty," were devoted to this purpose. This scarcity, and the consequent high price of fuel, added to the urgent appeals of the British officers, with the offer of one dollar per cord for cutting, stimulated many efforts to supply the garrison. Whenever the scouting patriots were not too near, the heights of Bergen, covered as they were with a heavy growth of timber, were a tempting field to the woodcutter. Paulus Hoeck as a depot, and its garrison to supply covering parties to the woodsmen, were brought into requisition.⁵ With these shifts, and the aid which the Tory inhabitants of Bergen gave them the British army passed the winter. But the sufferings and annoyances already endured prompted early and abundant provision against their recurrence. During the following summer the crash of falling timber under the sturdy strokes of the woodman's axe, was a familiar and frequent sound from Fort Lee to Bergen Point. The wood was thrown over the rocks or hauled to the shore to be loaded on boats for transportation to the city, or stored at Paulus Hoeck, for the use of that garrison, and to supply the New York market when needed. The refugees and inhabitants of uncertain patriotism were largely engaged in this business, and by it were at once enabled to testify their loyalty to their King, and earn a livelihood for themselves. But while the work was thus profitable both in a patriotic and personal view, it was not wholly unattended with danger. The patriots of the irregular as well as of the regular army, at uncertain and unexpected times, overran this paradise of the woodchopper, rendered his prospective profits in the business somewhat precarious, and now and then abridged his personal ability to serve his King. This made necessary the construction of redoubts and block-houses, into which the wood-chopper could retreat at night, and to which he could fly in case of attack by day. The attempt of Gen. Wayne to destroy one of these block-houses is the subject of this story.

On the New Jersey shore of the Hudson, directly opposite Eightieth Street in the city of New York, is a ravine, which furnishes a very good pass from the river to the top of the heights. It also supplies an easy grade for the hauling of wood from the swamps on the hill to the landing on the shore. The soil and gravel carried by the water down this ravine have formed a small plateau a little above the level of high tide. The gorge is funnel-shaped, with the small end at the top of the hill, and through it the water from the swamps on the high ground flows to the river. Ascending this ravine, the bearing is north, and thus the land lying on the northeast, or between the gorge and the river, assumes an angle somewhat acute. The easterly or river side of this triangle consists of the Palisades, which are precipitous, though at this point broken and irregular. The southwesterly side is closed by the ravine, with its rocky and precipitous bank, decreasing in height as it ascends the mountain. These two sides are inaccessible to attack. The third side of the triangle opens upon a level field on the top of the mountain. Within this triangle, and thirty-three feet northeast of the bank of the ravine, and eighty-seven feet northwest of the palisade on the river side, stood the block-house. Its foundation was about fifteen feet square. It was constructed of logs, in shape, probably, like most structures of the kind, and mounted two pieces of artillery.

The traces of the foundation as they exist at this time show the river side of the structure to have stood on a line running northeast and southwest. The door, and probably the only entrance, was on the southwest side and towards the ravine.¹ Fifty feet to the south of the block-house is a cleft in the rock. This is twelve feet wide at the bottom, but narrows in the ascent so as to admit the passage of only a single person. The bottom of the cleft is thirty-eight feet below the level of the block-house and forty-three feet, horizontally measured, from the top. It offered the only entrance into the works from the ravine or river side. Across the field in front, and about sixty yards distant from the block-house, an abatis was constructed from the bluff on the river to the bluff on the ravine. It must have been about two hundred and twenty-five feet in length. Within this abatis, and probably extending from bluff to bluff, was a stockade, near which was a parapet. The only entrance to the block-house through the defenses was "a subterraneous passage sufficient only for one man to pass." Whether this "passage" refers to the cleft in the rock, already described, or to one under the stockades is perhaps somewhat doubtful. If to the latter, it is probable that the opening was to the left of the block-house. This would give access to the brook farther up the gorge. But we are inclined to the opinion that the cleft in the rock was the "subterraneous" entrance referred to. It was a natural passage, one impossible to pass if defended, and opening at the nearest point to water for the garrison, and to the landing for communication with New York, near the door of the block-house, and the only way of escape towards Paulus Hoeck, which Wayne was careful to cut off.

The construction of this work was due to an organized effort of a few refugees to induce their compatriots "to be employed on ample wages to cut fire-wood for the use of his Majesties Garrison of New York." Those inclined to engage in the enterprise under Tom Ward and others were requested to call at the house of Jacob Jeralemon between the 19th and Tuesday, the 25th day of April, 1780.² On the latter day the opportunity to join the enterprise seems to have closed. There is no doubt that a sufficient number were enrolled for the object contemplated, for on the night of Wednesday, the 30th day of April, a body of refugees, under Col. Abraham Cuyler, who was in command (probably for the reason that he outranked Ward), crossed the river and occupied the ground.³ Apprehensive that they might be disturbed in their work, Gen. Pattison, then in command at New York, ordered Maj. Lunn, then in command at Paulus Hoeck, to send one hundred men under a captain, at daybreak of Thursday, May 1st, to take post on these heights for the purpose of covering Col. Cuyler and his men. It was at this time they began the construction of the works already described. Besides the fortifications, a dock was constructed at the mouth of the ravine to facilitate the loading of the boats.

From this time until the 21st of the following July the refugees held the place and proceeded with their work of cutting wood and committing depredations on the people for miles around. The negroes of Bergen County regarded this post as the gate through which they might pass from slavery in New Jersey to freedom in the city of New York. They improved every opportunity to secure this change until they became a "burden to the town," and the officer in charge was requested by his superior to prevent them passing the North River.⁴ Where Col. Cuyler was at the time of the attack, and why he was absent, we do not know, but in his absence Capt. Tom Ward, subsequently of Fort Delancey, a refugee post on Bergen Neck, was in command⁵ with about seventy men.

The British army lay on the east side of the Hudson. Their encampment extended as far up as Yonkers.

While the position of the block-house was of great strength, its design was not to offer obstinate or long-continued resistance to hostile approach. It was for temporary safety from the attacks of raiding parties of the patriots. More than in its own strength the safety of the position lay in the proximity of the British army. By crossing the river directly to the position immediate relief could be given, while by passing lower down a body could pass up the ravine of the Awiehaken and strike the rear of an attacking force by way of Three Pigeons, English Neighborhood and Liberty Pole. A source of yet greater danger to an attacking force lay in the ease with which a body of the enemy could cross the river from Dobb's Ferry to Closter, pass up the road there constructed and by a short march seize upon the New Bridge.¹ This pass over the Hackensack occupied, and the body marching below seizing the "Little Ferry," an attacking force would be effectually entrapped, with no way of escape except by cutting its way through the enemy.

At the time of the attack, which is the subject of this paper, Washington's headquarters were at the "Dey House," in Peanuckness, and Gen. Wayne's at Totowa, (now Paterson). When and to whom first occurred the thought of destroying the block-house it is quite impossible to say. But there is no doubt that the aid and comfort which the refugees were giving to the enemy in securing a vast quantity of fuel, and the number of cattle owned by the farmers of Bergen County which were liable to capture by foraging parties, suggested the propriety of breaking up this Tory lodge and driving the cattle into the American camp.² The enterprise having been determined on, its execution was entrusted to Gen. Wayne. With his usual energy he forthwith began to reconnoitre the ground and its approaches, to weigh carefully the probabilities of the post being relieved from New York City, and to prepare a warm reception for Clinton's grenadiers should they attempt to reach the heights through the passes leading up from the river.

Accompanied by Robert Erskine, geographer of the Continental army, Wayne visited Closter on the 17th of July, and carefully considered the possibilities of the British crossing the river from Phillips' farm and pushing on to New Bridge by way of Closter Landing. How near to Bull's Ferry he extended his examination of the ground does not appear, but he was without doubt well acquainted with the locality. On the 19th he submitted to the commander-in-chief a plan of operations. On the following day this was approved, and he was directed to proceed with the First and Second Pennsylvania Brigades and Col. Moylan's dragoons "upon the execution of the business."³ His cautious chief suggested a mounted "patrol all night," to provide against an ambuscade which the enemy might attempt, from information received through their emissaries near the American lines. Immediately on receipt of this order, Gen. Wayne directed Capt. Zebulon Pike to proceed with the horse under his command towards the lower landing at Closter where he was to keep a strict eye on the motions of the enemy encamped on the opposite side of the river.⁴ Wayne was apprehensive that they would cross in force and push on to New Bridge for the purpose of cutting off his retreat. Capt. Pike was to be on the ground at "the first dawn of day," provide material for a fire, and in case the enemy indicated an intention to land on the Jersey shore, to "raise as large a smoke as possible on the summit of the hill" in the rear. Expresses with full particulars in writing were to be dispatched to Wayne by way of the Liberty Pole.

With the force mentioned and four six-pounders belonging to Col. Proctor's artillery, in all about eighteen hundred men, Wayne moved from his camp at Totowa at three o'clock in the afternoon of the 20th by the road leading to Hackensack.⁵ At nine in the evening he arrived at the New Bridge. This was a little above the village, and was the only bridge over the Hackensack River south of the old bridge. Here he halted until one o'clock in the morning, when he again took up his line of march on the road leading to the Liberty Pole, (now Englewood). To insure the safety of the New Bridge and his line of retreat, a field officer, with one hundred rank and file, properly officered, was left at this point. The remainder of the force proceeded by way of Liberty Pole and the road leading to Bergen to the road leading from the latter, at what is now Leonia, to Fort Lee. Here the Second Brigade marched up the Fort Lee road to the Palisades, the Sixth Regiment to the lookout directly opposite to Spuyten Duyvel Creek, the Seventh to Fort Lee to observe the motions of the enemy on York Island. These two regiments lay concealed from observation, but ready to meet the enemy should they land and enter the defiles. Lieutenant Harmer also posted a captain and forty men on the bank overlooking the landing opposite to Spuyten Duyvel, while he, with the remainder of his command, advanced southerly along the summit of the mountain about one mile towards Fort Lee, so as to be in a position to defend either place. Patrols were or-

² In a letter, dated "near the Liberty Pole, Bergen County, August 26th, 1786," Washington writes to Governor Livingston: "Our extreme distress for want of provision makes me desirous of lessening the consumption as much as possible. Some brigades of the army have been five days without meat. To endeavor to relieve their wants by stripping the lower part of the country of its cattle. I moved two days ago to this place, and yesterday completely foraged Barbodoss and Bergen Neck. Scarcely any cattle were found but milk cows and calves of one and two years old, and even those in no great plenty." [New Jersey Revolutionary Correspondence, 254]. dered to pass constantly between these points. Gen. Irvine, with the remainder of his (Second) brigade, moved from Fort Lee on the mountain towards Bull's Ferry. As he moved along he threw out a chain of flankers upon his right to beat up the enemy if, having scented the movement, they had prepared an ambush. From Bull's Ferry he moved along the river at the foot of the rocks and took a position on the plateau, near the landing, in order to cut off the retreat of the garrison by the boats.¹

The First Brigade, under Col. Humpton, with whom were also Gen. Wayne, Moylan's dragoons and the artillery, moved along the open road by way of English Neighborhood to Bull's Ferry. Before leaving the old road Wayne ordered Col. Moylan to mount a foot soldier behind each of his dragoons, and ride with all possible speed towards Bergen. On arriving at the Three Pigeons, he left one or two horsemen and some foot to take post at that place to cover him from any attempt of the enemy by way of Weehawken. A detachment of foot also marched to the same point to aid the cavalry in case of need. With the remainder of his dragoons and mounted foot Col. Moylan proceeded to and occupied the fork of the road leading to Paulus Hoeck and Bergen.² This point was, in my opinion, on the top of Weehawken Hill. Here the roads divided, one leading to the town of Bergen and Paulus Hoeck and the other to Weehawken Ferry. By occupying this position he was sure to intercept an enemy coming from Paulus Hoeck or from New York by way of Weehawken. No evidence has been found to justify a conclusion that the dragoons went nearer Bergen on this occasion. And the fact that one month afterward Bergen Neck was foraged of its cattle seems to justify a belief that they did not; so that the cattle collected and driven off in this expedition must have been found between the present Union Hill and the New Bridge. This finds corroboration in Maj. André's "Cow Chase," which, as a whole, may be regarded as more historical than poetical,—

"I under cover of th' attack
Whilst you are all at blows,
From English Neigh' road and Tinnack
Will drive away the cows."

On arriving near the block-house, at about ten o'clock in the morning, Wayne reconnoitered the works. The First Regiment was posted in a hollow way about one hundred yards to the north of the block-house, the Second covered the artillery and the Tenth occupied the ravine to cut off the retreat of the garrison towards Paulus Hoeck. The First and Tenth Regiments were ordered to keep up a constant fire into the port-holes of the block-house to favor the advance of the artillery. These dispositions having been made, at eleven o'clock the artillery advanced to the medium distance of sixty yards from the block-house and opened fire. Without intermission, the cannonade was kept up until a quarter after twelve. During this time fifty-two shots penetrated the front of the block-house, its two small guns were dismounted, and

"Five Refugees ('tis true) were found Stiff on the block-house floor."

That any of the shot which penetrated the house passed through, I have no other evidence than the fact that on the opposite side of the ravine two six-pound shot have recently been found, and the following stanza from the "Cow Chase":

"No shot could pass, if you will take The Gen'ral's Word for true;
But 'tisa d—ble Mistake,
For every Shot went thro'."

But the refugees stationed in different parts of their defenses maintained a stubborn resistance, and fired upon the assailants with telling effect. At this point of time Wayne received a dispatch from Capt. Pike at Closter Landing that the enemy at Valentine's Hill had embarked about three thousand troops on board of nine ships, one schooner and two sloops, and were beating down the river.³ Convinced of his inability to destroy the block-house with the light guns he had, and expecting the enemy to land on the Jersey shore for the purpose of reaching the upland to attack him or cut off his retreat, he convened a council of war on the field. This body soon arrived at the conclusion to retreat without delay. Wayne immediately sent word to Col. Moylan to drive off the cattle from the Three Pigeons and proceed with all dispatch to the Liberty Pole.⁴ When the troops, however, comprehended the situation, and that they were to retreat, leaving the works undestroyed and the garrison un-captured, the First Regiment left the hollow in which they had awaited the effect of the artillery fire, and with impetuosity broke through the abatis and rushed up to the stockade. The Second caught the enthusiasm and also rushed forward. The Tenth, being in the ravine, and Gen. Irvine's troops, being below the rocks along the river, were unable to advance. It was at this juncture that the heavy losses of the day occurred. The attacking force was unable to pass the stockade. This being within easy musket range of the block-house, the refugees, firing through the loopholes, deliberately shot down the baffled troops. After considerable effort of the officers to withdraw their troops they fell back, and with the artillery moved up towards Fort Lee and Closter to meet the enemy should they attempt to land. This, however, was not attempted. After destroying some wooden-boats at the landing near the mouth of the ravine, and capturing the deck-hands and cabin-boys, the disappointed troops marched back to New Bridge, taking with them the killed and wounded, except three who lay dead under the stockade. Gen. Wayne remained at

New Bridge that night, and reach his headquarters at Totowa on the following day.

The results of this expedition were not gratifying to the Americans. They drove off, between the Three Pigeons and New Bridge, "several hundred quadrupeds, consisting of horses, horned cattle, sheep and hogs;" or, as Maj. André described it,—

"All in a cloud of dust were seen
The sheep, the horse, the goat,
The gentle Heifer, and the swine,
The Yearling and the stork."

They captured a few men in charge of the wood-boats at the landing and burned the boats. They killed six and wounded fifteen refugees. Nothing more than this was accomplished, notwithstanding the comparatively large force employed, the labor performed and the bravery exhibited. But as a set-off to these meagre results were the works at the post undestroyed, fifteen killed and forty-nine wounded. The failure produced a keen and deep-felt mortification. Washington deeply regretted the misfortune, and hastened to explain away its bad effect upon Congress.¹ Gen. Wayne spoke of the attack as only a ruse to draw the enemy over to the Jersey shore, that he might cut them to pieces in the gorges of the mountain.² He afterwards assigned another object to the expedition, in which he claims to have been successful, but which to me seems an afterthought, viz. to prevent, or at least delay, the British sailing from New York to attack the French, then recently arrived at Newport;³ yet all of these ideas may naturally have made part of the general combination to keep the British force at New York alarmed and on the alert.

To add yet a keener pang to the mortification of failure, the enemy indulged in great exultation. In their sarcasm it did not require the trained soldiers of the King to rout the "rebels" with the hero of Stony Point at their head,—a few mercenary wood-choppers were able to withstand the flower of the American army, although about twenty-five times their number. Sir Henry Clinton testified to them "his very particular Acknowledgement of their Merit."⁴ The King of Great Britain acquainted "the survivors of the brave seventy that their behavior is approved of by their Sovereign" and characterized their resistance as a "very extraordinary instance of courage."⁵ A sarcastic notice was published in Rivington's Gazette of July 28, 1780:

"A lady presents her compliments to the Sr. Clement of the Philadelphia Ball Room, and desires the next country dance may commence with a new movement, called

A TRIP TO THE BLOCK-HOUSE, OR THE WOODCHOPPERS' TRIUMPH.

In complement to a certain General, who (scolding his brother Arnold) was lately checked on the North River by a malthewcense event, and his glories (now on the Wase) threatened with an insuperable mortification."

The most keen and clever satire of the expedition was the mock heroic poem, by Maj. André, called "The Cow Chase." But notwithstanding all this rejoicing, the refugees did not care to try the experiment of another attack. They had been saved, not through their own powers but through a mistake in attacking them with such light guns. On the 9th of August following they evacuated the place, burnt the block-house and retired to Fort Mifflin, on Bergen Neck.

Thus ends the story of Wayne's attack on the block-house, near Bull's Ferry, July 21, 1780. What little glory is derivable from it does not belong to the American side. It is true, while they were Loyalists in sentiment, the refugees were American born. The only comfort the patriots could derive from repulse was found in the fact that they were so manfully withstood by refugees and not by the British. If when Greek meets Greek in the tug of war, the glory of triumph belongs alike to victor and vanquished, then the patriots could insist upon their right to a share of what the refugees claimed for themselves for the stubborn defense of their works. Viewed in any other light, they were entitled to but little credit for the labors and sacrifices of that day. Block-House Point did not add freshness to the laurels which Stony Point had placed upon the brow of Gen. Wayne.

"Sir:

"You will be pleased to order a Detachment of a Captain and 100 Men, from the Garrison at Pauls Hook to march from thence to-morrow Morning at Day break, with one days Provisions.—This Detachment will proceed upon the Road leading to the English Neighbourhood, and the Commanding Officer will take Post upon the Heights, half a Mile below Bull's Ferry, upon the North River, in such manner as will most effectually cover a Body of Refugees under Col. Cuyler, who are to take Post and establish themselves, at the Place above mentioned. This Night, in order to send Wood for the Army. The distance from Pauls Hook is Eight Miles. The Detachment will remain till Sun set and then return to their Quarters, and the Officer Commanding the Party will communicate with Mr. Cuyler in such manner, as may most effectually tend to forward this service.

"I have only further to observe that Mr. Cuyler is not to be understood as having any Military rank upon this occasion."—N. Y. Historical Society Collection, 1875.

III.—GEN. WAYNE TO GEN. WASHINGTON

"Totowa, 18th July, 1780

"In obedience to your Excellency's orders I proceeded with Mr. Fiske to reconnoitre the landing places from Closter to Kolda's Ferry, and found the following viz:—

"Closter landing situate about six or seven miles above Fort Lee—and a little south of Phillips's was formerly made use of by the Inhabitants in its vicinity, and rendered practicable for two horse loads, from the Facility of the mountains to the river is about one-half of a mile which is too steep and narrow to admit of Common Carriages—the descent being equal to one foot in five on an average—nor is there a sufficient area at the Dock to turn a team, or lodge stores upon— notwithstanding this the enemy found means to carry up a few light field pieces in it—but from experience I know that Artillery can be conveyed by manual labor over precipices and thro' defiles impracticable for Horses and waggons which must have been the case here.

"This road is at present obstructed by felled trees and large rocks so that nothing but single footmen can pass and that with difficulty. A few Infantry might defend the avenue—yet it will not afford a proper position to erect a Battery to cover the landing from the Inland of shipping.

"The next is called Cluster Dock—about a mile and a half higher up the river, and a little North of Phillips's, this road is also impracticable for waggons part of the way forming an angle of near 20 degrees descent—but as a Military position much superior to the first—between this and Dobbs's is another landing, less practicable than either of these.

"Our next object was Dobbs's ferry which affords an easy and safe carriage, the road leading to it from Cluster, Paramus, &c.—being very level and with a little improvement may be made excellent—there are six months men under Captains Laurence and Blanck, at Tappan and Cluster sufficient for the purpose.

"The ground on the West side of the river is favorable for Batteries against shipping—an attempt was made by the enemies Gallies to annoy the ferry way in 1778—when they soon found it expedient to fall down the river on receiving a few shot from a little work thrown up in haste to cover the landing.

"There are two small eminences one on the North the other on the South side the road which with a Block-house and Captains commanding each, would effectually cover the Battery from any attempt by land unless accompanied by Artillery and in force.

"The east side is also favorable for Batteries to cover the landing—And immediately to the S. E. is a hill or strong rising ground commanding all the country within reach of cannon shot, and may be rendered a safe repository for the stores when landed.

"I must beg leave to refer you to Mr. Erskine for the state of the roads and their distances.

"Interim, I am your Excellency's most obedient and very Humble Servant.

"ANTY WAYNE.

"Head Quarters Colonel Dey's
"20 July, 1780.

"Dear Sir,

"You will proceed with the first and second Pennsylvania brigades, and Colonel Moylan's regiment of dragoons, upon the execution of the business planned in yours of yesterday. I do not at present think of any necessary alteration, except that of detaching a few horse this afternoon to patrol all night, and to see that the enemy do not, in the course of the night, throw over any troops to form an ambuscade. They need not go so low down, nor in such numbers, as to create any alarm. They may enquire as they go for deserters, after whom they may say they are in pursuit. The enemy have so many emissaries among us, that scarcely a move or an order passes unnoticed. You are so well acquainted with the critical situation of the ground, that it is needless in me to recommend the extreme of caution. I most heartily wish you success, being with real esteem, &c."—Sparks' Writings of Washington, vii., 115.

V.—GEN. WAYNE TO []

"Totoway 20th July 1780.

"Dear Sir

"You will proceed with the horse under your command towards the lower landing at Cluster, so as to be certain of arriving on the lookout tomorrow morning by the first dawn of day—where you will keep the strictest eye on the motions of the enemy, stationed on Volantine's hill, and near Phillips's, should you discover an attempt in them to effect a landing on this side the North River you will immediately raise as large a smoke as possible on the summit of the hill in your rear keeping it up as long as the enemy continues to cross for which purpose you'll prepare fuel and materials the instant you arrive on the ground.

"You will also despatch two or more trusty horsemen with the particular intelligence in writing of the numbers &c. that embark, the moment they get on board the boats,—they are to push with all possible despatch by the Liberty Pole towards Bull's ferry where I will be found.

"You are to call on Captain Blanck of the six months men to join you with his company, and all the militia he can collect, and should the enemy attempt a landing you and he are to give them every possible opposition—the defiles thro' which they must pass to gain the hill will be very favorable for the purpose—and if properly defended may oblige the enemy to retire and reflect lasting honor on the troops that oppose them. As the safety of the whole Division and horse greatly depend on a strict observance of every part of these orders I am confident they will be carried into execution.

"You will retire tomorrow evening to the new bridge giving Captain Blanck directions to send to that place, if he should make any discoveries after you leave him.

"Interim, I am your most obt. Humd Servant

VI.—GEN. WAYNE'S DIVISION ORDERS.

"After Orders New Bridge,

"12 o'clock 21st 1780

"A field officer with two companies or one hundred Rank and file properly officered to take post at this place, which if attacked in the absence of the Division, must be defended to the last extremity.

"The Sixth Regiment will advance to the lookout immediately opposite, Spiken-level Creek or Kings Bridge—the seventh to Fort Lee in order to observe the motions of the enemy on York Island; The Others and men will secrete themselves so as not to be observed from the opposite side the River—

"Lieut. Col. Harmer will leave a Capt. and forty men on the bank overlooking the landing place, in order to defend that defile—whilst he with the remainder advances along the summit of the mountain about one mile lower down between that and Fort Lee, so as to be in a position to move to either place or point in case the enemy attempt a landing, but the Capt's command must continue in the post assigned him at all events—

"Patrols to pass constantly between the posts and up the river, should the commanding officer observe the enemy embarking—they are to send immediate notice to Genl. Wayne towards Bull's ferry, and to make every possible opposition, when the enemy begins to ascend the Hill, and as the situation of these Regiments will admit of Acting in Conjunction in case of necessity; the General has the fullest confidence that they will maintain the posts assigned them; and at the point of the Bayonet, meet the enemy in the gorge of the Defiles and dispute that ground at every expense of blood until the arrival of the Division when they may be assured of effectual support and in all human probability of a glorious victory.

"General Irvine with the remainder of his Brigade, will move by fort Lee on the summit of the mountain for Bull's ferry and endeavor to introduce a sufficient number of men between the Block-house and the River if practicable so as to prevent the retreat of the garrison, great caution must be observed on this route least the Troops may be drawn into an ambush, should that be the case the Bayonet will be their true resort—Which they will use with a confidence of being vigorously supported by the first Penns. Brigade, moving parallel with them—attended by Colo. Moylan's Dragoons and the Artillery along the open road—Genl. Irvine will direct a chain of flankers to observe the advance of the right column, the situation of the ground being favorable for it—if he makes any material discovery he will be so obliging as to communicate it—the soonest possible—

"A Detachment from the first will prevent the retreat of the Refugees towards Patters hook, whilst this is performing, the Artillery will be preparing to demolish the Block House.

"Every precaution will be used to guard against any serious consequences from up the river, and should the enemy be hardly enough to attempt the relief of this Post from Fort Washington it may add never failing laurels to troops which has always stepped the first for Glory, and who has everything to expect from victory—nothing to dread from disgrace, for altho it is not in their power to command success, the General is well assured they will produce a conviction to the world that they deserve it."—From original in Department of State, Washington.

"Being convinced that our field-passes were too tight to make the wished impression on the Block-house by Bull's Ferry from an experience of more than an hour at a greater distance than from fifty to seventy yards, during which time both flanks and main column a flight of heavy sabbal commad, but never ceased and seeing the enemy in motion on York Island, and their shipping under way together with certain accounts of the unbarking of a very large body of troops from Valentine's Hill, it was unambiguously determined, in a Council of War in the field, to withdraw the artillery, and fall back by easy degrees to this place, to prevent the disagreeable consequences of being shut up in Bergen Neck. We accordingly moved off, after burning the flats and boats lying at the landing, and driving the cattle from that country, which was part of our plan. Our loss is from fifty to sixty killed and wounded, whom we carried off, without the least molestation. I will have the honor of transmitting to Your Excellency the particulars tomorrow.

"I think it my duty to mention, that the enemy are in full motion on the North River, chief part of their troops embarked. As they have completed their foraging in the East and Westchester may not good policy induce them to take post between the Liberty Pole and this place, in order to render that essential article very difficult for your Excellency to procure, in case of a siege. XIII.—GEN. WAYNE TO GEN. WASHINGTON

Totowa 22 July, 1780

"Dear General,

"In pursuance of the plan, which your Excellency was pleased to adopt the first and second Pennsylvania brigades with four pieces of artillery belonging to Colonel Proctor's regiment, and Colonel Moylan's dragoons, took up their line of march on the 20th, at three o'clock P.M. and arrived, a little in the rear of New Bridge, at nine in the evening. We moved again at one in the morning, in order to occupy the ground in the vicinity of Fort Lee and the landing opposite King's Bridge, by the dawn of day; and agreeably to the enclosed order, we advanced towards Bull's Ferry, General Irvine, with part of his brigade, along the summit of the mountain, and the first brigade, under Colonel Humpton, with the artillery and Colonel Moylan's horse, on the common road. About ten o'clock, part of the first brigade had reached that place. Colonel Moylan with the horse, and a detachment of infantry, remained at this lock of the road leading to Paulus Hook and Bergen, to receive the enemy, if they attempted any thing from that quarter.

On re-mentioning the Refuge Post, near Bull's Ferry, we found it to consist of a block-house, surrounded by an abatis, and stockade to the perpendicular rocks near the North River, with a kind of ditch or parapet, serving as a covered way. By this time we could discover the enemy in motion on York Island, which began to open a prospect of our pain taking a full effect. General Irvine was directed to halt in a position from which he could move to any point where the enemy should attempt to land, either in the vicinity of this post or Fort Lee, where the sixth and seventh regiments were previously concentrated, with orders to wait the landing of the enemy, and then, at the point of the bayonet, to dispute the pass in the gorge of the mountain, at every expense of blood, until supported by General Irvine, and the remainder of the troops.

The first regiment was posted in a hollow way on the north side of the block-house, and the tenth in another hollow on the south, with orders to keep up a constant fire into the port-holes, to favor the advance of the artillery, which was covered by the second regiment. When the four field-pieces belonging to Colonel Proctor's Regiment arrived at the medium distance of sixty yards, they commenced a constant fire, which was returned by the enemy, and continued without intermission from eleven until a quarter after twelve o'clock. By that time we received express from Closter, that the enemy were embarking their troops from Valentine's Hill, at Phillips Landing. We also saw many vessels and boats in view up with troops from New York, which made it necessary to refrain push a lesser for a much greater object, that is, drawing the enemy over toward the posts already mentioned, and deciding the fortune of the day in the defiles through which they must pass before they could gain possession of the strong grounds.

In the interim we found that our artillery had made but little impression, although well and gallantly served, the metal not being of sufficient weight to traverse the logs of the block-house; but when the troops understood that they were to be drawn off, such was the enthusiastic bravery of all ranks of officers and men, that the first regiment, no longer capable of restraint, rather than leave a post in the rear, rushed with impetuosity over the abatis, and advanced to the stockades, from which they were with difficulty withdrawn, although they had no means of forcing an entry. The contagion spread to the second; but by very great efforts of the officers of both regiments, they were at last restrained, not without the loss of some gallant officers wounded and some brave men killed. Happy it was that the ground would not admit of the further advance of the tenth regiment, and that the situation of General Irvine's brigade prevented them from experiencing a loss proportioned to the immediately engaged (as the same gallant spirit pervaded the whole), which might be the means of frustrating our main object, by inumbering us with too many wounded.

The artillery was, therefore, drawn off, and forwarded towards the wished-for point of action. The killed and wounded were all moved away, except three, that lay dead under the stockades. During this period, Colonel Molyne's horse drove the cattle &c. from Bergen up towards the Liberty Pole, whilst a detachment of infantry destroyed the sloops and wood-boats at the landing, in which were taken a Captain and mate, with two sailors. Some others were killed whilst attempting to escape by swimming. Having thus effected part of our plan, we pushed forward to oppose the troops from Valentine's Hill that we expected to land at the nearest point to New Bridge. If effected, we were determined to drive them back, or to cut our way through; but in this project we were disappointed; the enemy thought proper to remain in a less hostile position than that of the Jersey shore. We therefore passed the New Bridge, and, by easy degrees returned to this place about an hour ago.

Inclosed is a copy of the orders of the 20th together with a return of the killed and wounded, 64 in number, among whom are Lieutenants Hammond and Crawford, of the first, and Lieutenant Dehart of the second, all very worthy officers; the latter, mortally wounded.

I cannot attempt to discriminate between officers, regiments, or corps, who, with equal opportunity, would have acted with equal fortitude. Should my conduct, and that of the troops under my command, meet your Excellency's approbation, it will much alleviate the pain I experience in not having it in my power to carry the whole of the plan into execution, which was only prevented by the most malicious fortune."

XIV.—GEN. WAYNE'S DIVISION ORDERS.

"July 25th, 1780.

"It is with infinite pleasure that General Wayne acknowledges to the worthy officers and soldiers under his command since the 20th inst., that he never saw more true fortitude than that exhibited on the 21st by the troops immediately at the point of action—Such was the enthusiastic bravery of all ranks of officers and men that the 1st regt. no longer capable of restraint, rushed with impetuosity over the abatis and up to the Stockades, from which they were with difficulty withdrawn; the contagion spread to the 2d—but by the united efforts of the field and other officers of each regt. they were at last restrained. The General fortunately would not admit of the further advance of the 10th & the situation of General Irvine's & the other troops, prevented them from experiencing some loss of men; as the same gallant spirit pervaded the whole, they very probably would have shown the same eager desire for close action. The block-house was only a secondary object, & to serve as a line to draw the enemy across the river, & to afford us an opportunity of deciding the fate of the day in the defiles through which they might pass before they could possess the strong ground. At 12 o'clock the affairs assumed a pleasing aspect—By intelligence from Closter that the British were embarking at Phillips & falling down the river towards Fort Lee, where the 6th & 7th regts were posted with orders to secure themselves, and after the enemy landed to meet them in the gorge of the mountain & dispute the pass with the point of the Bayonet at every expense of blood, until General Irvine with the 2d, and Colonel Humpton with the first Brigade were arrive to support them. So that there ought to be no difficulty in giving up a small object for one that was capital. Indeed, had the artillery been of sufficient caliber, the brave officers & men who conducted them would have succeeded in the reduction of the block-house by a constant fire of more than one hour, within the medium distance of 60 yards, & not be under the disagreeable accusation of leaving a post unsecured behind them; this being too trifling an affair to attend to any longer, when a more ample and glorious prospect was before us, but in this way we have been disappointed as the enemy prudently chose to remain in a less hostile position than that of the Jersey shore.

The General cannot attempt to discriminate between officers, Regts or Corps, who with equal opportunity would have acted with equal fortitude—& he fondly hopes that day is not far distant, when the prowess of those troops will be acknowledged by the European & American World.

XVI.—GEN. WAYNE TO COLS. DELANY AND JOHNSON.

"Dear Colonels, "Tutwamy 26 July 1780

"You have undoubtedly heard of our march to Bergen, but as ignorance, malice or envy, aided by the tongue of slander, may attempt to misrepresent that affair, I shall just mention the objects in view, viz: to drive the stock out of Bergen Neck; to prevent the enemy from receiving constant supplies from that quarter, and in case of a siege to secure to our own use those cattle which they would carry into New York. One other was the destruction of the Refuge Post near Bull's Ferry, consisting of a Block-House, surrounded by a stockade and abatis, with a ditch or parapet serving as a covered way, garrisoned by refugees, Tories, and all the landitti, and robbers and horse thieves of that country, with some pieces of artillery. But the grand object was to draw the army which General Clinton brought from Charleston, made up of grenadiers, guards and light infantry, into the defiles of the mountain in the vicinity of Fort Lee, where we expected them to land, in order to succour the Refuge post, or to embark to cut off our retreat to New Bridge, the object to them was great; the lure appeared to take: three thousand British embarked at Phillips's and fell down opposite the landings, where the sixth and seventh regiments were posted with orders to secrete themselves until the enemy had disembarked, and then to meet them in the gorge of the defiles, and with the point of the Bayonet to dispute the pass at every expence of blood, until the arrival of the first and second brigades, which would place the British boys between three and four days, a circumstance which will render their meditated attack wholly abortive, I always had the highest opinion of the Pennsylvania troops, if it were possible, on this occasion they would have increased my admiration.

"Tell Mrs Delaney and Mrs Peters that of equal rank no country or service can produce a more worthy officer than their brother, Lieutenant Colonel Robinson; if he has a fault, it is extreme excess of bravery. He commanded the first regiment that day; his horse was wounded under him in two places, and his coat riddled by musket balls and bullet-shot, he has deservedly become the idol of his soldiers."—The Cricket (September, 1829), iii. 397.

XVII.—GEN. WAYNE TO PRESIDENT REED.

Philadelphia, 26 July, 1780.

Dr. Sir,

"You have undoubtedly heard of our tour to Bergen, but it is a duty I owe to you, the troops I commanded & to myself, to make you acquainted with the objects of that expedition, lest the envy, Malice, or tongue-d slander should attempt to misrepresent that affair.

"One was to take all the stock out of Bergen neck to prevent the enemy from receiving constant supplies from the Inhabitants out of that Quarter, and in case of siege to secure to their own use those Cattle that they would Inevitably carry into New York, another was the Destruction of a post near Bull's ferry, consisting of a Block-House, surrounded by a strong Stockade, and abattis, Garrisoned by the Refugees & a wretched banditti of Robbers, horse thieves, &c.

"But the Grand Object was to draw the army which Sir Henry Clinton brought from Charles town into action in the Defiles of the Mountain in the Vicinity of Fort Lee, where we expected them to Land in order to succour the refuge post, and to endeavour to cut off our retreat to the Liberty Pole & New Bridge, the apparent object to them was great, and the lure had to take the wished effect. Three thousand men, consisting of the flower of the British Army were embarked near Phillips and stood down the river hovering off the Landing near Fort Lee, where the 6th & 7th Pennsy Regiments lay concealed with directions to let them land unmolested (giving me Intelligence of the attempt,) & then to meet them in the Gorge of the Defile and with the point of the Bayonet to dispute the pass at every expence of blood, until the arrival of the first and second Pennsy Brigades when we should put them between three such force as no human fortitude would withstand, and I may now with safety mention that it was also designed to divert their attention from a Meditated attempt on Rhode Island by a combined attack by Land and Water in the French fleet & Army in that place, this has had the effect of retarding them four days after they had actually Embarked upwards of six thousand men for that very purpose, it will therefore be too late to attempt anything at this period as the french will be prepared for it.

"It is now the order of the 20th and 22d to which and to the General's letter to Congress I must refer you for particulars.

"I always had the highest Opinion of the troops but my most sanguine wishes, fell far short of the real fortitude & bravery, which pervades the whole, even the new recruits rush on to storm altitho' not the object."—Pennsylvania Archives, iii. 450.

XVIII.—GEN. WASHINGTON TO THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS.

Head Quarters, Bergen County,

July 26, 1780.

Dr. Sir,

"Having received information that there were considerable numbers of cattle and Horses in Bergen Neck, within reach of the enemy and having reason to suspect that they meant shortly to draw all supplies of that kind within their lines. I dated his Brigadier General Wayne, on the 20th, with the first and second Pennsylvania Brigades, with four pieces of Artillery attached to them, and Colonel Moylan's regiment of dragoons to bring them off. I had it also in contemplation, to attempt, at the same time, the destruction of a Block house erected at Bull's Ferry which served the purposes of covering the enemy's wood cutters and giving security to a body of Refugees, by whom it was garrisoned, and which committed depredations upon the well affected Inhabitants for many miles around.

"General Wayne having disposed of his troops in such a manner as to guard the different landing places in the Bergen shore, upon which the enemy might throw over troops from York Island to enter the retreat, and having sent down the artillery to execute the business of firing all the stock, proceeded with the first, second and tenth regiments and the artillery to the Block-house, which he found surrounded by an abattis and stockade. He for sometime tried the effect of his fire upon it, but though the fire was kept up for an hour, they were found the light to penetrate the logs of which it was constructed. The troops, during this time, being gall'd by a constant fire from the loopholes of the house, and seeing no chance of making a breach with cannon—those of the first and second regiments notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the officers to restrain them, rushed through the abattis to the foot of the stockade with a view of forcing an entrance, which was found impracticable. This act of intemperence was the cause of the loss we sustained, and which amounted in the whole to three officers wounded, 15 men wounded and privates killed, and 46 men committed and privates wounded. The wounded officers were Lieutenants Hammond and Crawford of the first and Lieutenant D. Heart of the second, the last indeed I cannot but mention his death with regret, as he was a young gentleman of amiable qualities, and who promised far to be serviceable to his country.

"The dragoons in the meantime drove off the stock which were found in the Neck, the shot and wood balls in the dock near the block house were burnt, and the few people of board them made prisoners.

"I have been thus particular, lest the account of this affair above here reached should be too much exaggerated, as is commonly the case upon such occasions."—Pennsylvania Packet, Aug. 1, 1780.

XIX.—PRESIDENT REED TO GEN. WAYNE.

Philadelphia Aug. 4, 1780.

Dr. Sir:

"I duly received & thank you for your Favour of the 26th July Inclosing your Orders on the late Excursion to Bergen. They have been spoke of here much to your Honour & with the gallant Behaviour of the Men show that tho' we did not meet with entire Success we deserved it.

"Neither the Objects of the Expedition, nor the Conduct of it were fully understood here at first, & as often happens on such Occasions, were misrepresented, but a few Days & better Information soon set the Matter right—if any Doubts had remained the General's Letter wiped them off, tho' in some Respects it tended to make the Affair of the Block-House a more important Business than I really was. As to the Whispers of Envy & Malice-void of Slander, you must, my dear Sir, submit in common with your Fellow Men to a Share of them as the Tax which Merit and Distinction must pay. The World would be too estimable if every Action was judged upon the Principles of Candour & its due Worth assigned it unalloyed by Jealousy & Uncharitableness. In one Respect military merit is least subject to^{be} than any other, as it has Witnesses of Companions & the Benefits arising to mankind from a conspicuous Display of it are such that the World is ready to be its Friend for its own Interest. Should you be called, as probably you may, to any distant, and I believe civil Life you will find the Arts of busy wicked Men more successful, and not so easily detected or parried. Scarce a week elapses but some wretched Falsehood takes Wing with Respect to us, flutters about & dies, when a new one more palatable & adapted to the Staff of the Day arises, which in its Turn gives Way to a fresher. For a time I felt myself hurt & spent Time and Labour to combat them, but I have long since learnt that the best Shield is Integrity & trust Remedies. I am informed that there has been much Industry used this Spring & Summer in a Campaign on this Score & that it is very frequent at this Time. So much Pain to lessen me in the Opinion of Mankind while I am pursuing diligently the Interests of my Country with a single uninterfered View to its Success in this great Cause fully convinces me that there are some Men who have different Intentions & who fear to rest Men on public Stations. I have at different Periods had my Vandons worked upon, my Interests assailed, splendid Prospects held forth to engage me in the Views of Party & I never experienced the full Weight of Enmity till I had fully declared every Overture of this Nature in such a Manner as left no Hope of Success. However, I trust there is Virtue & Disinterest in the World sufficient to support a Man to doing his Duty & that I have some Friends who will judge upon Facts not upon Suggestions, especially when they come thro' so corrupt a Channel.

XX.—JOHN WALKER TO GEN. WEEBON.

"Philadelphia, August 15, 1780.

"General Wayne made an unsuccessful attempt to storm a block-house of the enemy at Bergen a few days ago. The attack was made with the utmost gallantry and the place would probably have been carried, but no entrance could be found, there being no other but a subterraneous one. Our loss was sixty odd killed and wounded, in exchange for which we got some hundreds of bullocks. As much as we want beef this is but bad exchange."—Papers relating chiefly to the Maryland Line during the Revolution, p. 114.

XXI.—SIR HENRY CLINTON TO LORD GERMAIN.

"East Hampton, Suffolk Co., L. I.

"August 20, 1780.

"I HAVE the satisfaction of communicating to your Lordship, an instance of courage, which reflects the greatest honour on a small body of the Refugees.

"About Seventy of them had taken post on a part of the opposite shore on the North River, called Bull's Ferry, where they had fortified themselves with a Block-house and Stockade, to be protected in cutting wood, the labour they were employed in their maintenance.

"A corps of near two thousand Rebels, under their Generals Wayne Irving and Proctor, with seven pieces of cannon, made an attack upon them on the 21st ult. Notwithstanding a cannonade of three hours, almost every shot of which penetrated through the Block-house and an attempt to carry the place by assault, they were repulsed by these brave men, with the loss of a great many killed and wounded. The exertions of the Refugees did not cease; after having resisted so great a force, they followed the enemy, seized their stragglers and rescued from them the cattle they were driving from the neighbouring district.

"The Block-house which I visited was pierced with fifty-two shot in one face only and the two small guns that were in it, were dismounted six of the Refugees were killed and fifteen wounded—the far greater part in the Block-house."—From The London Gazette, printed in "The One Chase," London, 1781.

XXII.—ADMIRAL GEN. MACKENZIE TO CAPT. WARD.

"Head Quarters, 11th Dec. 1780.

"Sir,

"I HAVE the pleasure of sending you, by the direction of his Excellency the Commander in Chief, the enclosed extract of a letter which he has received by the last packet, from Lord George Germain, one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, and which he is happy to communicate to you, by the first opportunity.

"I am, Sir, Your most obedient,

"Humble servant,

"FRED MACKENZIE.

"D. A. Gen.

"Capt. Ward, Loyal Refugees."

INCLOSURE.

Extract of Letter from LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to his Excellency SIR HENRY CLINTON, dated 3th October, 1780.

"The very extraordinary instance of courage shown by the Loyal Refugees, in the affair of Bull's ferry, of which you make such honorable mention, is a pleasing proof of the spirit and resolution with which men in their circumstances will meet against their oppressors, and how great advantages the Kings troops may derive from enjoying those of approved valour. And His Majesty to encourage such exertions, commands us to desire you will acquaint the survivors of the brave SEVENTY, that their intrepid behavior is approved of by their Sovereign."—Bivington's Gazette, Dec. 13, 1780.

XXIII.—JOHN POST TO WILLIAM VAN INGEN.

"West Point 10th Decr., 1780.

"Our Brigade was posted at Fort Lee to watch the enemies motion from F. Washington which is directly opposite to it, while we lay there two British soldiers swam over to us in the night, from this place I had a fair view of the City, the East River & their encampment on York Island.

One of the inhabitants said that Jacob Glenn had been in his Home, that he is an Engr. in the Levies and that he was in the Block-house when General Wayne attacked it, which they have since evacuated and demolished—this is all I can tell about him."—From the original in possession of C. E. Van Cortlandt.

XXIV.—COL. PROCTOR'S FORCE.

In the department of State, at Washington, there is an original "Return of the non-commissioned and matrosses in the Corps of Art'y, the Statos to which they belong & the number wanting to complete the Establishment, July 12, 1780," which probably gives Colonel Proctor's force in the attack:

"4th Regt, Col. Proctor, Penna, 8 Companies, effective force of non-com. & Mat. 149, wanting to complete 283, establishment 432."

XXV.—AMERICAN ACCOUNTS OF THE AFFAIR.

"Thursday, the 19th instant, the first and second Pennsylvania brigades, commanded by Brigadier General Wayne, marched from their respective encampments for the purpose of collecting & bringing off those cattle in Bergen County, immediately exposed to the enemy. After executing the order, General Wayne, on his return, visited a block-house in the vicinity of Bergen town, built and garrisoned by a number of Refugees to prevent the disagreeable necessity of being forced into the British sea service. The work was found proof against light artillery, when a part of the first and second Pennsylvania Regiments were ordered to attempt it by assault, when, after forcing their way through the abatis and pickets, a retreat was indispensably necessary, there being no other entrance in the Block-house but a subterraneous passage sufficient only for one man to pass. Our loss consists of 69, including 3 officers, killed and wounded. Lieutenant Moody and six of his party were taken on their return from an excursion to Sussex."—Pennsylvania Packet, July 25, 1780.

"We hear that on Friday morning last the Pennsylvania line under the command of General Wayne, made an unsuccessful attack against the block-house, the enemy erected some time ago at Closter, in Bergen County. Our failure, it is said, was owing to the lightness of our artillery, and the enemy's metal being much heavier than was expected. Our troops however recovered several hundred head of quadrupeds, consisting of horses, horned cattle, sheep and hogs, which the banditti that infest the neighborhood had plundered from the inhabitants. Our loss on this occasion is said to be several killed and wounded."—New Jersey Gazette, July 26, 1780.

"On the morning of the 25th ult., died at Camp, of the wounds he received in bravely doing his duty before the Block-house near Bull's ferry on the 21st Lieutenant Jacob Morris De Hart, brother of Col. De Hart, of the 2d Pennsylvania Regiment, aged nineteen years, the emulation and fire necessary to warm a soldier's breast soon kindled in this young, but manly officer, having entered into the service of his country at sixteen; from which time his sweetness of disposition, and attention to duty, gave him the affection of officers of every rank. At five o'clock in the afternoon he was buried with the honours of war, attended by a large concourse of officers from the different lines of the army."—New Jersey Gazette, Aug. 2, 1780.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM TAPPAN, DATED AUG. 11, 1780.

"The British have called in their out-posts. On the 9th instant they evacuated and burnt the Block-house in Bergen, on which General Wayne lately made an unsuccessful attack."—The Connecticut Gazette, Aug. 25, 1780.

XXVI.—BRITISH ACCOUNTS OF THE AFFAIR.

"Yesterday morning about nine o'clock, Generals Wayne and Irwin with the 1st and 2d Pennsylvania Brigades of Infantry, Col. Moyland's Cavalry, and Proctor's Artillery, the Flower of Washington's Army, consisting of about 1000 Troops, with six SIX Pounders, and one Howitz, appeared in view of Col. Cuyler's Refuge Post, on the Jersey Shore, which was then commanded by Capt. Thomas Ward; about 10 o'clock they advanced with their Cannon to within 60 Yards of the Refuge Works, and commenced a tremendous Cannonade, which lasted till half past 11; they attempted to storm the Abatis but were repulsed with the loss of about 90 killed and wounded, among which are five officers.

"The loss of the Refugees is 4 killed and 8 slightly wounded, no Veterans could have behaved better on this occasion than these few Loyalists. And his excellency the Commander in Chief has expressed his Thanks and approbation to this LOYAL BATTAL for their spirit and gallant Behaviour."—Bivington's Gazette, July 22, 1780.

"The following is the Names of the brave Refugees that were killed and wounded at Col. Cuyler's Refuge Post, near Fort Lee, about 8 Miles from New York, on Hudson's River, on Friday, the 21st inst. viz.

"Thomas Phillips, an artillery, John McMurry, with another man and a Negro killed.

"Lieutenant George and Absalom Bull Alexander Sharp, John and Ezekiel Ford, and John Mullen wounded.

"The principal Officers on the Attack were Colonel Moylan, Sergeant Bayne, Platoon, and Major Lee and Mose.

"Thus the chosen Band of Washington's Army were repulsed by a few determined Loyalists, and we have reason to believe the Loss of the Band much greater than has yet been ascertained—and to add more to the spirit of the Rebellion a Party under the Command of the Brave Captain Ward, pursued the Rear of the retreating Army upwards of 4 miles, took twenty thousand of Loyalists that were arrested from the well-affected Neighbour, killed one Rebel, and made Prisoner of General Wayne's Servant and another.

"By the confession of the Rebels, we now find they were sustained by them in their late attack of the Rebels Post last Friday, was at least 150 killed and wounded, and among them a Colonel, two of which are said to be Colonels. — Livington's Gazette, July 26, 1776.

"Chatham, July 29, 1776. Friday General Wayne with a detachment of 1800 men, made an assault upon a block-house of the enemy, near Bull's Ferry on the North River, but finding it very strong, held only 84 (figures) draw of the men. One long we took amounts to near 50 killed and wounded. But the Rebels say less. — Livington's Gazette, July 29, 1776.

CHAPTER XVII.

CONFISCATED ESTATES IN WHAT IS NOW HUDSON COUNTY, AND ACTS OF LEGISLATURE RELATIVE THERETO.

AMONG the first acts passed by the Legislature of New Jersey were those relating to the security of the government and the punishment of treason. At the first session under the constitution, held at Princeton, from the 27th of August to the 8th of October, 1776 an act was passed on the 19th of September repealing the old oath of loyalty to the King, and prescribing the new oath of allegiance to the government founded by authority of the people. The oath of abjuration of the kingly authority is in the words following:

"I, A. B., do sincerely profess and swear (or, if one of the people called Quakers, affirm), That I do not hold myself bound to bear Allegiance to the King of Great Britain, So help me God."

The following is the oath of allegiance to the popular government:

"I, A. B., do sincerely profess and swear (or, if one of the people called Quakers, affirm), That I do and will bear true Faith and Allegiance to the Government established in this State under the Authority of the People, So help me God."

In an "Act to punish traitors and disaffected persons," passed Oct. 4, 1776, it is provided in the fourth section:

"That any two Justices of the peace shall, and they hereby are empowered and directed to (convene by Summons or Warrant any person whatsoever whom they shall suspect to be dangerous or disaffected to the present Government, and to tender and administer to him the Oaths of Abjuration and Allegiance set forth in an act entitled 'An Act for the Security of the Government of New Jersey,' passed the nineteenth of September, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-six. And if any person to whom the Oath shall be tendered shall neglect or refuse to take the same, the said Justice shall bind (in a writ or writs) such sureties to appear at the next Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, and to be in the meanwhile of good Behaviour, and in default of sufficient sureties, or an refusal to be bound, the said Justice are hereby empowered and directed to commit each Offender to the Gaol, and certify the same, with the nature of his Offence, to their Hands and seals, to the next Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace, where if such Offender refuse to take the said Oath, he shall be committed to his good Behaviour, or be bound or imprisoned, as the said Court shall deem necessary.

In the early stage of the war many persons had been induced to leave their homes and their friends and join the army of the King of Great Britain. Others who had been guilty of treasonable practices against the State secreted themselves to escape punishment. "In compassion for their unhappy situation, and desirous that every measure should be employed to restore such to their allegiance and to the benefits of a free government, the Legislature of New Jersey, on the 5th of June, 1777, passed "An Act of free and general pardon, and for other purposes therein mentioned." This act provided that all such offenders who chose to return to their allegiance or join the cause of their country before the 5th day of August next ensuing should meet with amnesty on the part of the government, and upon taking the prescribed oath before the Judge of the Supreme Court, or of the Court of Common Pleas, or any other Justice of the peace, should receive the following form of certificate:

"I, C. D., one of the Justices, etc., as the case may be, do hereby certify that A. B., being one of the Offenders described in an Act of the Legislature of New Jersey, made and passed the fifth day of June, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-seven, entitled 'An Act of free and general Pardon, and for other Purposes therein mentioned,' having voluntarily appeared before me and claimed the Benefit of the said Act, hath this day taken and subscribed the Oath of Affirmation, as the case may be prescribed in the said Act. Given under my Hand and seal the — day of —, Anno Domini 1777.

"C. D."

On presenting this certificate to the clerk of the county of his residence, the offender should be "freely and absolutely pardoned, released and discharged from all treasons and other offenses specified in an act of the Legislature of the State made and passed at Princeton on the 4th day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, entitled "An Act to punish Traitors and Disaffected persons," and should be thereupon "restored to all the rights, liberties and privileges of other and good subjects of this State."

If, on the contrary, they declined or refused to accept of the generous offer of the government within the time specified in the act, commissioners appointed by law were to take possession of their estates, real and personal, and under certain conditions lease or sell the same for the benefit of the State.

High Treason.—The crime which worked the forfeiture and confiscation of real estate in New Jersey was that of high treason, and is thus defined in the act of Dec. 11, 1778, entitled "An Act for forfeiting to and vesting in the State of New Jersey the real estate of certain fugitives and offenders, and for directing the mode of determining and satisfying the lawful debts and demands which may be due from or made against such fugitives and offenders, and for other purposes therein mentioned,—"

"Be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That each and every inhabitant of this State, seized or possessed of, interested in or entitled to any Estate, Real or Personal, within the same, who hath, since the nineteenth Day of April, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-Five, and before the fourth Day of October, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-six, aided and assisted the enemies thereof, or of the United States, by joining their Armies within this State, or otherwise, or who hath voluntarily gone to, taken refuge or continued with, or endeavored to continue with the Enemy aforesaid, and aid them by Counsel or otherwise, and who has not since returned and become a Subject in Allegiance to the present Government by taking the Oaths or Affirmations prescribed in the Act entitled 'An Act for the Security of the Government of New Jersey,' passed the nineteenth Day of September, 1776, when required, each and every such Person is hereby declared to be guilty of High Treason against this State; and on Conviction thereof by Imposition found, and final Judgment thereon entered in favor of the State, as hereinafter declared, such Conviction shall amount to a full and absolute Forfeiture of such Person's Estate, both Real and Personal, whatsoever, within this State, to and for the Use and Benefit of the same.

"Provided, always, That such Conviction shall not extend to affect the Person of any such Offender, but shall operate against his or her Estate only."

Under the provisions of the foregoing acts, estates were confiscated and sold in New Jersey in 1778 and 1779. But the war still continuing, the poverty of the country and the depreciated state of the currency made it necessary to discontinue their sale to a more favorable time. Hence, on the 26th of June, 1781, an act was passed by the Legislature of New Jersey, entitled "An Act to suspend the sales of real estates which have or may hereafter become to and vested in the State." Under an act passed Dec. 20, 1781, Hendrick Kuyper was appointed agent to take charge of forfeited estates in Bergen County. Some of the confiscated estates disposed of in this county were sold by the commissioners—James Boord, Garret Lyn-decker, Hendrick Kuyper, Peter Foll and others—previous to the act of suspension. After that they were sold by the agents, Hendrick Kuyper and Cornelius Haring, who executed the deeds to the purchasers, which are found recorded in the clerk's office of Bergen County. We have compiled from the records the following:

List of Confiscated Estates in what is now Hudson County.—Estate of William Bayard, 564 acres in the township of Bergen, at Hoboken; sold to John Stevens, Jr., July 26, 1784, for the sum of £18,360 lawful money of New Jersey. Deed recorded in book D, page 437.

CHAPTER XVIII.

HUDSON COUNTY IN THE REBELLION.

THE causes which led to the secession of the Southern States in 1861, have been written and rewritten until every school-boy has become thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and long ere this pronounced his verdict of condemnation upon the wicked and suicidal policy of a comparatively few of the aristocratic slave-owners of the South, aided and abetted by an insignificant number of their dough-face tools at the North; therefore we will not occupy valuable space with that branch of the subject.

When the electric shock produced by the vibrations of the first rebel shot fired at the old flag in Charleston Harbor in April, 1861, reached Hudson County, it struck a chord in the hearts of the people that aroused their enthusiasm, and as one man they proclaimed, "The Union must and shall be preserved;" and an outpouring of patriotism was displayed such as had never been seen or dreamed of before. The banks came forward with their money, and individuals with their offerings, and all were laid on the altar of their country. Every fireside shone with the lustre of patriotic feeling, and even the schools shared in the absorbing excitement.

The Mechanics' and Traders' Bank of Jersey City pledged itself for $25,000; the Bank of Jersey City, $10,000; and Hoboken City Bank, $11,000. Among the earliest individual tenders of aid were those of Miss Sophia Stevens and Miss Esther Stevens, who, on April 29th, each placed $1000 at the Governor's disposal.

President Lincoln's first call for troops was made on the 15th day of April, 1861. Of the total number called for by that proclamation, New Jersey's quota was four regiments of seven hundred and eighty men each, or three thousand one hundred and twenty-three men in all. Governor Olden received the requisition of the War Department, of which he had been previously notified, on the 17th, and instantly issued a proclamation directing all individuals or organizations willing to respond to the call thus made to report themselves within twenty days. On the same day he notified the government that its demand would be immediately complied with. The terms of the requisition required the troops furnished to be detached from the militia of the State, and accordingly, simultaneously with the proclamation of the Governor, orders were issued to the major-generals of the several military divisions, four in number, to detail each one regiment of ten companies, and also to organize immediately the reserve militia in the respective brigades. In detailing, these officers were directed to accept the service of volunteers, but if the requisite number did not volunteer, they were required to draft from the reserve militia for the deficiency. No such necessity, however, was anticipated, and the result fully justified the confidence of the authorities. The people everywhere responded with enthusiastic alacrity to the call for troops. The existing military organizations at once opened recruiting stations, public meetings were held in every town and city in aid of enlistments; the churches entered cordially into the work, many sending full companies to the front; while everywhere the popular heart beat responsive to the spirit in which the call of the nation's head had been made.

Second Regiment.—Hudson County was not lacking in any of the means necessary to the furnishing troops and supplies for the putting down the Rebellion, and at once recruited and equipped one of the four regiments composing the First Jersey Brigade, of the three months' troops, and designated as the Second Regiment.

In reference to the clothing and equipment of the Second Regiment of militia, referred to, we have been supplied with the following statement, which shows also how it was raised: "On the 16th of April a meeting was called at the Hudson House, in Jersey City, for the purpose of raising men for the war. Isaac W. Scudder, Esq., was chosen president of the meeting. Mr. Potter moved that a roll be opened for volunteers, which was agreed to amid warm applause. James M. Weart, a student-at-law, was the first to come forward and put down his name. In a few minutes the names of thirty ardent and true men were enrolled. This meeting gave such an impulse to the war movement that the volunteering of the Second Regiment speedily resulted. At a meeting of citizens held on April 22d, the mayor (Cornelius Van Vorst) in the chair, a war committee of five was appointed, consisting of Mayor Van Vorst, Henry Traphagen, John Griffith Benjamin G. Clarke and David Smith. This committee equipped the Second Regiment and sent it to the field. Upon volunteering, the men were without uniforms or equipments, and the city was without money, but the emergency was promptly met by Messrs. Griffith and Clarke, who came forward and in the most noble manner purchased all the necessary clothing and equipments, making themselves personally liable for some thirty thousand dollars, trusting that the people would ultimately raise the money and pay the bills incurred. Thus the citizens, through their representatives, cheerfully did, and the gentlemen named were reimbursed. The regiment was equipped and in camp at Trenton on April 26th, less than a week after the general meeting of citizens was held.

The war committee above named, after the departure of the regiment, cared for the families of the men, the citizens subscribing a large sum of money for that purpose.

At the time of which we write communication with Washington by way of Baltimore had been cut off by the burning of bridges and the destruction of sections of the railway running through Maryland, and it became necessary, therefore, that the New Jersey troops should proceed thither by way of Annapolis. After consultation it was determined to employ the propellers plying on the Delaware and Raritan Canal in their transportation by this route, no other means of conveyance being available. Accordingly, on the 2d of May, an order was issued to Gen. Runyon directing the embarkation of the troops "as soon as possible," and on the same day final instructions were issued to the commandant "for his government while en route to the field. The day following, the fleet (Capt. R. F. Loper in command) left Trenton, and on the night of the 4th arrived off Annapolis, having been greeted at all points along the route with manifestations of pleasure.¹ The arrival of the brigade was at once reported to Gen. Butler, who, after some ceremony, ordered its advance to Washington,² and ¹ Mr. John G. Stevens has and I have first suggested the adoption of this route and method of transportation.

² In these instructions Gen. Runyon was directed to proceed by way of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal to Annapolis, and there report to the officer commanding for further orders. As soon as possible he was directed to ascertain by careful inspection any deficiencies which might exist in the arms, equipments and hospital stores of the brigade, and to notify the State as to what was needed, if the deficiency could not be supplied by the government. The instructions closed with this injunction: "The honor of New Jersey is in your keeping."

⁴ A very full and accurate account of the events which had preceded the arrival of our troops at Annapolis, including the particulars of its seizure and occupation by Butler, is given in the 18th chapter (vol. 1.) of Lossing's "Civil War in America."
